"Jimmie," as we knew him, was Mr. Pennsylvania. He represented our State for 11 years in Congress, and then went on to serve the Commonwealth as its representative in Washington until 1971. He was a man of unselfish commitment. He resigned from this body to serve his country in the U.S. Navy during World War II. He had already served during World War I, and he went on to serve again during the Korean conflict. He retired as a rear admiral from the Naval Reserve in 1959.

Mr. Van Zandt's commitment to veterans took him from commander of the Altoona Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars to State commander for Pennsylvania and national commander of the VFW for three terms, from 1933–36.

His decorations included the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star.

During his House career, he was senior member of the House Armed Services Committee and ranking Republican of the House on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

We can all be proud of this man who served us and his constituency with commitment and caring. For so many years his name has been synonymous with our great State. I ask you all to join me in paying tribute to this fine American and in sending our deepest sympathies to his family.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the country will miss our dear friend and trusted colleague, Jimmie Van Zandt, who passed away January 6.

Jimmie was a fighter for freedom and life till the day he died. He served Pennsylvania as a responsible, honest, hard-working Congressman for 20 years and 9 months before, during and after World War II.

When the country needed Jimmie he was always there. At the age of 18 he enlisted as an apprentice seaman. In 1919 he was discharged as a chief quartermaster. And in the early 1940's when our European allies were fighting Hitler, Jimmie, as a Congressman, was in the center of this country's greatest debate over U.S. aid and support for those allies. The dabate waged, with the entire Nation watching, until the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941.

On that date, which we should never forget, Congressman Jimmie Van Zandt was already on active duty with the U.S. Navy as a reservist. He heard the call of his country, and shipped out in September 1941 after Congress had recessed. The Navy needed his expertise and experience during World War II, so he left his family and interrupted his congressional career to serve the country—Jimmie was not a selfish man.

Jimmie loved his country. Not only did he serve his country in World War I, World War II, and the Korean conflict; he also served all those men and women, who were veterans of those wars, as commander of the Altoona Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, State commander for Pennsylvania and national commander of the VFW.

As a national leader in veterans matters, he fought for the bonuses for World War I veterans—a struggle that continued for years—but, finally the Congress conceded and World War I veterans received their just bonus in 1936. In 1936, Jimmie was VFW national commander—Jimmie always fought for the little guy.

I know that one of Jimmie's greatest days was when the James E. Van Zandt Veterans' Medical Center was dedicated to him in his hometown, Altoona, PA.—he was proud of his hometown and the people that lived there.

Jimmie cared deeply for Pennsylvania and its people. In 1964, he volunteered to assist the Pennsylvania congressional delegation so the people of his beloved State would be served. He also served the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as the official representative of the Governor of Pennsylvania in the Nation's Capital twice during his work with the delegation. He counseled both Republican and Democrat Members. He brought members from different political parties together so the people of Pennsylvania would benefit.

Jimmie was a true American hero. He is the epitome of a public servant; he served his country freely for over six decades. His wit, wisdom, and guidance will be missed by his family and his friends. It is difficult to think that Jimmie is gone, but his love for his country, Pennsylvania and his family will go on.

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this tribute to Jimmy Van Zandt who dedicated his life to his country and to this body.

For his entire adult life, Jimmy either served in the Armed Forces, in the U.S. House of Representatives or for the benefit of the House. He volunteered to serve in World War I, entering the Navy as an apprentice seaman and concluded his military service in 1959 as a rear admiral in the U.S. Naval Reserve. During his 42 years of service in the military, Jimmy saw action in both World Wars as well as in the Korean conflict.

He gave the same devotion to his duties in the House. Elected in 1939, Jimmy gave all he had to representing the 22d District of Pennsylvania, until he was recalled to active duty to serve with the Pacific Fleet in 1941. Undaunted by interruptions in his legislative career, Jimmy ran again when his active duty assignments were concluded, winning election to the House for eight more succeeding terms. And he didn't stop there. Following his years as a Member of Congress, Jimmy served voluntarily as the secretary of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation.

I am honored that I had the opportunity to work with Jimmy Van Zandt. His zest for life and love of work were inspirational. He had a smile and kind words for everyone. But he also had an intelligence and savvy that came from years of hard-won experiences. Those who would seek him out and listen to his advice, were always the better for it—and he certainly has a wealth of friends and colleagues here today who can testify to being richer for having known and worked with him.

Jimmy cared about mankind and he put every ounce of his almost limitless energies into helping his fellow man. He rarely asked for help for himself; instead he just gave and gave and gave. I am pleased that we are paying tribute to Jimmy today so that a small measure of what he gave to us can be given to remembering this brave and honorable man.

I know that his wife, Esther, and son, James II, are proud of him and loved him very much. I hope they can take consolation in knowing that many of us share in that pride and affection.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, Recently, the State of Pennsylvania and our entire Nation lost a truly devoted public servant, Congressman James Van Zandt. Jimmy Van Zandt not only loved this Nation, but served it dutifully.

His entire life was devoted to service. Not only in Congress, but in World Wars I, II and the Korean war. After his retirement, he worked for Pennsylvania Governor Scranton and also served as secretary to the Pennsylvania delegation for a mere salary of $1 a year.

One story typifies his service. In 1954, Van Zandt was on the floor of Congress when several terrorists fired gunshots into the House Chamber. The Congressman crawled off the floor, ran up the steps to the gallery, and apprehended one of the gunmen.

This shows the type of devotion Jimmy Van Zandt gave to helping others. Throughout his career, and his entire life, he thought more of those he served than of himself. He will be dearly missed.

Mr. CLINGER. Every once in a while, a special kind of person comes along and touches our lives in a way that few others could ever hope to. Jimmie Van Zandt was one of those people.

His achievements and his service to his State, and to his Nation, are unique and will be mentioned many times today. I would simply like to say that if there were just a few more Jim Van Zandt's around today, this country would be an even more special place in which to live. Thank you Jimmie. We're going to miss you.

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I join today in paying tribute to James E. Van Zandt, my friend and former colleague who served in the House of Representatives for 11 terms.

Jimmie's distinguished career in both the military and the House of Representatives serves as a model for all of us to emulate. He joined the Navy during his senior year at Altoona, PA, High School and served as a signalman aboard merchant convoys during World War I. Between the Wars, he remained in the Naval Reserve and became active in the Veterans of Foreign Wars—serving two terms as the Pennsylvania department commander and three terms as national commander. He returned to active duty in World War II and also served during the Korean conflict. Jimmie's military decorations included the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star. After many years of tireless and dedicated service, he retired from the Naval Reserve as a rear admiral in 1959.

Jimmie's career in the House of Representatives was equally distinguished. He was first elected to the House in 1938 and served for 11 terms. In keeping with his strong commitment to our national security, he resigned from his position in 1943 to concentrate on his duties with the Navy. He returned to the House in 1946 and served until 1963. During his House career, Jimmie served as senior member of the House Armed Services Committee and as ranking Republican on the joint Committee on Atomic Energy. He was known as a forceful advocate for the VFW and other veterans' groups as well as a strong supporter of efforts to strengthen our national security.

I came to know Jimmie very well during his twenty years of service as Secretary of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation. From our work together, I learned that he was not only a dedicated public servant but also a warm, engaging and personable man whom I am honored to have called my friend. Jimmie's commitment to the interests of both Pennsylvania and our Nation was admirable and I know he was a source of inspiration to all of my colleagues. He will be sadly missed, but the goals and ideals which he stressed and his contributions to this institution and the further development of our Nation will always stand as his lasting achievement.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, on January 6 we lost a former colleague and great American hero to cancer—Jimmie Van Zandt.

As many Members of this body know, Jimmie Van Zandt carved a nationally recognized reputation as a loyal champion of veterans' rights. Though I did not have the pleasure of serving with Jimmie during his tenure as a Member of Congress, I did have the privilege of witnessing his abilities, his knowledge, and his resolve as a spokesman for veterans.

November 30, 1983, marked the enactment of an appropriate and lasting tribute to Jimmie—legislation initiated by members of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation to name the VA hospital in Jimmie's hometown of Altoona, PA, the "James E. Van Zandt Veterans' Administration Medical Center" and which had received the unanimous nod of this Chamber was signed into law.

On July 21, 1984, the intent of Public Law 98-190 was carried out in a special ceremony on the hospital grounds at Altoona. It was said of Jimmie on that day: "Just as this structure—the hospital—* * * is supported by mortar and steel, this Nation is supported by a strong foundation comprised of courageous and proud individuals like Jimmie Van Zandt."

When you consider his valorous service in three wars, his able leadership of one of the Nation's most outstanding service organizations, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and his 22 years in the U.S. Congress, there is no more apt description of Jimmie Van Zandt's life than "inspiring."

Jimmie's life and works serve as beacons for all others who seek excellence in life's endeavors. His greatest characteristics—spirit, determination, loyalty, amiability—enabled him to achieve enviable success in all he did. It was the good fortune of those of us who knew him and worked with him to have crossed paths with such a good man. He will be greatly missed.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the House was recently saddened with the news of the passing of our former great friend and colleague, Jimmie Van Zandt. Jimmie's life represented the best that America has to offer in service to country and dedication to the principles which have always kept our Nation strong and free.

Born on December 18, 1898, in Altoona, PA, Jimmie enlisted as an apprentice seaman in the U.S. Navy in April 1917. He retired, January 1, 1959 as a rear admiral in the U.S. Naval Reserve. He saw active duty in both world wars and the Korean conflict.

Jimmie was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1938. He resigned his seat in 1943 to enter the U.S. Navy during World War II. After the war he was reelected to Congress in 1946 and served until 1963.

During his congressional career he served as a senior member of the House Armed Services Committee and was the ranking Republican member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, the Veterans' Affairs Committee and Naval Affairs. He was also a member of the Corregidor Bataan Memorial Commission.

Following his retirement from the House, Jimmie continued to serve the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as a forceful and committed secretary to the Pennsylvania congressional delegation.

Mr. Speaker, Jimmie Van Zandt's career in service to the veterans of this Nation was remarkable and certainly unique. As a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee myself for the past 11 years, I remember well that he was an active and frequent visitor to our committee even following his retirement from the House. His love and concern for those who had served with him in three armed conflicts during this century knew no bounds. He was elected three times as National Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and twice as Pennsylvania Department Commander of the VFW. He served as a member of the National Advisory Council on Veterans' Affairs of the U.S. Senate and as a member of the National Cemetery System Advisory Board of the Veterans' Administration. He was a member of the American Legion, the Veterans of World War I and Forty and Eight.

In 1983, it was my high honor as chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Subcommittee on Hospitals and Health Care to receive the request from Jimmie's beloved Department of Pennsylvania VFW to introduce legislation, H.R. 4294, to rename the VA Medical Center in Altoona, PA, Jimmie's home town, the "James E. Van Zandt Veterans' Administration Medical Center." The bill was unanimously endorsed by all federally chartered veterans organizations in Pennsylvania and the Pennsylvania congressional delegation. H.R. 4294 was approved by my subcommittee on November 3, 1983, passed by the House on November 8, the Senate on November 18 and was signed by the President of the United States on November 30, 1983.

Perhaps no greater lasting tribute could be made to Jimmie's lifetime of achievement and concern for the American veterans than to have his name perpetually associated in his home town and his congressional district with an institution dedicated to provide healing and comfort to those who have served and sacrificed so much in defense of this nation. Even though Jimmie has left us, the Van Zandt VA Medical Center will continue to promote the ideals and achievements of his outstanding life through love of country, recognition of service and the principles which have always kept America strong and free. He will be sorely missed. But his legacy will continue in Abraham Lincoln's words: "To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow, and his orphan."

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, when he died on January 6, we lost a friend, and we lost a man who had served in the highest traditions of Congress and the Nation.

Jimmy Van Zandt entered World War I in 1917. He served as a signalman aboard merchant convoys sailing between the United States and Europe. Later he would serve in World War II, in the North Atlantic during 1941 and 1942 while still serving in Congress. After resigning, he spent 3 years on active duty in the Pacific where he commanded landing craft. He also served in Korea during the conflict there, and retired from the Naval Reserve as a rear admiral in 1959.

His military decorations included the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star.

Jimmy Van Zandt served 11 terms in the House of Representatives, beginning in 1938 and surrounding his military duty until 1962 when he resigned to run for the Senate. He also served three terms as commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

My memories of Jimmy Van Zandt include his volunteer service as secretary of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation where he attended to the details of congressional delegation decisions. Moreover, he was a friend with whom I could exchange information about the military and the history of the House of Representatives. He brought a clear eye to present debates coupled with the experience of history and the continuing study and insight into present problems.

Jimmy Van Zandt's service to his country was in the highest tradition of what has made America the greatest country in the world.

Truly the citizen-soldier, truly the citizen-legislator, Jimmy Van Zandt left his mark on this world, and we can truly say our Nation is better for his presence.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, the residents of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and, indeed, the entire United States, suffered a great loss with the recent death of former Congressman James E. (Jimmie) Van Zandt.

Few Americans have acheived so much in just 87 short years on this Earth. His accomplishments are of legendary proportion. Three times the national commander of the Veterans' of Foreign Wars, 11 terms as A U.S. Congressman, service in both world wars and Korea, for which he was awarded the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star. A dedicated husband, father, and public servant, Jimmie never stopped fighting for those less fortunate, less blessed, less able to help themselves.

My earliest memories of Jimmie take place, when as a boy growing up in the 1930's, my parents often took me to parades and public gathering where Jimmie was frequently called upon to be the speaker. A man possessed of limitless drive and energy, Jimmie would remain a lifelong champion of veterans' causes and an outspoken proponent of a strong national defense.

For more years than I care to recount, I considered Jimmie to be a friend and advisor. That friendship was cemented when, in 1976, I came to Congress as a freshman Member from Pennsylvania. Jimmie was already here serving our delegation and his advice and assistance to me proved invaluable. I will miss his wit, his wisdom, his energy, and his leadership.

So rare is a man who can and will dedicate his entire life to the betterment and service of his country and his God. Too few people are left to fill the void that Jimmie's passing has created.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in the Pennsylvania delegation today to pay tribute to Jimmy Van Zandt.

Jimmy had such an extraordinary record of public service, Mr. Speaker.

He served in three wars, seeing active duty in World War I, World War II, and in Korea.

He interrupted his House career in 1943 to voluntarily go into active duty in the Navy.

After his active military career he became the senior member of the Armed Services Committee, and then national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

On a personal basis, Mr. Speaker, when I first came to Congress in 1977, Jimmy had been retired for 14 years, but he was still a leader in the Pennsylvania delegation. He had boundless energy, and was a real factor in getting the delegation together, and keeping us aware of important State issues. He was a help to new Members, and particularly in that year, 1977, when nine new Members from Pennsylvania arrived in Washington.

I will always remember Jimmy for his selfless contribution to the delegation and his infectious enthusiasm. I am grateful to have known Jimmy, and I join the many here today praising Jimmy Van Zandt for his tremendous service to his constituents and his country.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to pay a special tribute to a former member of the Pennsylvania delegation, James Van Zandt. Jimmy Van Zandt died at the age of 87, on January 6, 1986, at his home in Alexandria, VA.

Although I never had the opportunity to serve in this body with Mr. Van Zandt, I first met Jimmy when I became a Member of the Pennsylvania delegation. Jimmy, at that time, was the secretary of the Pennsylvania delegation, a job which he held for years.

Not many of us will have such an illustrious career as Mr. Van Zandt. He was first elected to the House of Representatives in 1938, representing the city of Altoona, PA.

While he was a Member of the House, Jimmy Van Zandt enlisted in the Navy during World War II. He served 4 months in the Pacific and North Atlantic before he resigned his House seat in 1943. He then went on to serve 3 years of active duty in the Pacific. After World War II, he returned to the House in 1946 where he served until he retired in 1962.

The period from 1943–46 was only a brief part of Mr. Van Zandt's military life. He quit school during his senior year of high school and joined the Navy during World War I. Jimmy served as a signalman aboard a merchant cargo vessel traveling between the United States and Europe. He remained in the Naval Reserves after his time of duty and retired in 1959 with the rank of rear admiral. He was awarded the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star.

During his tenure in the House, Jimmy Van Zandt sat on the Joint Atomic Energy Committee and was the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee.

Jimmy Van Zandt also was credited with capturing one of four Puerto Rican gunmen who fired onto the House floor on March 1, 1954. During the incident, Jimmy was on the floor of the House. When the gunfire occurred, he crawled to the cloakroom, ran up the steps to the gallery and seized the terrorist.

I would like to thank my colleagues Mr. GAYDOS and Mr. SHUSTER for taking this time today to honor this man who unselfishly served his district, his State, and his Nation. I know that Jimmy Van Zandt will be dearly missed.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, that concludes my special order eulogizing Congressman James Van Zandt.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to insert their remarks on the subject of this special order in tribute to our former colleague, Jimmie Van Zandt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

FARMWORKERS ARE ENTITLED TO THE BASICS AS MUCH AS OTHER AMERICAN WORKERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, when the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 was signed into law, those of us who were involved in its passage believed we had set a series of standards that would cover all workers in this country, regardless of the industry in which they were employed.

Unfortunately, through time, it hasn't worked exactly as we planned. One segment of industry, agriculture, but more specifically those persons engaging in the hand harvesting of fruits and vegetables, which is usually called stoop labor, appears to have been left out.

For more than 13 years, and through several administrations, America's farmworkers who do that hand harvesting have been left out of OSHA's coverage, suffering indignity, inconvenience, and higher incidences of disease due to a lack of basic sanitation facilities.

No other segment of the American work force has been forced to do without toilets, hand-washing provisions and drinking water on the job, regardless of whether they are working in the fields or in a factory.

America's construction workers work out of doors and they are afforded those basic sanitation necessities. Well, why aren't our farmworkers? Through those 13 years, even with the support of the Federal court system, farmworkers have been unable to win support for those simple basics even though testimony by experts at OSHA hearings have shown that farmworkers face health risks many times greater than the general population.

Finally, the courts insisted that OSHA determine whether or not a field sanitation standard was necessary. In one of OSHA's darker moments, even in this administration, former Assistant Secretary of Labor for OSHA, Robert Rowland, told the court that the experts, even those hired by OSHA itself, were wrong and there was no need for a Federal field sanitation standard.

But Rowland even went a step further. He said that even if there were such a standard, OSHA neither could nor would enforce it.

Newly sworn Secretary of Labor Bill Brock said he was going to review the decision, but time ran out for the farmworkers when one court ruled that the lower court did not have jurisdiction in the case, thereby voiding years of effort and struggle.

Given that escape from the courts, Brock announced last September that a Federal field sanitation standard was not warranted, but should really be the responsibility of the individual States.

Brock did indicate that if those States in which hand harvesting took place did not develop acceptable standards within 18 months, he would take action on a Federal standard.

At this point in time, some 13 States have field sanitation standards of sorts. It is also evident that some of those State agencies assigned the responsibility of enforcing the State standards are either unable or unwilling to do so.

Because it is criminal for us not to act, to wait for another year or more while farmworkers' health is endangered because of a lack of basic sanitation facilities, I am introducing a bill to establish an occupational health and safety standard on field sanitation with respect to agricultural employees engaged in hand-labor operations.

The standard proposed in this bill closely parallels the standard proposed by OSHA to the Secretary of Labor in terms of the toilet facilities, hand washing and drinking water provisions.

This bill, however, does require the Secretary of Labor to submit to the Congress within 90 days after enactment of this measure a plan for the inspection of farms where the standard would apply. It also requires a report from the Secretary within 2 years of enactment on how the plan is working.

After more than 13 years of suffering untold indignities and disease, our farmworkers deserve the same rights that all other working Americans receive under the OSHA Act. They deserve no less if the integrity of the act is to be preserved.

With that, I urge my colleagues to examine the act very closely and hopefully, after they search their conscience, to join as a cosponsor so that we may conclude the hearings hopefully and bring this measure before the House for final determination and action. It is so small of an accommodation to so many people, and it is so fundamental that to me I feel chagrined that nothing has been done up until this time in this very sensitive and warranted area.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

ABORTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SWINDALL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SWINDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is significant that on Monday of this week, our Nation chose to pay tribute to a man who has come to symbolize this Nation's commitment to basic human and civil rights.

I think, however, Mr. Speaker, it is tragic that today, 2 days after that historic holiday, we find ourselves as a Nation ignoring the very declaration that Dr. King claimed in this same city in his now famous speech in 1963, that declaration being the declaration of our Founding Fathers that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

As we all know, on this same date in 1973, the Supreme Court, in the Roe versus Wade decision, held that the unborn were no longer entitled the basic civil and human rights because, according to that Supreme Court, they were not persons as defined by the Constitution. In the wake of that decision, I have an entirely new understanding of the frustration that Dr. King must have felt, and along with him, many of our black brothers and sisters back in the early 1960's when individual restaurateurs and owners of businesses contended that it was their choice as to whether or not they would honor the basic civil rights of our black brothers and sisters. I have a new understanding, Mr. Speaker, of the frustration that blacks prior to the Emancipation Proclamation must have felt when slaveowners in this country contended that it was their choice as to whether or not those blacks would be entitled to the basic freedoms that we all take for granted.

Yet, that is precisely the same argument that we hear throughout this land today, and that is that women in this country ought to have the choice with respect to the basic right to life of our unborn. I think that it is significant that by definition the word "unalienable," the word to which Dr. King referred, means that which cannot be given or taken away. It is alarming the similarity between the Dred Scott decision decided in 1857 and the Roe versus Wade decision decided in 1973, because at the crux of both of those decisions was first and foremost the fact that the Supreme Court was yielding to the economic and social pressures of the times.

For example, it is a well-documented fact of history that in 1857 when the Supreme Court reached the now notorious Dred Scott decision, concluded that blacks were not entitled to constitutional protection because they were not persons or citizens under their definition in their interpretation, or I might say rewriting of the Constitution, that there was tremendous social and economic pressure to keep that system in place. I think that it is equally ironic that the Chief Justice that wrote the majority opinion of the Court was an individual who claimed to be personally opposed to slavery.

How many times have I heard individuals say I am personally opposed to abortion, but it is certainly not the place of our Government to impose choice on us. Thank God that there were individuals back in 1857 that had the courage to read the rest of that declaration that states that the purpose of Government is to make absolutely certain that those unalienable rights are protected, and that if a government fails in its obligation, it is the obligation of the governed to alter or abolish that government, because I am confident that soon-to-be President Abraham Lincoln was mindful of that when in 1858, he ran for the U.S. Senate in Illinois and he argued against the spread of slavery. We all know that he lost that election, but 2 years later, he defeated the same individual in the race for the Presidency of the United States, and 3 years subsequent to that election, he signed the Emancipation Proclamation which led to the 13th amendment that reversed that tragic era of American history.

I am confident that President Lincoln understood that we in this Nation, fortunately, are not a democracy. We are rather a constitutional republic, which means that the majority never has the right simply because they majoritively so state to take any rights that are guaranteed by our Declaration of Independence and our U.S. Constitution.

We recognized that with the passage of the 13th amendment. Yet, if we look today at the Roe versus Wade decision, we see that the same exact flawed logic that characterized the Dred Scott decision characterizes the Roe versus Wade decision.

Many have told me that the Roe versus Wade decision turned on the issue of the right of privacy of the mother. Yet a careful reading of that decision leads to the inescapable conclusion that the Court could not even reach the issue of the privacy until they first resolved the issue of the right to life, because that is a right that is protected far beyond privacy. We know that the way that they went through that issue was they said that our unborn are not persons as defined by the Constitution. In essence, they rewrote the Constitution in much the same fashion that the Dred Scott Court rewrote the Constitution.

I would submit that irrespective of how you feel on the issue of abortion, if you hold our Constitution to be a document that ought to escape the social and economic pressures of any given era, we cannot afford for the Roe versus Wade decision to stand.

I have heard many individuals say how do we know that the unborn are persons. I would say to those individuals that our Constitution says that we are all innocent until proven guilty. The fifth amendment says you may not deprive someone of their life until due process of law.

My question would be: Where is the due process for the 18 million who are not with us today because of the Roe versus Wade decision and the numerous decisions that have followed that have legalized abortion on demand in this country?

I have heard a number of individuals argue that these children are unwanted. Yet I would say to those individuals that they ask the wrong question. The more appropriate question would be unwanted by whom, because we now know that there are 10-year wait lists for infant children. People pay $40,000 to $50,000 on the black market for infant children.

It may well be true that the natural mother may not want that child, but it is certainly not true that that child is unwanted.

The recently deceased Francis Schaeffer, a theologian whom I had the privilege of hearing speak in 1972, the year before the Roe versus Wade decision, argued that if this Nation, the United States of America, were to legalize abortion on demand, that that would be followed necessarily by infanticide and euthanasia. Why? Because abortion is a statement that we no longer consider human life to be sacred.

As we devalue human life, necessarily a utilitarian perspective will dictate that infanticide and euthanasia will follow.

We now know that this very Congress debated a couple of years ago an issue as to whether or not parents acting in consultation with a physician would have the right during the child's first three days of life outside the womb to unilaterally terminate that life; that is, murder the child, if it did not fit within their definitional framework of life that is worth living.

Fortunately, that legislation fell. But we do know that infanticide exists in this country today. In Atlanta, the city that I have the privilege of representing, in 1983 we learned there were 14 certificates of live births signed at an abortion clinic in Atlanta, GA. You say, "Why would there be live births in an abortion clinic?" The reason was something went wrong in the abortion. These third-trimester abortions yielded forth live children.

Because those parents did not want that child and because the purpose of the operation, the cesarean, was to end not save the life, each of these children were allowed to die by suffocating in their own fluids.

I became personally sensitized to that issue last year, almost exactly a year ago, on January 4 of that year. I then had the privilege of seeing my wife give birth to my first daughter. Because my daughter was breech, it was necessary to have a cesarean.

During that cesarean I recognized that the procedure for that cesarean where we wanted the child was precisely the same procedure as a third-trimester abortion with one notable exception: In the third-trimester abortion, before the cesarean, there is an injection of saline designed to burn the baby to death. If it works, the child is delivered dead. If it fails, then the child is delivered mutilated, burned but not yet dead, until nature takes its course and the child suffocates.

I must confess to you that when you look at the personal side of abortion it is not a pretty picture. It is not an issue with which we want to deal, but it is a very human issue.

I also have grown to recognize the direct correlation, as we devalue human life, between infanticide abortion, and euthanasia, because in the utilitarian society that devaluates human life and places it captive to the relative subjective opinions of the majority, we find that regrettably those that are least fit are least likely to survive.

So naturally our elderly become potential victims. In fact, recently a western Governor actually made the statement that our elderly have an obligation to step aside because they have nothing to contribute to society.

Last Friday in USA Today, the founder of the Hemlock Society, Derek Humphry, was quoted in an interview as responding in the following manner to the question: "How do doctors feel about the proposal to legalize euthanasia in this country?" His response was, "It is going to be a very controversial piece of legislation, but as long as one-fourth or one-third of doctors agree with us, that is all that will be necessary."

It is like abortion, it will be a matter of conscience. This will give sanction to active, voluntary euthanasia of a dying person to request it. It is death by request; it is not murder, and it is not killing.

You see, the problem is we in this Nation have deteriorated to the point where we believe just because we make something legal it makes it right. But again I return to the definition of unalienable rights. Unalienable are those which the majority under our constitutional Government ought not to be able to take or to give. As long as the motto that is inscribed just above the Speaker's platform is inscribed there, I think we need to pause and ask precisely what we mean when we say, "In God we trust." I know this, that but for the affirmative act of abortion there would be 18 million young people alive in this country today.

As we reflect on the incredible and positive accomplishments of the last several decades in the area of civil and human rights for our black brothers and sisters, I would simply ask that we reflect further on the consequences of the Roe versus Wade decision and pay particular attention to the quote of our Founding Fathers where they said, "All men are created equal." Notice they did not say, "All are born equal;" a significant choice of words, because it was their intent that that basic right to life began from the moment of creation, not from the moment of birth.

Even our own Supreme Court in the Three Sisters decision concluded that the Founding Fathers, in writing the Declaration of Independence, knew precisely the words that they chose and chose them intentionally.

In this Nation it is imperative to recognize that there is one very fundamental and inescapable difference between the plight of our black brothers and sisters during the era of slavery and during the era of segregation, and the plight of our unborn who are being aborted at the rate of 1.5 million per year; and that is this: Our unborn do not have the ability to picket, to march, to protest, to write their Congressmen, to vote, and, most regrettably under the state of law in this country today, they do not have the right to life.

I thank the Speaker.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 2443

By Mr. MCCOLLUM:

—Page 6, line 24, after "with respect to" insert "all".

By Mr. SHUMWAY:

—Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Fair Deposit Availability Act of 1986".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "depository institution" means—

(A) Any insured bank or domestic branch as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act, other than a foreign bank having an insured or uninsured branch;

(B) any mutual savings bank as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act;

(C) any savings bank as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act;

(D) any insured credit union as defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act or any credit union which is eligible to make application to become an insured credit union pursuant to section 201 of such Act;

(E) any member as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act; and

(F) any insured institution as defined in section 401 of the National Housing Act or any institution which is eligible to make application to become an insured institution under section 403 of such Act;

(2) the term "deposit account" means an account in a depository institution on which the account holder is permitted to make withdrawals by negotiable or transferable instruments, payment orders of withdrawal, telephone transfers, or other similar items for the purpose of making payments or transfers to third persons or others. Such term includes demand deposit accounts, negotiable order of withdrawal accounts, share draft accounts, savings, deposits, and share accounts. Such term does not include time deposits;

(3) the term "Board" means the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; and

(4) the term "check or similar instrument" means a check, negotiable order of withdrawal, share draft, money order, or similar instrument, but does not include noncash items.

DISCLOSURE OF FUND AVAILABILITY POLICIES

SEC. 3. (a) Before opening a deposit account, a depository institution shall provide a written disclosure to the potential customer of its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into the customer's deposit account. A depository institution also shall provide a written disclosure to the potential customer of all fees and charges that can be assessed against deposit accounts. In the case of a deposit account which was opened prior to the effective date of this section, the depository institution shall include such disclosure with the first regularly scheduled mailing pertaining to the account which occurs after such effective date (but not later than 90 days after such effective date) unless the depository institution has provided a disclosure which meets the requirements of this section prior to such effective date.

(b) Each depository institution shall—

(1) post at each location where its employees receive deposits a clear and conspicuous notice setting forth its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument; and

(2) mail at least annually a brief reminder with respect to an account that deposits by check or similar instrument may not be available for immediate withdrawal.

(c) Each owner of an automatic or electronic terminal shall provide at each terminal location where deposits may be made a brief reminder that deposits by check or similar instrument may not be available for immediate withdrawal.

(d) Any change to a depository institution's general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into the customer's deposit account, or any change in the fees and charges to be assessed against a deposit account other than a change which expedites the availability of such funds, may take effect only after the depository institution has provided notice of such changes to the customer.

(e) Each depository institution shall provide disclosure, consistent with the disclosures required under subsection (a), by telephone of its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into a customer's account upon the telephone request of any person.

(f) The Board shall prescribe regulations to carry out this section. These regulations may contain such definitions, classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as the Board determines are necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section, to prevent circumvention or evasion of this section, or to facilitate compliance with this section. The regulations of the Board shall require all disclosures, statements, and notices provided to be clear and conspicuous and in language that can be readily understood.

(g) A depository institution that does not begin to compute interest or dividends on funds deposited by check or similar instrument to an interest bearing deposit account or a time deposit on or before the date on which the depository institution receives provisional credit for the deposit (or if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, the next business day) shall provide a written disclosure, within the time periods required under subsection (a), with respect to when the institution begins to compute interest on such funds.

(h) The Board shall publish model disclosure forms and clauses for common transactions to facilitate compliance with the disclosure requirements of this section and to aid customers by utilizing readily understandable language. Nothing in this Act requires the use of any such model form or clause prescribed by the Board under this section. A depository institution shall be deemed to be in compliance with the provisions of this section if it (1) uses any appropriate model form or clause as published by the Board, or (2) uses any such model form or clause and changes it by (A) deleting any information which is not required by this Act, or (B) rearranging the format.

(i) Model disclosure forms and clauses shall be adopted by the Board after notice duly given in the Federal Register and an opportunity for public comment in accordance with section 553 of title 5, United States Code.

INTEREST ON DEPOSITS

SEC. 4. For the purpose of computing the amount of interest or dividends payable with respect to an interest bearing deposit account or a time deposit, a depository institution may not delay beginning to compute interest on funds deposited by check or similar instrument to such an account beyond the date on which that depository institution receives provisional credit for the check or similar instrument (or if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, on the next business day) unless the computation of interest begins at a later date for all deposits, including cash deposits, made to the account or deposit. Nothing in this section requires the payment of interest with respect to funds deposited by check or similar instrument which is returned unpaid.

IMPROVED CLEARING PROCEDURES

SEC. 5. (a) Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Board shall publish for comment a regulation for the purpose of improving the check clearing system used by depository institutions by expediting the process for returning checks or other means in order to achieve the goal of—

(1) making deposits of funds by check or similar instrument drawn on local depository institutions available for withdrawal upon the expiration of one business day after deposit, and

(2) making deposits of funds by check or similar instrument drawn on other depository institutions available for withdrawal upon the expiration of three business days after deposit. This subsection does not apply to any check or similar instrument which poses a serious risk of loss to a depository institution.

(b) In prescribing the regulation under subsection (a), the Board shall consider—

(1) adopting a uniform endorsement standard;

(2) providing for direct notification of returning checks and similar instruments to the depository institution of first deposit;

(3) providing for direct return of checks and similar instruments to the depository institution of first deposit;

(4) providing for return of all checks and similar instruments through the Federal Reserve System's clearinghouse;

(5) extending limits for returns;

(6) establishing schedules for the availability of funds deposited by checks and similar instruments;

(7) prescribing the availability of funds deposited by checks and similar instruments based on the nature of the account to which the deposit was made or the nature of the account holder;

(8) the use of electronic means of collecting and returning checks;

(9) providing for check truncation;

(10) the establishment of an automated return system;

(11) charging a depository institution based upon notification that a check or similar instrument will be presented for payment;

(12) creating incentives for depository institutions to return unpaid items promptly to the depository institution of first deposit; and

(13) keeping the costs of any improvements to be implemented to a minimum.

(c) The regulation prescribed under subsection (a) shall become effective not later than 36 months after the date of enactment of this section. Each depository institution shall comply with the provisions of such regulation.

(d) The Board shall establish an Expedited Funds Availability Council (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") to advise and consult with the Board in the exercise of its functions under this section. The Council shall consist of—

(1) the Comptroller of the Currency or his delegate;

(2) the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation or his delegate;

(3) the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board or his delegate;

(4) the Chairman of the National Credit Union Administration Board or his delegate;

(5) two members of the Consumer Advisory Council designated by the Board;

(6) one representative from the users of payment systems services; and

(7) one representative from the providers of payment systems services in competition with the services offered by the Federal Reserve System.

The Council shall meet from time to time at the call of the Board.

AVAILABILITY OF CERTAIN FUNDS

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury shall by regulation require that funds deposited by a check drawn on the Treasury of the United States, which is first endorsed for deposit by a customer who has an established relationship, as defined by the Board, with the depository institution shall be available for withdrawal by that customer not later than the date when the depository institution is given provisional credit for that check or, if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, on the next business day.

ADMINISTRATIVE ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 7. (a) Compliance with the requirements imposed under this Act shall be enforced under—

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act in the case of—

(A) national banks, by the Comptroller of the Currency;

(B) member banks of the Federal Reserve System (other than national banks), by the Board; and

(C) banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (other than members of the Federal Reserve System and Federal savings banks), by the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(2) section 5(d) of the Home Owner's Loan Act of 1933, section 407 of the National Housing Act, and section 17 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), in the case of any institution subject to any of those provisions; and

(3) the Federal Credit Union Act, by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration with respect to any Federal credit union or insured credit union.

(b) For the purpose of the exercise by any agency referred to in subsection (a) of this section of its powers under any Act referred to in that subsection, a violation of any requirement imposed under this Act shall be deemed to be a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act. In addition to its powers under any provision of law specifically referred to in subsection (a) of this section, each of the agencies referred to in that subsection may exercise, for the purpose of enforcing compliance with any requirement imposed under this Act, any other authority conferred on it by law.

(c) Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this Act is specifically committed to some other Government agency under subsection (a) of this section, the appropriate State regulatory authority shall enforce such requirements.

(d) The authority of the Board to issue regulations under this Act does not impair the authority of any other authority designated in this section to make rules respecting its own procedures in enforcing compliance with requirements imposed under this Act.

CIVIL LIABILITY

SEC. 8. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, any depository institution which fails to comply with any requirement imposed under section 3 (other than subsection (e)), 4, or 6 with respect to any person is liable to such person in an amount equal to the sum of—

(1) any actual damage sustained by such person as a result of the failure;

(2)(A) in the case of an individual action such additional amount as the court may allow, except that the liability under this subparagraph shall not be less than $50 nor greater than $500; or

(B) in the case of a class action, such amount as the court may allow, except that as to each member of the class no minimum recovery shall be applicable, and the total recovery under this subparagraph in any class action or series of class actions arising out of the same failure to comply by the same depository institution shall not be more than the lesser of $500,000 or 1 per centum of the net worth of the depository institution; and

(3) in the case of any successful action to enforce the foregoing liability, the costs of the action, together with a reasonable attorney's fee as determined by the court.

In determining the amount of award in any class action, the court shall consider, among other relevant factors, the amount of any actual damages awarded, the frequency and persistence of failures of compliance, the resources of the depository institution, the number of persons adversely affected, and the extent to which the failure of compliance was intentional.

(b) A depository institution may not be held liable in any action brought under this section for a violation of section 3, 4, or 6 if the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error. Examples of a bona fide error include, but are not limited to, clerical, calculation, computer malfunction and programming, and printing errors, except that an error of legal judgment with respect to a person's obligations under this Act is not a bona fide error.

(c) Any action under this section may be brought in any United States district court, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation.

(d) No provision of this section imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or interpretation thereof by the Board or in conformity with any interpretation or approval by an official or employee of the Federal Reserve System duly authorized by the Board to issue such interpretations or approvals under such procedures as the Board may prescribe therefor, notwithstanding that after such act or omission has occurred, such rule, regulation, interpretation, or approval is amended, rescinded, or determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.

EFFECT ON CHECK ACCEPTANCE POLICIES AND OTHER LAWS

SEC. 9. (a) Nothing in this Act—

(1) prevents a depository institution, in accordance with the policy of such depository institution, from making funds available for withdrawal in a shorter period of time than is provided in this Act or in regulations adopted by the Board; and

(2) affects a depository institution's right—

(A) to accept or reject a check for deposit; or

(B) if a check for deposit and the depository institution has made provisional settlement with the depositor, pursuant to law to—

(i) revoke the provisional settlement given by the depository institution;

(ii) charge back the depositor's account; or

(iii) claim a refund of such provisional credit.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (a), the provisions of this Act or the regulations of the Board prescribed under this Act shall supersede the provisions of any State law which the Board determines to be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act or such regulation, but only to the extent of the inconsistency.

IMPROVING PAYMENT MECHANISMS

SEC. 10. Not later than one year after the implementation of any regulations under section 5 of this Act, the Board shall prepare a study and submit its findings to the Congress on the effect of improvements and changes in the payment system, including—

(1) the effect of the changes made by section 5 of this Act, and the advisability and feasibility of further changes;

(2) an assessment of improvements that can be made in the check collection system, including improved procedures for the return of unpaid items, reduction of costs, reduction in the number of returned checks, greater speed and efficiency in the check collection and return system, utilization of more efficient technology, and parity of treatment of depository institutions; and

(3) an assessment of the use of electronics in payments and of the need for improvements in the way the payments system provides services so as to insure efficient and affordable services, including the possible development of additional electronic services.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. Except as provided in section 5, this Act takes effect upon the expiration of twelve months following its enactment.

—On Page 18, line 15, add a new subsection (h) to section 5 as follows:

"(h) Sections 3(b), 4(c) and 4(d) shall not apply to a check if the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that the drawer or drawee of the check has become, or is about to become, subject to bankruptcy, receivership or similar proceeding, or when the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that a situation involving fraud or kiting exists."

By Mr. WYLIE:

—Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Expedited Funds Availability Act".

SEC. 2. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System (Board) shall immediately begin to develop a program with the goal of providing that with regard to deposits—

(1) funds deposited in depository institutions by items drawn on a local depository institution shall be available for withdrawal by depositors upon the expiration of one business day following the day on which such item was deposited; and

(2) for all other items, funds deposited in depository institutions shall be available for withdrawal by depositors upon the expiration of three business days after deposit. The Board may provide that such program does not apply to any item which poses a serious risk of loss to a depository institution.

(b) In order to achieve the goals specified in subsection (a), the Board shall consider (among other proposals) requiring, by regulation, that—

(1) each depository institution shall follow a uniform standard for placing its endorsement on items;

(2) each depository institution itself or through a third party shall provide wire notification directly to the institution which originally accepted for deposit an item in an amount of $100 or more, that the institution is returning the item unpaid to the institution of first deposit;

(3) each depository institution shall establish schedules for the availability of items deposited; and

(4) each depository institution shall provide for the direct return of unpaid items to the depository institution which originally accepted the item for deposit.

(c) Before a deposit account is opened, a depository institution shall provide a written disclosure to the potential customer of the policy of such depository institution with respect to the availability of deposited funds in accordance with regulations adopted by the Board. Such disclosure shall include the actual time periods before deposits made through different types of items will be available for withdrawal. Each depository institution shall also provide this information in writing to existing customers within thirty days of the effective date of this section, and at least annually thereafter. Any change in deposit availability policies or schedules, other than a change which expedites the availability of such funds, shall be communicated in writing to all customers before it may be put into effect.

(d) Each depository institution shall post in a conspicuous place in each office in which deposits are accepted, and at each automatic or electronic terminal where deposits are accepted, a notice which sets forth the information required to be disclosed in subsection (c) in accordance with regulations adopted by the Board.

(e) For the purpose of computing the amount of interest or dividends payable with respect to an interest bearing deposit account or a time deposit, a depository institution may not delay beginning to compute interest on funds deposited through an item beyond the date on which that institution receives provisional credit for that item, or if the provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, on the next business day, unless the computation of interest begins at a later date for all deposits, including cash deposits. Nothing in this section requires the payment of interest with respect to funds deposited through an item which is returned unpaid.

(f)(1) The Board may prescribe regulations to carry out this section. These regulations may contain such definitions, classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as the Board determines are necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section, to prevent circumvention or evasion of this section, or to faciliate compliance with this section.

(2) The regulations of the Board may require all disclosures, statements, and notices provided to be clear and conspicuous and in language that can be readily understood. The Board may publish model disclosure forms and clauses for common transactions to facilitate compliance with the disclosure requirements of this section and to aid customers by utilizing readily understandable language. Nothing in this section requires the use of any such model form or clause prescribed by the Board under this section. A depository institution shall be deemed to be in compliance with the provisions of this section if it uses any appropriate model form or clause as published by the Board, or uses any such model form or clause and changes it by deleting any information which is not required by this title, or rearranging the format.

(g) Each depository institution shall comply with the provisions of any regulations adopted by the Board under this section. Compliance with the requirements imposed under this section including regulations promulgated by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, shall be enforced under—

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act in the case of—

(A) national banks, by the Comptroller of the Currency;

(B) member banks of the Federal Reserve System (other than national banks), by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; and

(C) banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (other than members of the Federal Reserve System), by the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(2) section 5(d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, section 407 of the National Housing Act, and section 17 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), in the case of any institution subject to any of those provisions; and

(3) the Federal Credit Union Act, by the National Credit Union Administration Board with respect to any Federal credit union or insured credit union. Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements of this section is specifically committed to another agency under this subsection (g), the appropriate state regulatory authority shall enforce such requirements.

(h) For purposes of this section—

(1) the term "depository institution" means a bank, as defined in section 2(c) of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 as amended, an insured bank, as defined in section 3(h) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, an insured institution, as defined in section 401(a) of the National Housing Act, or an insured credit union, as defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act, or any other institution which accepts deposits and utilizes Federal Reserve System payment system services, as that term is defined in section 2(j) of the Bank Holding Company Act as amended.

(2) the term "wire" shall include telephonic communication; and

(3) the term "item" means, check, draft, negotiable order of withdrawal, share draft, money order or similar instrument.

(4) the term "deposit account" means an account in a depository institution on which the account holder is permitted to make withdrawals by draft or other item. Such item includes demand deposits, negotiable order of withdrawal accounts, share draft accounts, savings accounts, share accounts and money market deposit accounts, but does not include time deposits.

—Page 4, line 15 delete section 3(a) and substitute in lieu thereof the following new section 3(a):

"SEC. 3. DEVELOPMENT OF ENHANCED AVAILABILITY SYSTEM.

"(a) ENHANCED AVAILABILITY SYSTEM.—The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall immediately begin to develop enhancements to the funds availability system as a means of reducing the risk to receiving depository institutions from meeting the funds availability requirements of section 3(b) within three years."

—Page 8, lines 18 through 20 are amended to read as follows:

"(2) a depository institution knows or is advised of final payment for a wire transfer for deposit in an account at such institution,".

—On page 13, delete the dash in line 5 and delege lines 6 through 12 and substitute therefore the following: "shorten or lengthen any time period in sections 3(b), 4(a), (b), (c) and (d) based on its assessment of the potential impact in terms of risks and losses to depository institutions and costs and benefits to depositors of such time periods as they may be shortened or lengthened from time to time hereunder."

—On page 18, after line 14, insert the following new subsection (h) to section 5:

"(h) RESTRICTIONS ON UNREGULATED DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION HOLDING COMPANIES.—

(1) PROHIBITION REGARDING AFFILIATED DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS.—In the case of any depository institution which is an affiliate of an unregulated holding company—

(A) no account may be established in such depository institution by or for such holding company or any other affiliate of such holding company; and

(B) no check or other negotiable instrument which is drawn, made, or endorsed by such holding company or any other affiliate of such holding company may be accepted or otherwise handled by such depository institution for the receipt, payment, collection, or clearing of such check or instrument or for any other purpose related to any function of the payment system with respect to checks.

(2) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

(A) UNREGULATED HOLDING COMPANY.—The term "unregulated holding company" means any company which has control over any other company in the manner described in subparagraph (A), (B), or (C) of section 2(a)(2) of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 other than—

(i) a bank holding company (within the meaning given to such term by section 2(a)(1) of such Act), or

(ii) a savings and loan holding company (within the meaning given to such term by section 408(a)(1)(E) of the National Housing Act).

(B) AFFILIATE.—The term "affiliate" has the meaning given to such term by section 23A(b)(1) of the Federal Reserve Act. For purposes of the preceding sentence, such section 23A(b)(1) shall be applied by substituting the term "depository institution" (as defined by section 14(11) of this Act) for the terms "bank" and "member bank" each place such terms appear in such section 23A(b)(1).

—On page 18, line 15 add a new section 5(h) as follows:

"(h) DOUBTFUL COLLECTABILITY.—In accordance with regulations of the Board, sections 3(b), 4(c) and 4(d) shall not apply in instances where the receiving depository institution has reason to doubt the collectability of funds for a check (e.g. suspicion of bankruptcy of the drawer of a check, suspicion of fraud);".

—On page 19, line 11, insert after "Act" the following: "and to preserve the soundness of and prevent abuses of the payments system".

—Page 19, line 24 is amended by inserting after the first appearance of the word business the following phrase ", as determined in accordance with regulations of the Board,".

—On page 21, line 1, delete section 7 and redesignate all other sections accordingly.

—Page 24, lines 14 through page 25, line 6 are deleted, and the remaining sections of the bill are renumbered accordingly.

Page 33, lines 1 and 2 are deleted, and the rest of paragraphs of section 14 are renumbered accordingly.

—On page 25, delete lines 10 through 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to carry out the purposes of this Act. These regulations may contain but are not limited to such classifications, differentiation, or other provision, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, and in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this Act, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate or substantiate compliance therewith. In particular, such regulations may exempt from one or more of the provisions of this Act any class of accounts not primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, and not held by small business, if the Board makes an express finding that the application of such provision or provisions would not contribute substantially to carrying out the purposes of this Act and reports such finding to the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs and the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs."

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 21, 1986)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

In cooperation with the Andrei Sakharov Institute, we join with parliaments of a number of nations in observing the sixth anniversary of Dr. Andrei Sakharov's forced exile in a minute of silence.

Almighty God, as this final session of the 99th Congress begins we express our gratitude to You for the strong, wise leadership of Senator DOLE and Senator SIMPSON, Senator BYRD, and Senator CRANSTON. Thank You for the deep bond of respect, admiration and cooperation which they have built. Guide them in the heavy responsibilities of party leadership through these days when the impending national elections will require partisan loyalty and commitment.

We are grateful, Father in Heaven, for a political system designed to accommodate pluralism and diversity with the inevitable conflict and compromise such a process generates. In a national election year, when polarization is inescapable, grant to them special sensitivity as they walk the fine line between party politics and national welfare. Grant to them daily the resources of Your love, wisdom, and power and, as pressures grow, protect their families against discouragement.

We pray, Heavenly Father, for their faithful, hardworking staffs, so often under great tension, and their families who cannot escape such strain. Grant that they also may enjoy daily divine enablement and blessing. Strengthen all who are involved in the life of the Senate against the enervating forces which provoke alienation and fragmentation. In His name Whose love transcends all human division. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

A MINUTE OF SILENCE ON BEHALF OF DR. ANDREI SAKHAROV

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is appropriate that the Senate, joined by other parliaments throughout the world, pause for 1 minute of silence to mark the sixth anniversary of Dr. Andrei Sakharov's forced exile to the closed city of Gorky. This is one anniversary no one should be proud of celebrating. For close to 2 years, the Soviets have kept this Nobel Peace Prize winner isolated from direct contact with his family or independent Western observers.

We are very pleased that Yelena Bonner is receiving the best of medical care in this country and, of course, we wish her a speedy recovery from heart surgery. Unfortunately, we cannot necessarily say the same for her husband, Dr. Sakharov. The Soviets have turned a deaf ear to the outpouring of international concern and outrage about his treatment.

No government's behavior has been as shameful as that of the Soviet Union in their attempt to persecute Mr. Sakharov. I find it inconceivable that a country that signed the Helsinki Final Act could treat the Nobel Peace Prize winner in such a violent manner. The Soviets must understand that Andrei Sakharov is not only a citizen of the Soviet Union, but a citizen of the world community.

The Sakharovs have become the symbol of the continuing struggle for freedom in the Soviet Union—and to the Kremlin, that is unpalatable. Yet, how long do the Soviets expect they can keep the world community waiting for news of Andrei Sakharov's well-being. The Soviets may be able to silence his voice temporarily, but they will never be able to silence the expressions of condemnation by the world community.

I cannot think of a better way to build on the spirit of Geneva than for the Soviets to end the isolation of Dr. Sakharov and permit family members and independent observers to meet with him. Freedom for Andrei Sakharov, I am afraid, will not come automatically simply because we in this body desire it. It must be pursued by those in this Chamber, by other parliaments, and the world community at large—by every means at our command. To that end, this minute of silence is a symbolic display of our concern about this courageous man.

I thank the Chaplain.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each. I have used part of my 10 minutes and I will reserve the remainder of my time. We then have special orders in favor of Senators PROXMIRE and COCHRAN, and then routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Following the conclusion of morning business, the Senate will resume the Metzenbaum motion to proceed to S. 638, the Conrail bill. There could probably be an outside chance that we might find something we could take up later on this afternoon. I am not certain what may develop there, so I am not in a position to indicate that there would not be votes today. But I will try to alert Members at the earliest possible time.

As I understand it, we were looking at a drug export bill and maybe a sports franchise bill. But I doubt that we may reach those today.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished occupant of the chair, the President pro tempore of the U.S. Senate.

DR. ANDREI SAKHAROV

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, today is a sad day for all those throughout the world who cherish human freedom and religious liberty. It marks the sixth anniversary of when the noted Soviet physicist and human rights activist, Dr. Andrei Sakharov, was exiled internally to the city of Gorky by Soviet authorities.

One of the original leaders of the Soviet human rights movement, Dr. Sakharov was exiled in 1980 and kept under virtual house arrest due to his human rights activity, and perhaps, according to the Congressional Helsinki Commission, because of his criticism of the brutal Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The entire free world has been inspired by the courageous struggle Dr. Sakharov and his wife, Yelena Bonner, have continued to wage, since his exile, in defense of human rights in the Soviet Union.

We all know that the Soviets, after loud international outcry and the Sakharovs's own protests, recently issued a temporary exit visa to Mrs. Bonner to permit her to receive medical treatment in the United States. We wish her speedy recovery from her serious surgery.

Despite this temporary visa, and other decisions by the Soviets just before the Reagan-Gorbachev summit meeting to permit several Soviet citizens to join spouses in the West, repressive human rights conditions in the U.S.S.R. continue. Dr. Sakharov's continued internal exile amply demonstrates this fact.

Mr. President, when I led a bipartisan delegation of Senators to meet with General Secretary Gorbachev last September, I told the new Soviet leader—on behalf of myself and my colleagues, my colleagues having joined with me in the preparation of the statement which I made at that meeting—that human rights is a matter of critical concern to the people of the United States. I told him it was important to understand that Soviet human rights policies are serious obstacles to good United States-Soviet relations, because the American people know about, and care about, Soviet actions.

By observing this sad anniversary today of Dr. Andrey Sakharov's internal exile, the Senate will reinforce that important message to the Soviet leadership and underscore its solidarity with the cause of human rights.

AFGHANISTAN UPDATE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, December 27, 1985, marked the sixth anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The 6 years of brutality have not brought the Soviets any closer to their goal of securing their southern border. Indeed, more Soviet troops are in Afghanistan today than immediately following the invasion. We are told that Soviet casualties are higher today, because more of those Soviet troops are directly involved in the fighting. More Soviet resources are being expended to subdue the Afghan people today. But none of the increased money, materiel, or manpower is achieving the Soviet objectives.

Dramatic evidence of the Soviet failure in Afghanistan comes to us in an excellent series recently published in the Washington Post. These articles describe the current situation in Afghanistan after 6 years of unparalleled warfare against Afghan civilians.

I have shared with my colleagues the fact that I had a very direct exchange of views on this subject with General Secretary Gorbachev. We can all remain hopeful that recent signs point toward a possible solution to the Afghan war. The Afghan war is not yet Mr. Gorbachev's war. But I would temper that optimism with the understanding that any fair and lasting solution must return Afghanistan to the Afghan people in peace and dignity.

Lenin said that it was a dangerous thing to go into Afghanistan, and a difficult thing to come out of Afghanistan. So any lasting solution must write an end to the Soviet brutality that these articles describe.

I ask unanimous consent that this series of articles from the Washington Post of January 12 through January 16, 1986, appear in its entirety in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR RENDS FABRIC OF AFGHAN SOCIETY

(By James Rupert)

JERAGHTU-YE-WARDAK, AFGHANISTAN.—"It's shameful," said Abdurrahman, "That we cannot offer you, as our guest, any better food than this, but times are very difficult."

Gesturing, as he spoke, toward a dinner of bread, rice and a little meat spread on a cloth on the floor, Abdurrahman smiled sadly. A spry, bearded man of about 65, Abdurrahman is a leading elder of a tiny hamlet of 10 families near here.

With most of the village's older men, we sat in the best room of Abdurrahman's house, on cushions ranged along the four white-washed walls of mud and straw. Abdurrahman had guided me carefully to the best seat and had tucked the house's best pillow behind my back.

Traveling through southern Wardak Province, I had appeared in the village unannounced, with a small escort of mujaheddin (Afghan resistance fighters), and Abdurrahman immediately had asked us to spend the night at his house.

Before dinner, two boys from the family had brought the inevitable steaming kettles, asking, "Tor chai ya chin chai (black tea or green tea)?".

After six years of brutal, desperate warfare against the high technology and massed firepower of the Soviet Army and Air Force, Afghans such as the hospitable men of Abdurrahman's village can give a visitor the impression that, at its core, Afghanistan remains unchanged.

Despite the inescapable evidence of physical destruction—the gaping bomb and missile craters in orchards, houses and irrigation canals—Afghanistan's villagers, joking and talking softly at night in the dim glow of kerosene lanterns in their homes, suggest that the old and finely woven fabric of their society has survived untorn.

It is not so.

For all the Afghans' impressive resilience as individuals, and for all the binding power of their traditions, their social fabric is being rewoven by this war. It is happening in ways that are difficult for outsiders to see, and that leave even Afghans uncertain about the future of their society.

A month's travel in several southeastern provinces of Afghanistan, and several weeks of interviews in Pakistan with Afghans and others, indicate clearly that two important changes among Afghans since the Soviet invasion are a growing sense of nationalism and a new concern for politics.

Surrounded by deserts and the rugged peaks of the Hindu Kush, Afghanistan entered the 1980s as an isolated country of villagers and nomads, separated from each other by their mountains and by ethnic, linguistic and tribal differences.

As with many rural populations in the Third World, Afghans were largely unconcerned with the political activities of their country's elite in the distant capital and traditionally had rebelled against the government's efforts to extend its influence into the countryside.

Now, war has uprooted as many as one-third of Afghanistan's people, forcing them to abandon their homes and flee to other parts of the country, or to Pakistan or Iran, as refugees. Large sections of this insular population have been "instantly urbanized" in crowded refugee camps in Pakistan that hold between 2 and 3 million Afghans.

A NEW CLASS OF LEADERS

Six years after the Soviet invasion that linked the lives of common Afghans to the forces of world politics, even the uneducated and illiterate (the vast majority) appear newly attentive to political questions, both among themselves and internationally.

During my month of travel, Afghans frequently were eager to discuss politics at length—although usually all discussion stopped for the nightly BBC broadcasts in Persian and Pashtu, Afghanistan's main languages.

"Even if they're not used to thinking about politics, people who have suffered such terrible things start to ask why these things happen to them—and so they start to talk about politics," a young Afghan Moslem fundamentalist said.

And whether men like the hospitable Abdurrahman concede it or not—and many do not—their own authority as the traditional chiefs of this rural society is slowly slipping away into the grasp of men who represent an anomaly in Afghan history: young leaders.

In a country where, for centuries, men have wielded authority because of their age, religious training, wealth or lineage, a new class of leaders is emerging. Largely in their twenties and thirties, these men—the field commanders of the resistance—gather followers because they can successfully organize and lead a 20th-century guerrilla jihad (holy war) against the occupying Soviet Army.

Since early in the war, the young commanders have taken over battlefield authority from the traditional leaders. Now, such commanders are taking on civil authority as well, overseeing rural schools and hospitals and arbitrating local disputes once handled by traditional tribal leaders or landlords.

EVOLUTION OF A WAR

The weight and pressures of war—now longer and fiercer than anyone had expected—against a 20th-century superpower have bent and buckled the social traditions built by generations of Moslem farmers and shepherds in these harsh Central Asian steppes and mountains. As it has changed Afghanistan, the war itself has evolved also.

When the Soviets invaded in December 1979 to supplant Afghanistan's indigenous Communist government, there were widespread predictions that they would quickly crush the disorganized mujaheddin. But more than six years later, the military combat is more intense and more sophisticated. Soviet strategy has evolved to carry the conflict to new battlefields, aiming to destroy the resistance at its roots in the countryside and to capture the cultural identity and loyalties of the rising generation of Afghans.

Last winter, hospitals in Pakistan for Afghan war casualties remained full, as fighting continued through months that in previous years had provided lulls in combat. Since then, the two sides have fought some of their largest and longest battles of the war. Each has conceded higher casualities in the past year—an unusual admission for the Soviets.

In interviews, many mujahed commanders admitted difficulties in coping with new Soviet tactics, such as their dropping anti-guerrilla forces by helicopter onto high ground from which they can ambush mujahed caravans and attack bases.

The Soviets also have increased their subversion. They promote conflict among the many Afghan resistance groups and use Afhan agents to help them find and kill effective resistance commanders.

The evolution of the combat, and especially the loss of mujahed commanders, leads some analysts to worry that the Soviets may be gaining a battlefield advantage, which, while it does not give them hope of an outright military victory, may yet weaken the resistance and permit Moscow to reduce its costs in the war.

The Soviets attribute their higher casualties through most of 1985 to the mujaheddin's use of heavier weapons.

New weapons—many reportedly supplied by a covert CIA program—are arriving in Afghanistan, although many are lost through corruption along the pipeline.

Despite its changes, the military battle in Afghanistan remains much as it has been reported in the past few years by the few western journalists who have traveled inside. The mujaheddin, fighting with impressive courage and inferior weapons, are deadlocked with the technologically superior Soviets.

Although they control as much as 90 percent of Afghanistan, the guerrillas cannot dislodge the Soviet and Afghan government bases in the country's major towns. With their relatively light weapons, the mujaheddin can only try to harass such bases and their supply convoys, hoping to raise the Soviets' human and economic costs from the occupation.

The mujaheddin continue to lack not only heavy weapons, but also effective air defenses. More importantly, in the view of many mujaheddin and others, the guerrillas still need even basic training and do not really know how to use some of the weapons being supplied to them.

The concerns of resistance leaders and Afghan intellectuals now reflect the expansion of the war to its new battlefields, and the implications of these new fronts for Afghan society.

CHOKING OFF SUPPORT

Increasingly, over the past 2 years, the Soviets have tried to choke off civilian support for the guerrillas simply by emptying the villages of their inhabitants. This has been one of their most brutal campaigns, including killings of unarmed villagers, the destruction of farms and irrigation canals, and the mining of villages and homes.

In the small part of Afghanistan toured recently, both the breadth and the success of this strategy were clear. Local residents in 20 of 32 villages visited said they had been bombed, shelled or attacked by Soviet or Afghan government ground forces. Many pointed out unexploded bombs and destroyed homes.

The other 12 villages, in the Zermat region of Paktia Province, were eerily abandoned, with cratered paths, crumbling walls and doors open wide into silent houses. An independent human rights report covering much of the same territory said that half of 8,000 village households surveyed had been abandoned.

In this new battle for the survival of the villages, the mujaheddin are fighting back, but they are hampered by their lack of money and trained professionals.

"The jihad depends on the villagers, so we must keep them on the land," explained Amin Wardak, a guerrilla commander in Wardak Province. "So we try to provide medical care, we run schools, we try to help the farmers," he said.

Despite efforts like Wardak's much of Afghanistan's society of villagers has been transformed into a society of refugees, suddenly thrown into sprawling camps of tents and mud buildings in Pakistan and Iran. Other Afghans have fled their homes for safer parts of the country, notably the Soviet-controlled capital, Kabul.

It is largely among these suddenly urbanized populations that still another battlefield has opened, in classrooms and mosques, for Afghanistan's very culture.

In an apparent attempt to mold a loyal pro-Soviet elite to help run the country, the Soviets have remodeled the Afghan education system and have taken children to be brought up in the Soviet Union.

The Soviets also are reinterpreting Afghanistan's Islamic faith, and in the past year they have installed government-trained mullahs in many of the mosques under their control.

The Soviets govern only a small part of the population, a fact that limits their ability to redesign the country's culture.

But in the cultural battle, the resistance, too, is severely handicapped. Even before the Soviet invasion, Afghanistan was, like so many Third World and Islamic countries, struggling to establish its own national identity—and the resistance remains divided on what it means to be Afghan.

It was, in part, the cultural divide between Afghanistan's tradition-bound countryside and its modernizing elite in Kabul that led to the Soviet invasion.

During the 1960's and '70s, segments of the educated elite, including the tiny Afghan Communist Party, found their ambitions frustrated by the monopoly on power of the traditional monarchy and grew impatient at its slow pace toward western-style modernization.

From 1973 to 1978, successive coups by members of this elite, backed by the Army, led to the takeover by a group of homegrown Communists in April 1978 in the "Saur Revolution," named for the month in which it occurred.

The takeover surprised Moscow, which had been getting along well with the nonaligned government of Mohammed Daud. Both promonarchy traditionalists and Moslem fundamentalists began leading a jihad against Kabul.

The rebellion spread nationwide when the first Communist regime tried to force radical changes—such as mandatory classes in Communist doctrine, compulsory schooling for girls and an end to the bride price—on the nation's villagers. By Christmas 1979, with the first Afghan Communist ruler assassinated and the resistance growing in strength, the Soviets intervened with 100,000 troops and installed Babrak Karmal as president.

"Afghanistan can never go back to the way it was," said Mohammed es'Haq, a political officer of the Jamiat-i-Islami (Islamic Society) party. "The war has broken the two pillars—the bureaucrats and the landlords—which used to run the country" under the monarchy, he said.

NEW POLITICAL AWARENESS

Es'Haq and others believe that several of the social changes wrought by the war are helping to forge a new sense of nationalism and a new politicization. The resistance is now gathered into seven "major" political parties (those recognized by the Pakistani government) and numerous other factions.

Es'Haq regards the simple existence of large political parties as a revolutionary change. Although for many people in Afghanistan and in the refugee camps the parties are little more than meaningless labels, Es'Haq argues that they represent an unprecedented effort to appeal across traditional ethnic and tribal divides.

Virtually all Afghans interviewed agreed that nationalism is growing. "It's natural, with the war," said Najib, a French-trained agronomist who returned to organize agricultural development projects in Wardak Province.

Asking not to be identified further to protect family in Soviet-held Kabul, Najib said, "The Soviets have created the same problems for everyone, and people can't explain it by reference to old-fashioned tribalism. Instead, we see this war and our suffering through the lens of Islam."

As numerous scholars point out, Afghans traditionally have identified—and defended—themselves and their country in terms of Islam.

The Soviets are not the first outside power to spawn a jihad with an invasion of Afghanistan. Starting in 1838, Britain fought three wars in an effort to dominate Afghanistan and protect its Indian colony to the south.

"This war is completely different," according to Es'Haq. "The British weren't . . . trying to Britishize or Christianize our country, but the Soviets are trying to completely erase our identity—especially our Islamic identity," he said.

"Also, war itself has changed," he said. "The Anglo-Afghan wars did not affect the whole country at the same time. . . . No place in Afghanistan is escaping this war."

A broad range of Afghans agreed that, as a people, they had become more interested in politics—especially their own national politics—and that this was one of the most important changes in their country since the Soviet invasion.

"Before the Communists, people didn't care about the government in Kabul," explained Abdul Haq, a prominent mujahed commander in Kabul for the Younis Khales faction of the Hezb-i-Islami (Islamic Party). "The Afghan people used to accept any regime, as long as it did not make problems for them. But it's not like that now," he said.

IS THAT GOOD FOR US?

Shortly after a frosty sunrise on Nov. 22, in a village near here, several mujaheddin and I breakfasted with a small group of local men, while the voice of President Reagan, broadcast by the Voice of America, filled the room. Reagan was addressing a joint session of Congress following his summit meeting with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

My Afghan hosts listened to Reagan's speech and asked what he had said. Told that the two leaders planned to exchange visits, one man asked, "Is that good for us?"

The question seemed to symbolize a new realization among Afghans after years of war: that their own lives are tied to distant political events and to the world's opinion about their country and its plight.

Afghans also often asked about outside impressions of their country. Often, the answers disappointed them—as though, having taken a new interest in world affairs, they felt ignored in return.

As one young mujahed conducted a tour of his village north of here, he asked what Americans thought of the various Afghan guerrilla leaders. When told that most Americans would not recognize names such as Gulbuddin Hekmatyar or Nabi Mohammadi, he seemed surprised.

"But why not?" he asked. "We know who Reagan is."

SOVIETS TRY TO RESHAPE AFGHAN CULTURE

(By James Rupert)

BABRA KHEL, AFGHANISTAN.—Last month Omar brought his 8-year-old son from Kabul to leave him with relatives in a village near here; the little boy will not go back to the city.

"In Kabul the Soviets are taking the children," Omar explained.

Omar is now a city man. He moved from the village years ago to set up a business in Kabul. Even though life is better there than here in the countryside, he said, his son will stay here. In Kabul, the Soviets are taking children out of the schools and sending them to be brought up in the Soviet Union, he said.

"They are teaching the children to be Soviets, like them," he said. The Soviet authorities had started the practice, he said, soon after they invaded the country in 1979 to prop up Afghanistan's communist government.

Afghans and western specialists say the education of Afghan children in the Soviet Union is only one of many tools the Soviets are using to try to remold Afghanistan's culture along their own lines. Afghans say the Soviets are also manipulating Afghanistan's Islamic faith in their effort to "Sovietize" the country.

The Sovietization program takes on added significance with the apparent intensification of the peace process because it could allow the Soviets to leave behind a dedicated cadre of Moscow-trained communists when they pull out. It also complicates the return of the 3 million refugees in Pakistan—one of the requirements for a settlement—as they may not want to go back to a country that is under such tight control.

Seated on the floor at his brother's house, Omar's western-style trousers and overcoat contrasted with the loose-fitting clothes and blankets worn by his relatives and former neighbors gathered to hear him. Surprised to meet a foreign journalist, Omar spoke impatiently and urgently, asking me repeatedly if I understood his story.

But he was also afraid. "Please," he urged, "you must not write my name or the village's name in the newspaper—or we will be in danger."

Omar said that many children who had gone to the Soviet Union were those of Afghan communist party officials who he thought might have sent them willingly.

But, he said, "I know many families who did not know their children would be taken. The government sent people into the schools, and they took children away. The children's fathers only heard when someone came from school to tell them."

The teachers in the schools help the Soviets, and if people go to ask where the children were taken, the teachers will not talk to them, he said, adding that the parents afterward received letters from their children mailed from the Soviet Union.

At one point, leaning forward, he asked, "Do American people know about this?"

Western diplomats and officials of the Afghan Resistance Movement based in Pakistan also have reported similar stories.

A NEW SOVIETIZED ELITE

A 1984 State Department report said the Soviets began near the end of that year a mass program to bring up thousands of Afghan children in the Soviet Union. The children, ages 7 to 10, reportedly are to be trained there for 10 years in an effort to mold a new Sovietized elite.

Resistance commander Abdul Haq from Kabul said in an interview in Peshawar, Pakistan, that his resistance units have seen the first results of Soviet training of Afghan children. During the past 2½ years, he said, his guerrillas have captured about 15 boys who he said had been trained in the Soviet Union for missions against the resistance.

He described one incident last year in which resistance forces found a 12-year-old boy in a rebel-controlled village carrying a pistol and a photograph of a local guerrilla commander. He said the boy would not give any information until they staged his recapture by other resistance forces posing as Afghan government soldiers.

His name was Zalmai; he was the son of an Afghan brigadier," Abdul Haq said. "He told us he had been trained [in the Soviet Union] for almost 5 years, and now they had sent him to kill the resistance commander."

"He told us he liked his teacher more than his mother and father," Abdul Haq said. "What can we do with these children? We cannot kill them, but they are dangerous; so we can only try to keep them with us, and they mostly escape."

Since Soviet and Afghan authorities have closed Afghanistan to most foreign reporters, accounts such as Abdul Haq's cannot be investigated directly. But a broad range of diplomatic and Afghan sources say they are convinced that Soviet training is aimed at producing young Afghans with unquestioning Soviet loyalty.

REMAKING A COUNTRY

Afghanistan's war, which most observers initially thought would end in a quick victory for the technologically superior Soviet Army and Air Force, is now 6 years old—and both sides appear to recognize the growing importance of a new battlefield: the loyalties and cultural identity of the next generation of Afghans.

"The Soviets are using every tool they can find to remake this country in their image," said Prof. Sayd Majrooh, a former dean of Kabul University now based in Peshawar.

Various observers said the Soviets are using education—from kindergarten to the university level-cultural exchanges, religious institutions and the mass media to accomplish three main goals in Afghanistan:

Prevent the growth of nationalist sentiment by sharpening the splits among the country's many ethnic and linguistic groups and strengthening ties between northern Afghans and their Soviet ethnic counterparts.

Popularize a reinterpreted Islam more amenable to communist doctrine.

Build a new elite of pro-Soviet Afghans that would be free of the internal rifts that have paralyzed the current ruling communist party.

The ruling People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan has long been bitterly divided between two factions: the Khalq (Masses), predominantly urban, Persian-speaking and seen as more politically pragmatic, and the Parcham (Banner), dominated by Afghans of rural origin who speak Pashtu and are thought more ideological. The vendetta resembles a civil war, including assassinations and bombings, and hampers government efforts to establish full control, even over the capital.

Various Afghan academics and politicians in Peshawar said the Soviets' most important weapon in the cultural battle is education—notably education programs in the Soviet Union. Estimates of the numbers of Afghans who go there for study varied widely, although most suggested it might number about 6,000 a year.

Abdulbaqi Mehraban questions how well the Soviet education campaign is working. He studied veterinary medicine for nearly six years in the Soviet Union before returning to Kabul in 1981 and fleeing to Pakistan in 1984.

Mehraban said he believes most Afghan university students continue to go to the Soviet Union for the same reasons he did: the better technical education and living standards. "Many students also like it because you can get vodka and meet girls, unlike in Afghanistan, [and] you can stay out of the Army," he said. "When we had been there a short time, I was impressed, "People had jobs and weren't hungry."

"But after a year, I could speak good Russian and talk to people and found out that you can't talk about your ideas," he said. "Studying a long time in Russia doesn't make everyone into a communist."

REINTERPRETING HISTORY

Afghan exiles in Peshawar say the Soviets have been unable to consistently mold loyal functionaries for the Afghan regime with their university courses or training programs for adult Afghans. Not only do some Afghans—such as Mehraban—defect, but resistance groups say they place their supporters in various programs in both Afghanistan and the Soviet Union for technical training.

According to Majrooh and other Afghan academics, the Soviets have retooled the Afghan education system—installing Soviet teachers, a Marxist-Leninist curriculum and a reinterpretation of Afghan history that describes Russia as the historic friend of Afghanistan. Last March authorities replaced the French-style program for primary and secondary education with the Soviet system, including compulsory Russian-language study from the fifth grade onward.

Last year at a conference on education at Kabul's teachers college, most of the papers were by Russian professors, according to a program smuggled from the country. Abstracts of the papers stressed the need for a Marxist-Leninist orientation in Afghan education, largely to help overcome the influence of Islam on Afghan students.

Resistance leaders and Afghan intellectuals say Soviet radio broadcasts and publications aim particularly at Afghanistan's northern ethnic groups.

"We have seen increasing numbers of Soviet journals aimed at the Tajiks, Turkmens, and Uzbeks, and designed to show them how life is better for people of the same groups in the [neighboring] Soviet republics," said Prof. Rasul Amin, formerly of Kabul University's social sciences faculty.

Amin said he is especially worried that new programs to teach regional languages—Baluchi, Turkmeni and Uzbek—will lead to a deemphasis on Pashtu and Persian (called Dari in Afghanistan), which serve as the common languages among ethnic groups.

But for most Afghans encountered during a seven-week assignment in Afghanistan and Pakistan, the most angering and worrisome part of the Sovietization campaign is the taking of children to the Soviet Union.

"What will happen to these children?" asked Mehraban, the former veterinary student. "When I was in Kiev I had Islam and my own mind to help me understand what I was seeing—but these children will have nothing."

"They will be robots," he said. "And when they come back, the Russians will just use them, and the Afghan people will hate them."

HARNESSING ISLAM

"Islam is the key to Afghanistan's culture," said Akhtar Mohammed, a young university graduate, "so to change Afghanistan, they want to change our Islam."

"They" are the Soviets. Like many other Afghan intellectuals, Mohammed worries about the Soviets' efforts to harness Afghanistan's Moslem faith as a means of controlling the country.

In their campaign to reshape Afghanistan's culture, Soviet authorities have taken control of official religious institutions and are reinterpreting Islamic doctrine.

"The Soviets were very sophisticated about using religion," said Fazle Akbar, an Afghan journalist here. When the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in December 1979, Akbar was director of Radio Afghanistan.

The Afghan communists who took power in 1978 "were very anti-Islamic," Akbar said. "They walked into the mosques with their boots on and smoked cigarettes inside."

"The Russians had to teach them how to use Islam as part of their propaganda," Akbar said.

Rasul Amin, a former Kabul University professor who now coordinates an organization of exiled Afghan intellectuals, said the Soviets have stepped up efforts to control religious life in Afghanistan. Last year, the Soviet-dominated regime of Babrak Karmal established a Religious Affairs Ministry, which, Amin said, has two roles.

"The Soviets know they will never change the ideas of the older generation" of Afghans," Amin said. "So for them, the government just wants to appear benign." Amin and others said the new ministry had made a great show of painting and cleaning mosques, to demonstrate its commitment to the religion.

"For young people," however, Amin said, "they want to change the very idea of Islam." During the past year, he said, the authorities had removed many independent mullahs from their mosques, after having tolerated them since the invasion.

It has taken the government several years to train its own mullahs, Amin said, and only now are they emerging to take over mosques in the cities controlled by the Soviets and the government. "The independent mullahs had never opposed the government in six years," Amin said, "but the official mullahs are more reliable for the authorities."

According to Afghan intellectuals and political leaders here, the Soviets and the Kabul government rely on the new mullahs to help spread a "Sovietized" Islam that emphasizes the obligations of a believer to the Islamic community, but that omits references to belief in God.

Amin said the Soviets would prefer to limit the distribution of the Koran, as they have done in their own Moslem republics, leaving the state freer to offer its own interpretation of the Koran's teachings.

"They could not change the Koran because too many Moslems, even in the Soviet Union, can recite it from memory," he said.

Soviet and Afghan broadcasts argue that Islam as a religion is under attack from the corrupting values of western imperialist powers, from the "medievalism" of Iran's Islamic revolution and from Israeli expansionism. Adopting a theme of Moslem fundamentalists, Soviet propaganda for years has portrayed western aid workers in Afghanistan—especially women—as anti-Islamic and corrupting influences.

Last fall, when the Jamiat-i-Islami Party turned back a French medical team that included women, western aid workers feared the Afghans had succumbed to Soviet propaganda.

Jamiat-i-Islami leader Burhanuddin Rabbani denied that his party had stopped accepting women but he acknowledged that "we do have problems with the Soviet propaganda about the women."

But western aid workers from various regions of Afghanistan agreed that Soviet propaganda is combining with the influence of conservative Iranians and Arabs who play supporting roles in the jihad, and making the westerners' presence in Afghanistan more difficult.

One British nurse said she met Arabs from the Persian Gulf states and Syria while working last summer near Mazar-i-Sharif, in northern Afghanistan.

"They were very negative about westerners," she said in an interview here. "They said non-Moslems didn't belong in a jihad."

RAID ON A SOVIET STRONGHOLD

(By James Rupert)

GHAZNI, AFGHANISTAN.—"Watch!" whispered Mohammed Amin, pointing back at a Soviet Army post that we had crept by only moments before.

Amin's unit of Afghan guerrillas had just led me, slipping and stumbling, on a serpentine path through muddy streets, irrigation ditches and empty fields on the outskirts of this provincial capital. A cold wind was blowing away the clouds and rain that had blackened the night while we filtered cautiously through a double ring of guard positions defending the town.

We had passed less than 100 yards from one post and had clearly heard Soviet soldiers shouting orders to halt. Now, as the growing moonlight gave shape to the darkened neighborhoods of Ghazni that spread downhill from us, we heard the first few rifle shots as other guerrillas attacked the post Amin had indicated.

Then the night exploded.

The deep staccato of Soviet heavy machine guns and the concussive whump of mortar rounds drowned out the guerrillas' Kalashnikov rifles. Streams of glowing tracer bullets etched across the silhouettes of abandoned homes, and flares burst into harsh white light overhead.

"If we shoot one bullet at them," Amin said later, "they shoot 10 back at us, plus mortars—and if the helicopters can fly, they shoot rockets too. If we attack one post, they shoot from four or five posts . . . but they aim very badly."

The spectacle of Soviet firepower had punctuated a reconnaissance mission by Amin and about a dozen local mujaheddin (holy warriors, or resistance fighters) from the Mahaz-i-Milli, the National Islamic Front of Afghanistan, one of the smaller of Afghanistan's main resistance groups. They were choosing sites from which two nights later they would attack Ghazni's airport and the Soviet and Afghan Army garrison in the town's center.

I had asked to accompany the mujaheddin into Ghazni to try to understand something of what seemed an oddity: that outgunned and ill-trained men—mostly illiterate farmers and shepherds—have battled the powerful Soviet Army to a six-year standoff in Afghanistan.

Since their invasion, the Soviets have held Afghanistan's cities and provincial centers, with the support of the smaller and unreliable Democratic Republic of Afghanistan Army. The mujaheddin control the countryside and mountains, and each side remains unable to dislodge the other.

Ghazni, 78 miles southwest of Kabul, the capital, is an important center along the Soviets' main supply route to Afghanistan's south and west. The mujaheddin, who frequently exaggerate the size of enemy forces, said about 12,000 Soviets and not more than 4,000 Afghan Army troops are based there, with support from artillery and the garrison's helicopter base.

The mujaheddin, many of them former residents of Ghazni, live at guerrilla bases in nearby mountains and receive food and information from villages. During the last year, the Soviets have tightened defenses around Ghazni, as they have around all the towns and cities they hold.

Before, "we conducted our operations from within the town and went in both day and night," said Jalat Khan, 35, former shopkeeper who now commands a guerrilla unit of the Harakat Islamic Revolutionary Movement, another of the seven main Afghan parties. "But this year, they triped the number of guard posts around the city, so now we fight only at night."

Jalat Khan said that according to duty rosters smuggled out to him by sympathetic Afghan officers, two-thirds of the soldiers in each post are Soviet and one-third Afghan. "Even if the [Afghan soldiers] do not fight well, the Soviets need them because they know the local people," he said.

Agha Mohammed, 40, a former colonel in the Afghan Army, passed information to the mujaheddin until his activities were suspected and he was imprisoned in 1980. After a year in Pol-i-Charki Prison, near Kabul, he was released and immediately joined Mahaz-i-Milli resistence force. "Many officers who are still helping us want to come out to fight," he said. "Working from inside is very dangerous, but we ask them to stay as long as they can."

As with most resistence attacks on a Soviet stronghold, the assault I witnessed could not have altered the Soviets' fundamental control over the town. Only in a few cases during the war have mujaheddin threatened to capture a major town outright, an event that has led the Soviets to use large offensives to regain control.

The mujaheddin attack to inflict casualties and capture weapons. Weeks after the attack I watched, the mujaheddin, after receiving reports from their informers inside Ghazni, claimed to have killed 36 Soviet and Afghan Army soldiers and injured 29 and to have damaged government offices, the airport and the town's main military garrison.

THE ATTACK

Late one afternoon, we descended the ravine from the Mahaz-i-Milli guerrilla base to an abandoned village at the edge of Ghazni's plain. About 45 mujaheddin gathered to hear their commanders explain their plan: Three different groups would attack at once, firing missiles, mortars and recoilless rifles at targets in the town's center and the airport.

I was told to accompany Sanaye, a short, thin commander in his 30s, whose dozen mujaheddin included an English speaker.

As always during my month inside Afghanistan, I wore the same traditional Afghan clothes as did the mujaheddin: a long shirt hanging loose outside baggy trousers, a wool cap and a blanket. It had seemed an intelligent concession to wear my good American running shoes.

We crammed ourselves into a pair of Russian-made trucks, which had been driven out from the city, and spotters climbed on top to watch for the Soviets' much-feared helicopters. As we rode across the rolling plain toward Ghazni, the mujaheddin—most in their teens and early 20s, sang and clapped, like a high school band on its way to a football game.

On a dirt road near Ghazni, the setting sun cast a yellow light on the guerrillas as they climbed out of the trucks and prostrated themselves on their blankets in prayer. As the daylight faded, we crept toward the first guard post.

It was here two nights earlier that I had asked my translator, Mohammed Amin, what it was that the Soviet soldiers had been shouting. "They are calling 'Halt or we will shoot you' " Amin had replied.

Sensing my shock, he had added quickly, "Don't worry. . . . They cannot see us. They always shout this at night whenever they hear some noise."

I was not always calmed by such reassurances from my host. Although the mujaheddin fear and respect the powerful and sophisticated Soviet weapons, they have a low opinion of Soviet soldiers. That and their confidence in their own superior knowledge of the terrain often gave them a relaxed air that I, in my own nervous state, sometimes found alarming.

The mujaheddin were fascinated by my habit of whispering notes into a small tape recorder as we walked through the town. Often during moments of heavy firing, they would motion excitedly for me to turn it on to record the noise.

One young resistance fighter, perhaps 15 years old, particularly irritated me by periodically looking at me and gleefully shouting "Gherraaam!" in imitation of guerrilla shells hitting their targets.

At one point, in a section distant from guard posts, about a dozen of us walked together through an open area. I wondered aloud to one guerrilla whether we were safe in such a large group. What if the Soviets should be patrolling?

"There are no patrols," he answered confidently. "The Soviets are afraid to come out of their posts at night." If such assurances never quieted my fears, I did not, happily, see them proven wrong.

A RUINED MARKET TOWN

As towns go, Ghazni was always poor. Now it is a ruin.

A market town, Ghazni drew its life from its position on one of Afghanistan's few paved roads. Even now, its shattered neighborhoods betray its roots in the dry and difficult farm land that surrounds it.

Ghazni's dirt streets and mud-and-straw houses give it the air of an overgrown rural village rather than an urban center. But as in other towns and cities of Afghanistan where the mujaheddin and Soviets have fought with increasingly heavier weapons, most of Ghazni's people have fled their shell-torn and bomb-cratered homes, seeking safety in the villages of relatives or in Pakistan.

Still, amid the rubble of neighboring buildings and nightly firefights, people have stayed. At one point as we hurried away from a burst of nearby gunfire, we rounded a corner and almost fell over a toddler—wearing only a shirt, playing in front of his house while his brother watched, unconcerned, from the doorway.

During most of our time in Ghazni, though, we walked through what seemed an urban moonscape: empty shells of buildings, streets littered with an occasional skeleton of an armored vehicle, and oddly, an old Buick Electra, mounted on blocks, its windows shattered.

As we neared our first destination, the site from which Sanaye would launch his four Chinese missiles, we crossed a small field. To reduce the chances of getting lost, I usually tried to stay near the middle of our file of six, but now I had carelessly let myself fall to the rear.

When red tracer bullets flashed silently across our path, we dropped to the dirt. The sound of the machine gun that had fired them came seconds later, a reminder that bullets travel faster than sound, shattering my illogical, but comforting, assumption that I could rely on a quick reaction to the sound of gunfire to help keep me safe.

The tracers stopped. I crawled forward on belly and elbows to ask my escorting mujaheddin what we should do. When I had gone about 15 yards, I realized that there was no one to ask.

My panic at the idea of being lost was perhaps the only thing that would have convinced me to stand up into the now more dreadful world of silent bullets. I sprinted across the field into a narrow street, where, heart thumping, I found my escorts preparing to dash back out to search for me.

Minutes later, we joined the rest of Sanaye's group, which, carrying the heavy four-foot-long missiles, had taken a different route. In a still-inhabited pocket of the town, we stopped at a mosque where two days earlier we had calmly eaten dinner amid the thunder of gunfire and mortars outside.

Now, in the mosque's sanctuary, lit by a kerosene lantern, the guerrillas quickly screwed detonators into the missiles' noses and attached wires for the battery that would ignite their fuel. As they carried the armed missiles down an adjacent street, I climbed a roof to watch their flight.

The missiles, with a reputed range of four to six miles, are a recent addition to the guerrillas' arsenal—and apparently one of the products of increased U.S. spending on covert arms supplies to the mujaheddin. They are especially convenient in guerrilla warfare: they can be launched from the ground, their trajectory adjusted by stacking stones under their small wooden launching blocks.

With an odd ripping sound, the missiles leaped in pairs from the street. Two incendiary missiles hit in the darkened center of the airport, setting fires, while the two explosive rockets flew over their target entirely, each exploding with a muffled roar and a dull red glow in the hills beyond.

As guns from nearby guard posts began firing into the neighborhood, we hurried away toward Sanaye's next target. After a few minutes' walk, I could hear the rumble of generators powering the lights of the Soviet stronghold, now nearby.

Our pace slowed. We crept more stealthily now, through a maze of streets and buildings, to flatten ourselves against a long wall of packed mud. Sanaye climbed over and, after a few minutes, beckoned us to follow him.

As I threw a leg over the top and slid down the other side, it was clear that we were now in a darkened corner of the lighted Soviet-Afghan government compound. A few moments later, in a shattered mosque nearby, I whispered my question with a calm I did not feel: "Where are we?"

"Khad," a young guerrilla answered, pointing at one of several buildings in the brightly lit and deserted street in front of us.

Khad, a Persian-language acronym for State Information Services, is the Afghan secret police agency, operated under the direct control of the KGB. As the Afghan Army, ridden by desertion and full of mujaheddin informers, proved to be unreliable, the Soviet military has built up Khad as its most dangerous weapon against the resistance.

ATTACK ON THE SECRET POLICE

If the displays of Soviet firepower in Ghazni suggested their technological advantage in this war, it was Sanaye's attack on the provincial office of Khad that seemed to symbolize the mujaheddin's determined courage, which has prevented the easy Soviet victory predicted by many following their December 1979 invasion.

Pulling two Chinese-made land mines out of a sack, Sanaye smiled at me and asked, "You are not cold, are you?"

"The temperature has not occupied my mind," I answered.

Lacking the Soviets' ability to strike from a safe, long range with artillery or aircraft, Sanaye carried the mines out of the mosque's gate. It seemed like hours later when two explosions roared, apparently from the back of the Khad office.

From somewhere farther inside the compound, we could hear excited shouting in Persian. Mentally I begged the group to leave, certain that we would soon be discovered.

When Sanaye slipped back through the gate, I gratefully shouldered my pack to go, and almost cried out in anguish when he stopped to fire two rounds from a recoilless rifle at the Khad bureau. In immediate response to the bright flash, machine gun fire rattled back in our direction.

We sprinted with the others for the wall of the compound and heaved ourselves over. After a few minutes of bewildering twists and turns, we slowed to a walk in a street some distance from the garrison.

Wondering how it was that the Soviets had not seen us escape, I paid no attention to the soft whistle of the first falling mortar round. The explosion knocked me down and left my ears ringing.

We ran again, and needing no second lessons, I threw myself to the dirt like the others with the warning sound of each new shell. We followed a small teen-aged guerrilla who had lived in Ghazni until a few years ago and who seemed to know every street.

Leaving the mortar attacks behind, we gradually slowed our pace, back toward the edge of the city. Hours later, at about 1 a.m., we reached the trucks that would take us back across the plains.

Ashir, 23, a guerrilla from Kabul, was pleased: among the three groups of mujaheddin, no one had been killed.

"God was with us," he said.

DEPOPULATION CAMPAIGN BRUTALLY CHANGES VILLAGES

(By James Rupert)

BARAKAT, AFGHANISTAN.—Surrounded by rocky, snow-covered hills, this village is a man-made oasis.

Like all villages here in the harsh, dry lands of Ghazni Province, Barakat was founded around a reliable water source, and generations of villagers have slowly carved its sun-hardened hillsides into green fields and orchards. A villager insists that no one wants to leave Barakat. In Persian its very name means "Blessing."

But of about 1,500 residents before the war, villagers say between 150 and 200 have been killed. And with the fighting here getting worse, about a quarter of the families have fled to Pakistan, Kabul or to the villages of relatives.

During a month-long tour through southeastern Afghanistan, I found that the story varied in each village, but the general pattern was clear. Direct attacks on villages by the Soviet Army and Air Force, often assisted by Afghan government troops, are expelling farmers and shepherds who support the mujaheddin—the Afghan resistance fighters.

"The Soviets know the mujaheddin need the villages," one Afghan told me. "They want to kill the fish by emptying the water."

This remains a hidden war. With journalists legally barred from entering Afghanistan, it is impossible to be certain about most of what is happening here. But everyone—the Soviet authorities, the Afghan resistance leaders and the villagers of Barakat—agrees that the war and the suffering are growing. In large areas of Afghanistan, the Soviets and the mujaheddin are fighting a new kind of battle in the countryside. It is not a battle for physical control of villages, but a battle over whether villages shall continue to exist.

"This is genocide," said Michael Barry, an American scholar and human rights researcher who visits Afghanistan regularly. Barry and others worry that the widespread destruction of farms—plus three years of poor rainfall im much of Afghanistan—not only have forced out much of the population, but now threaten famine for those who remain.

Those who have left—nearly a third of Afghanistan's 16 million people—now live in teeming refugee camps in Pakistan and Iran. There, Afghan specialists say, their new environment already is changing Afghan society as a whole in ways that could lead to further instability in the region.

Whatever its ultimate effects on Afghan society, it was clear in the villages that the depopulation campaign has brutally changed the lives of individual Afghans.

In Barakat, "the Soviets bring jets, because they know we help the mujaheddin." Bismullah Kheir Mohammed, a resident, said. In October, the Soviets and Afghan Army troops staged a four-day sweep through Barakat and nearby villages, killing 20 people and taking 12 young men to serve in the Afghan Army, villagers said.

The villagers said the Soviets had entered the nearby hamlet of Gabrubr and killed Abdul Gul, 55, and Niaz Gul, 70. "They were just farmers," Bismullah said, "and they took their money from the house to keep the Soviets from stealing it."

"When the Soviets searched them and found the money, they stole it and strangled them. We found their bodies two days later, when the Soviets left," he said.

A young man from nearby Bedmoshk told a horrifying tale of Soviets who held a 14-year-old boy and slowly killed him when his parents would not pay a ransom. They tied him to a tree and beat him and stabbed him with a bayonet," the man said. "Finally they shot him."

Four members of the International Humanitarian Inquiry Commission visted Bedmoshk two days later and said they confirmed the torture and killing of the boy, among other atrocities in the area.

"Even one bomb is a disaster," said a young guerrilla, himself a farmer in Barakat. "It takes more than a month just to repair a bomb crater in a field. But these killings, for no reason, are the actions of animals. Who can know why they do such things?"

For the people of Pirangai, in Paktia Province, the horror of the war has come from bombings. In early November, they said, a Soviet jet thundered overhead and dropped two big canisters that exploded in midair.

The canisters scattered hundreds of small "butterfly" antipersonnel mines over the village, some of which were still there when I visited.

"We have heard about Soviet bombs that look like watches or toys," Sahab Gul, a shopkeeper, said. "So we always tell the children not to pick up strange objects."

Three children had hands or feet blown off by the butterfly mines, which are designed to maim rather than kill. A young boy, Wali Khan, said his grandfather had taken his 11-year-old cousin to doctors in Pakistan after the boy lost a hand and part of his face while examining one of the mines.

"We are ready to fight them if they come to us," said Gul, his voice quivering with anger. "But they want to make us leave by injuring our children." Few in the village have left, he said.

Invoking an Islamic conviction, he said: "It is better to be tortured in the jihad [holy war] and go to paradise than to live with our bodies ruined like this."

LEAVING FOR PAKISTAN

Of 32 villages I saw during my trip, none was untouched by the war. But even where villagers have recovered from such attacks, their lives remain difficult, and abandoning their homes for the relative safety of Pakistan remains a much discussed option.

Three years of meager rain and snowfall have dried up the weaker water sources in this and other regions of Afghanistan, leaving downstream villages in a virtual state of drought. Swedish doctor Johan Langerfelt, a member of the Humanitarian Inquiry Commission mission, said the group's four-week study last fall showed that irrigated farming production in Wardak, Ghazni and Logar provinces had dropped by as much as 80 percent. He suggested that only heavy snowfall this winter would avert famine in 1986.

An Afghan agronomist who surveyed much of southern Wardak Province last fall said he had found 70 percent of families living on bread and tea. "They are not even consuming sugar, which is a sign of extreme distress," he said.

In what many specialists regard as a "pre-famine" development, families have sold or slaughtered much of their livestock, which they could no longer afford to feed.

Even in the villages that have not been abandoned, most young men have left, making farming even more difficult. "It is dangerous for young men to stay," a village elder in southern Wardak said. "The Soviets may come and kill them or take them for the Army."

Many families have sent some of their sons to fight from nearby guerrilla bases and sent others to Pakistan or Iran to find jobs that will bring the family needed cash. Old men once retired from farming have gone back to work, tending as much of the land as they can.

The Soviet campaign to empty the villages has been uneven, but most intensive in Afghanistan's eastern half, according to Barry, who has researched the issue for human rights organizations and led the fall Humanitarian Inquiry Commission mission.

Barry said the Soviets systematically have created broad free-fire zones along the country's most strategic road, which arcs from Mazar-i-Sharif in the north through Kabul, to Kandahar in the south.

The Soviets have also depopulated areas along important resistance supply routes.

Following a resistance supply trail from Pakistan, my guerrilla escort and I crossed one such region, the plain of Zermat, south of Gardez.

Hiking all night to avoid helicopter attack on the exposed plain, we walked through the abandoned ruins of a dozen villages. Moonlight shone through the shellshattered walls of homes and mosques, and we had to watch our step to avoid falling into craters left where bombs had collapsed the underground irrigation system on which the region's fragile farm economy depends.

Amid the devastation, a few families stubbornly had refused to leave. Mohammed, a farmer and a resistance fighter, described how he and a few others farmed under cover of night to keep food and shelter available for guerrilla caravans passing through.

"The Soviets have done everything they could" to force the villagers out, he said. "Their helicopters shoot anything that moves—even a farmer hoeing his field or an animal grazing."

"If I could, I would go tomorrow to Pakistan like the others," Mohammed said, "but we must stay for the jihad."

Barry stresses the drastic scale of the depopulation of Afghanistan. His census last fall of 23 villages in southeastern Afghanistan showed, that 56 percent of the households had been abandoned.

The Pakistani and Iranian governments estimate that about 4.5 million Afghans have sought refuge in their countries, a figure Barry compares to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees' estimate for 10 million refugees worldwide. His voice rising, he asked, "Why don't people in North America pay more attention to this?"

THE LASTING SCAR

In the single room of a trailside teahouse crowded with mujaheddin, a French medical team of three women examined Hakam Khan. In the yellow glow of a kerosene lamp, a surgical scar, improperly healed, snaked across his stomach like a shallow trench.

Answering the doctor's questions, Hakam Khan explained that he had no idea what surgery had been performed on him when he went to a Kabul hospital last year with stomach pain. Now he was having trouble with the scar, and the French doctors, he said, were the only people around to ask for help.

The women had hiked 12 hours that day, crossing a mountain range. As soon as they had collapsed on the floor of the teahouse, mujahaddin had begun presenting their medical problems.

"It's always like this," Dr. Louise-Marie de la Mata said with a sigh.

In Wardak, as elsewhere in Afghanistan, it is only small groups of overworked French doctors who provide medical care for local residents. For resistance commander Amin Wardak, the volunteer doctors and their tiny hospital—sent by the Paris-based Doctors of the World organization—are a critical part of the battle to prevent the depopulation of the province.

Wardak's fledgling civil administration also runs schools and aids farmers.

"It is especially important to keep prices down," he emphasized. "We have arrested many government agents who came to the countryside to buy up animals and foodstocks at high prices—all to empty the country side of food."

Wardak and other commanders established rules to prevent speculation in limited food supplies and are looking for ways to improve production. A beginning agricultural development program involves an experimental farm testing new strains of wheat.

But the most significant factor keeping people in the villages in southern Wardak is that the Soviets have not applied the same degree of pressure as elsewhere. Without effective antiaircraft weapons, Wardak—like and commander—is unable to protect even remote villages from Soviet attack.

According to Barry, the "lack of air defenses places Afghanistan's resistance commanders in a dilemma: "Either they can fight and eventually lose their populations, or they can keep their populations, but by not fighting in that area."

'FORGING SENSE OF NATIONALITY

To the casual observer driving on the back roads of Pakistan near the Afghan border, it can be difficult to tell the better-established refugee camps from Pakistani villages. Both are built of mud bricks, using precious timber only as roof beams, and the people look much alike: turbaned men, and women draped in sheet-like burkas, with lace-covered "windows" for vision.

The difference is that the refugee camps are larger, often holding an many as 20,000 to 30,000 people. Many observers believe that this unprecedented concentration of Afghans, often including different ethnic groups—Pashtuns, Tajiks, Uzbeks, Hazaras and others—is helping to spawn a sense of national identity.

"When these camps first began springing up, even before the Soviet invasion, Afghans from different tribes and regions began to get acquainted," Prof. Rasul Amin, formerly of Kabul University's social sciences faculty, said. "Now we've even begun to see some of them intermarry."

The mixing of ethnic groups remains limited, according to Amin, because many camps are homogeneous, often with the populations of entire villages having moved intact to a single refugee camp.

At Kacha Gari, a large camp near Peshawar, refugees spoke about how their lives have changed.

"Here, there are so many children in school," one man said. How many, he was asked—75, 80 percent? He frowned. "No, not like that. Maybe one in four," he said.

Stephen Keller, an American professor who runs an education program for Afghans in Peshawar, said most of the new refugee children in school study for only about three years. He and many educated Afghans said that most average Afghans retain a long-standing indifference toward education—a sentiment that hardened into antipathy during 1978 and 1979, when Afghanistan's first communist ruler, Noor Mohammed Taraki, tried to enforce literacy classes and lessons in Marxism on the population.

Keller insisted, though, that even the limited spread of education among Afghan refugees represents an important change.

"To get an idea of where these people started, you just have to see that before the war, only 7 percent of rural Afghan men could read, and only 2 percent of women," he said, "and most of them were government functionaries."

The Afghan guerrilla war against Communist rule began in 1978, and the first refugees began gathering in Pakistan within months. Such long-term refugees, living in older camps such as Kacha Gari, chafe at their dependence and idleness over the years.

"This is not life; this is only passing the time," said Muhammed Yussuf, a middle-aged former farmer, of his seven years as a refugee. "Before, when I owned my land, I was independent. Now I can only find a little work as a butcher. We get rations from the camp, but no one wants to live that way."

For Keller and other observers, the frustrations of this growing refugee population—the world's largest—represent a potential threat to stability in the border area of Pakistan. "Whether they are educated or not, there is no future for the rising generation, either within the camps or in Pakistan, "Keller said.

Barry said he believes the camps favor the growth of Islamic fundamentalism among Afghans. "Fundamentalism is the wave of the future in Pakistan, and the choices made by the Pakistani establishment weigh heavily on the options available to the resistance parties," he said.

Barry warned that a sense of despair within the camps could embitter young Afghans, leading them to turn to terrorism. "I think we're going to see a Palestinization of the Afghans," he said.

ARMS FOR REBELS SIPHONED OFF—SOME PROFIT FROM HOLY WAR

(By James Rupert)

DARA ADAM KHEL, PAKISTAN.—"We can't show you the missiles here in the shop," said Gul, a Pakistani arms dealer, "but I could take you to where we keep them. Do you have money with you?"

Gul does not run an ordinary gun shop. His dimly lit single room opening onto Dara's only street was crammed with automatic assault rifles, machine guns and grenade launchers. The heavy barrels from disassembled artillery pieces lay jumbled up with boxes of ammunition and old bolt-action rifles.

But to see the best items, the Chinese-built 107-mm, surface-to-surface missiles, the customer must have money to show Gul (not his real name) that he is serious.

Gul would not say exactly where he and Dara's dozens of other arms merchants get the heavy weapons they sell, most of them Chinese-made. Instead, his suspicions aroused by the questions of my Afghan translator, he asked us to leave.

While the Pakistan frontier region is notorious for its indigenous arms-manufacturing, there is clear evidence that many of the weapons being sold in Dara—and other arms markets nearby—come from CIA-funded arms shipments meant for the Afghan mujaheddin or resistance fighters, opposing the six-year-old Soviet occupation of their country. Observers also believe China is supplying some weaponry to the guerrillas.

Last spring, U.S. congressional intelligence committees reportedly approved $470 million for covert military aid to the Afghan resistance for this fiscal year, and there were reports that Congress later approved a supplemental $300 million in assistance for two years, according to congressional and other sources in Washington.

But at best, resistance sources and military specialists say, the covert aid operation, administered by the CIA, lacks accountability and often delivers inappropriate arms. At worst, it may be losing substantial percentages of its shipments to corruption and contributing to a militarization of the volatile Pakistani-Afghan border area, which could ultimately help destabilize the United States' ally in the region, Pakistan.

THE ARMS PIPELINE

It is here, among the parched hills of Pakistan's tribal territories, that the pipeline ends. Dust-covered trucks roll into guerrilla bases along the Afghan border and unload arms to be cleaned and repacked on donkeys and horses for the trip into Afganistan.

Accounts pieced together from Afghans, Pakistanis and westerners said that the CIA secretly buys weapons—in China, Egypt and elsewhere—and ships them to the Pakistani port of Karachi and isolated points along the coast of Baluchistan, to the west. One source said shipments in recent months included 40 tons of Soviet equipment captured by South Africa.

Once the shipments have landed, Pakistan's joint military intelligence agency takes over, transporting them to the Pakistani military installations for distribution to the mujaheddin. Pakistani military personnel advise each Afghan resistance group when to go to a particular depot to collect arms and then notify police of the truck's route to the group's base to avoid searches along the way.

According to two westerners who visited different bases in recent months, up to 70 percent of the weapons were Chinese, along with some Soviet and Egyptian made arms. They included Kalashnikov assault rifles, rocket-propelled grenades, mortars, land mines and missiles—many of them the same models as those on sale in Dara.

Mujaheddin and western observers in Pakistan say Pakistanis and Afghans are stealing weapons along the arms pipeline.

Independent western observers believe the Pakistani military is diverting entire batches of weapons for Pakistan's own use. They say Pakistani police officers have been issued new weapons in recent years—such as Lee-Enfield Mark Five and Chinese-made SKS rifles—which had come through the pipeline.

A source close to the Pakistani Army denied the allegations, saying the rifles had come from old Pakistani military stocks.

Many mujaheddin alleged that Pakistani officers who run the pipeline are often corrupt, demanding bribes or a portion of the arms shipments, which they later sell.

"The worst thing is that some who are stealing are Afghans," said Ezim Wardak, a resistance official in Peshawar, Pakistan. "They call themselves mujaheddin but they are really businessmen, trying to make a profit from the jihad," or holy war. A guerrilla leader from northern Jozjan Province said he and other commanders regularly sold some of the weapons they received in Pakistan as the only way of paying the increasing costs of transporting the arms into Afghanistan—especially to its north west.

PAKISTANI CONTROL

A Pakistani military analyst insisted that Pakistan's Army was not diverting weapons. "Those chaps [the majaheddin] are a bit sore at us because we have certain controls over the weapons," he said.

Without giving details, the analyst explained that the Pakistani military often stores the arms, waiting for "the right time and the right groups" to distribute them.

Mohammed Es'Haq, a political officer of the Jamiat-i-Islami, conceded that some Afghan resistance officials are selling donated arms. Although his own party has an accounting system for the weapons, he said, "We don't have all the control we would like because we are guests here in Pakistan; we cannot run our own police force."

Es Haq and other resistance officials were reluctant to discuss the loss of arms from the pipeline, for fear publicity about the problem might prompt Congress to stop funding the operation. "It is better for us to get half of the weapons than to get none at all," said a guerrilla commander who asked not to be identified.

Despite the nearly universal allegations of corruption, it is unclear exactly how many of the CIA-supplied arms are being diverted. Different persons interviewed varied widely in their estimates and seemed to have little hard information.

Guerrilla commanders in Afghanistan, angry at having received few or no arms, argued that as much as 85 percent of the weapons are diverted, while Pakistani sources insisted that only a negligible amount is stolen—and only by Afghans, never by Pakistanis. In fact, the secrecy of the pipeline, and the fact that the weapons pass through so many hands, may prevent anyone—including the CIA—from knowing what percentage of the weapons is lost.

Noting reports that Congress authorized $250-$280 million to run the secret arms operation in 1985, a western military specialist who has traveled regularly in Afghanistan with the mujaheddin said, "These figures are completely out of line with what the mujaheddin are seeing."

Formally, Pakistan denies the very existence of the arms-supply operation. But Pakistani officials admit openly that they are worried about the heavy flow of arms into the tribal territories where the pipeline ends.

In the latest episode of a historical tussle between Afghanistan and Pakistan for the loyalties of the Pushtun (or Pathan) tribes that straddle their border, the Afghan government has armed dissident tribesmen from the Pakistani side and encouraged them to oppose the mujaheddin and the Pakistani government.

In early December, Pakistan sent thousands of troops into the Khyber district to crack down on the Kabul-supported dissident tribesmen and seize what it claimed were more than a thousand Kalashnikov rifles and other weapons.

Western diplomats and others contend Pakistan's claim that the arms that flood markets such as Dara—and the homes of Pushtun tribesmen—are all sent by Kabul. "Why would the Afghans be sending Chinese arms, and where would they get them?" a western analyst in Islamabad asked.

So many weapons have poured into the area since 1980, when the CIA operation began, that the market price of a Chinese-made Kalashnikov has fallen by more than a third. The flow of arms has seeped into other areas; tribesmen in Baluchistan, bandits in southern Sind Province and even Sikh extremists in the Indian city of Amritsar have been reported using guns from the CIA pipeline.

"The Americans and Parkistanis could tighten the accountability of their operation. They could mark the arms when they ship them in, and then seize them when they turned up in the bazaars," said a western military specialist on Afghanistan. "They would be able to trace the diversion to its sources."

Many rebel commanders and others agreed with Shah Mohammed, a guerrilla chief from Logar Province who argued that outside arms donors should bypass the Afghan political parties and deliver the aid directly to proven commanders inside Afghanistan, as do many European organizations offering humanitarian aid. Afghan political leaders traditionally have distributed largesse to their clients and supporters as a way of gaining influence—a habit that party leaders have continued during the war.

"The parties—some more than others—distribute the weapons to get political influence rather than according to the military needs of the jihad," Mustafa Wardak, a commander in Ghazni Province said.

The concerns about Pakistani and Afghan corruption are not limited to military aid. Officials of private aid organizations in Peshawar express misgivings about a new U.S. Agency for international Development humanitarian aid program preparing to spend $15 million this fiscal year on projects inside Afghanistan.

Like the military pipeline, the humanitarian aid operation will channel its funds exclusively through the Pakistani authorities and the Afghan political parties—a structure that aid workers say invites corruption and inefficiency. The aid official questioned whether the necessary infrastructure exists inside Afghanistan to spend the AID money efficiently, which dwarfs their private efforts.

AID has not yet released details on how it plans to spend the money, but one western source in Islamabad, Pakistan, dismissed the aid workers' fears, saying AID was planning "some creative new ways" to use the money in helping the mujaheddin.

CAN YOU READ THIS?

In the narrow ravine of their guerrilla base, the mujaheddin pried open wooden crates containing the Chinese missiles they would fire that night at Soviet positions in Ghazni. Inside one of the crates they found a sheet printed in Chinese and covered with tables of figures.

As he examined it, a guerrilla said, "I think it is information on how to launch the missiles." Suddenly, his face brightened, and smiling, he handed the paper to a Japanese photographer who had come to cover the war.

"Can you read this?" he asked.

The incident symbolized what many mujaheddin regard as one of their most basic problems in this war: their lack of technical information and training in how to use their weapons.

Whatever its problems with corruption on the Pakistani side of the border, the CIA's arms pipeline has succeeded in delivering the heaviest and most sophisticated weapons the resistence has had during its six year battle against the Soviets.

"Unfortunately, these weapons are coming to men who are illiterate peasants . . . and they are not being taught how to use them," said an American military specialist who has traveled with the mujaheddin.

At the few drab restaurants and hotels in Peshawar favored by foreign visitors, western journalists and others who have accompanied the mujaheddin inside Afghanistan recount stories about guerrillas firing missiles without detonators, planting land mines upside down and—one of the most consistent observations—wasting ammunition in small and ineffectual attacks on Soviet posts.

"Most of the mujaheddin . . . find the range [with a mortar] by setting it up, firing off a few rounds and tinkering with it," said Peter Jouvenal, a British documentary film maker who has covered the war since it began. "By the time they're ready to hit the target, they've run out of ammunition."

"If the CIA or anyone else were serious about helping the Afghans, they would be training them," one military analyst said, "westerners have this idea that the Pathans [the largest Afghan ethnic group] are natural fighters, and to an extent that's true," he said, "but you cannot expect a farmer to aim a modern missile with his instincts."

Several sources said the Pakistani Army had run—and apparently stopped—a small-scale training program for the mujaheddin, in addition to rudimentary training by the parties based in Peshawar.

Several military observers said the delivery of even simple forms of aid to the mujaheddin could be dangerous to the guerrillas in the absence of training. One described mujaheddin who received radios but who knew nothing about codes and broadcast their movements to each other in plain language.

Military specialists who have traveled with the mujaheddin argued that training would not only improve how the guerrillas handle their weapons but would help overcome divisions among guerrillas of different parties and regions, and improve their cooperation in the field.

Many, but not all, commanders agreed on the need for training. Several commanders from the fundamentalist Hezb-i-Islami faction of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar argued that military training, like secular education, was of relatively minor importance, next to the religious faith of the mujaheddin.

"It is the man and his faith which fights," said Shamsuddin, a former medical student now commanding a Hezb-i-Islami guerrilla group in Kunduz Province, in the north. "If training were most important, the Soviets would have beaten us long ago, because they have training and we do not," he said.

AIR DEFENSES CRITICAL

"We heard you are an American," the middle-aged guerrilla said. For 40 minutes, he and a companion had sat silently, on the floor of the teahouse, watching closely as I scribbled notes from the day's long hike.

That now finished, the men explained their request:

"When you go back to America," one asked politely, "could you send us some air defense?"

Although the question sounded odd to an American reporter, for the two Afghans it was both serious and urgent. Indeed, during a month inside Afghanistan, numerous guerrillas stressed that their greatest need in military aid is a defense against the Soviet jets and helicopters that attack their supply caravans and support commando raids against them.

The mujaheddin have little effective air defense, relying on heavy machine guns and a limited number of Soviet-made SA7 missiles. Virtually all the mujaheddin encountered disagreed with the conclusions of a December State Department report that said that resistance air defenses had improved with growing numbers of surface-to-air missiles and reduced the effectiveness of Soviet air power.

The most important recent change in the air war, according to Kabul area commander Abdul Haq and others, is that the Soviets now use more helicopters, especially in commando operations.

"They used to send in seven or eight helicopters in an attack, but now they might send 20," he said. The mujaheddin have responded, he said, by offering smaller targets. "We have to move our supplies at night, we use smaller caravans—maybe with 20 camels instead of a hundred."

Many mujaheddin believe that more and better missiles are the answer. And in Washington last fall, intelligence sources were quoted as saying the Reagan administration was considering supplying sophisticated portable antiaircraft missiles, such as the British blowpipe system.

"The U.S. must be careful about listening to missile requests," a western military analyst said in Peshawar. "The mujaheddin see solutions to their problems too easily in sophisticated hardware."

The analyst said that much of the reason for the guerrillas' disappointment in the antiaircraft missiles was their lack of training.

He suggested that simpler weapons, such as Soviet wire-guided missiles would be easier for the mujaheddin to learn to use.

"If they're thinking of sending in even more sophisticated weapons, without any training program, I wonder if they really know who they're dealing with," he said.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve my 5 minutes throughout this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

SENATOR KASTEN'S WEDDING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am happy to see my distinguished and handsome Wisconsin colleague presiding over the Senate this morning, and freshly back from his honeymoon.

I congratulate him officially in the RECORD on his marriage. He has obviously married a most beautiful and attractive wife.

I think he deserves all of our credit, and best wishes for a very happy married life.

THE WASHINGTON POST ON TARGET ON CUTTING THE DEFICIT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is a rare occasion, as far as this Senator is concerned, that I can almost wholeheartedly approve of the recent editorial in the Washington Post. I had that happy experience this morning. The lead editorial in the Washington Post was an excellent editorial.

The Congress urgently needs constructive suggestions on how to reduce the deficit, and the Washington Post comes up this monring with one of the best this Senator has seen in a long, long time. In the lead editorial, the Post called for some powerful but essential cuts in domestic programs. That may surprise a lot of people. It is not quite the Washington Post style to call for cuts in domestic programs. But they do.

They favor ending revenue sharing, finishing off the Economic Development Administration. They would kill a program I authored back in the seventies: the urban development action grant, or UDAG Program. And it should be killed. They would knock off the Small Business Administration. They miss a few other targets. We could save $5 billion over the next few years by a 1-year moratorium on assisted housing. We could take at least $1 billion by 1987 out of the farm program. We can and should end Amtrak.

Mr. President, this is particularly helpful for a paper which I understand has opposed the Gramm-Rudman bill, which I supported. But I think if you are going to oppose the Gramm-Rudman bill, then you ought to come up with some specific cuts. They do that. By and large, the Post has proposed the right kind of reductions in the domestic side of the budget.

They observe properly that these reductions fall far short of the $70 or $80 billion of reductions we must find between now and fiscal year 1987 that begins next October 1. The Post takes it much too easy on defense. We can and should end star wars, the MX, the B-1. Stealth makes much more sense. The Pentagon is woefully topheavy in headquarters staff.

We do not really have to go all the way with a 600-fighting-ship Navy. But the actual economies available in defense are—as the Post points out—not great. This unfortunately is not a Sunday school world. We need a strong defense that will continue to require heavy spending. Sure, arms control negotiations could significantly ease that burden. But in spite of the big talk by Gorbachev and Reagan, such a consummation is very likely years away, probably well after the Reagan administration leaves office.

The Post rightly argues that all this means that a responsible fiscal course absolutely requires a tax increase of one kind or another. None of this will make 1986 a happy year politically. But there is a growing feeling in the country that the huge and continuing deficit represents a terrible future threat that will bring an enormous debt burden, rising interest rates and a curl-your-hair inflation unless the Congress acts and acts now. The country is politically right for both budget cuts and tax increases.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the lead editorial from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 22, 1986]

THE BUDGET SOLUTION

Certainly it's possible to cut the federal budget further. And it's necessary. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings machinery is now in gear, and the budget that President Reagan proposes to Congress in February will probably call for more than $60 billion in deficit reductions next year. He apparently intends to take nearly all of it from that one-third of the budget that is neither defense, interest nor Social Security and Medicare. Within that one-third, there are still programs—most of them survivors from less straitened times—that could indeed go.

For one example, general revenue sharing can be allowed to pass into history—as Congress acknowledged in the reconciliation bill that it didn't quite pass in December. For another example, the Economic Development Administration, offering additional grants to state and local governments, would not be greatly missed. Nor would UDAG, the urban development acting grant program; it supports cities' renewal plans, frequently for projects that might better find commercial financing. The president was right last year to call for an end to the Small Business Administration, and no doubt he will call for it again. The question is not what's desirable but, in a year of severe constraint, what's indispensable. The list of dispensables could be carried to greater length.

But when you add it all up, you are not going to come up with a great deal of money. Even pressing all the limits, it's hard to see as much as $15 billion in legitimate and plausible budget cuts here for next year. After all, this most vulnerable one-third of the budget has been reviewed repeatedly by the budget-balancers, beginning in the Carter administration. It is ground that has been raked over and over. That part of the budget currently comes to about $320 billion, and since the beginning of the Reagan administration it has sustained more than $60 billion in cuts. If cutting goes much further in this area, it will begin to erode the ability of the government even to carry out the basic public functions necessary to keep itself operating effectively—to collect the taxes, enforce the laws, administer justice and the rest.

And while some parts of the budget can still be reduced, some other parts of it ugently need to be expanded. The poorest one-fifth of the American people are living in privation that has greatly increased in recent years, and half of that one-fifth are children. Their condition stands as evidence that cuts in family support, nutrition and health outlays have already gone too far.

That's why no part of the budget should be considered off limits. Although Mr. Reagan has adamantly refused to consider it, Social Security can be trimmed without injustice to recipients. Congress has moved a couple of times toward postponing or diminishing the cost-of-living adjustments. That's a bad idea, for the impact would fall equally on the poorest and the wealthiest of recipients alike. But how about taxing Social Security a bit more broadly? Half of Social Security benefits are now taxable above a certain income threshold—$32,000 a year, in the case of a couple. Why not abolish that threshold? If the same sound principle were applied to unemployment compensation and workers' compensation as well, all together it would raise $4 billion next year and much more in the years beyond. But all of that would still leave the total deficit reduction far less than half of the huge amount required by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

As for defense, it's possible to debate whether the Pentagon is spending its money on precisely the right things. It's reasonable to say that defense spending is adequate for present circumstances and may not require any further increase in real terms—that is, after inflation. But cutting the defense budget would be altogether unwise. Another way will have to be found to get the deficit under control.

There is only one other way: to raise taxes. A tax increase is now mandatory. It needs to be very large—in the range of $150 billion a year, phased in over the next several years. It does not have to be big enough to reduce the federal deficit to zero, least of all with the unemployment rate still hovering around 7 percent. But it has to be big enough to bring the deficit down rapidly, convincingly and permanently.

Over the months ahead, a simple test will distinguish serious budget strategy from posturing. Any serious strategy will require a tax increase sufficient to pay for national defense, social progress and the other public responsibilities that Americans want their federal government to uphold. Any budget plan that omits that tax is not serious. The arithmetic permits no detour around that reality.

There is a way out of the dangers into which the continuing gigantic budget deficits have brought the country. But there is only one way, and to take advantage of it President Reagan and Congress will have to move rapidly and forcefully.

IS STAR WARS WORTH THE COST?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, we have the soaring, exploding, sky's-the-limit cost of this Star Wars Program. Here is a project that costs so much the experts cannot even give us an estimate. We know we will spend more than $2.7 billion on beginning research in the current fiscal year. That is the year beginning October 1, 1986, the 1987 fiscal year. We know that over the next 5 years, the research cost alone will reach $25 billion on this strategic defense initiative before we buy or deploy the hardware. The former Under Secretary of Defense, Secretary DeLauer, who championed this program, warned us that the cost would stagger us. How much will it cost? Estimates by SDI supporters range from $400 to $900 billion. Critics say it will cost well over $1 trillion.

Do you think that is bad? The latest reports are worse. The congressional Office of Technology Assessment tells us that we will have to revive our vanished air defense to supplement this program. Former Secretary of Defense Schlesinger has estimated that particular revival alone will cost at least $50 billion a year in current dollars to produce, deploy, and maintain the look-down, shoot-down capacity necessary to have any chance to stop the bombers, and especially the cruise missiles, that would shoot in under the SDI defense. Those cruise missiles can strike today with the force of 150,000 tons of TNT. Currently, we are defenseless against them. There is no assurance that even $50 billion a year would provide an effective defense.

And now we are told that SDI will need a full-scale civil defense program. Who can estimate the cost of building the underground shelters? How many shelters would this vast country need? One for each of our tens of millions of households? Could we evacuate our cities even with an all-out program that carried no cost limit? And if we could, what would happen to the millions of people pouring into the countryside to confront the real possibility of a nuclear winter? What civil defense could we construct against temperatures that plunged 45 degrees below normal? How could we begin to cope with an environmental disaster that would destroy food production throughout the world for 1 year or more? What would be the cost of a civil defense system designed to meet all these exigencies that would accompany a nuclear war fought under the umbrella of a star wars defense?

Mr. President, let me make it clear that if the star wars anti-missile defense could prevent a nuclear war or even measurably increase the likelihood this country could avoid a nuclear war, this Senator would gladly vote for the taxes and the appropriations necessary to buy the SDI research, the hardware, the deployment, the air defense against bombers and cruise missiles and the civil defense necessary to supplement the SDI. But why should any Member of this body vote to spend these immense sums when the best evidence indicates that SDI will not lessen the likelihood of nuclear war? On the contrary, this is shocking, but star wars defenses will surely increase the prospects of nuclear war. Why? Here is why: We cannot escape the grim fact that if both sides have an SDI or missile defense, the side that strikes first will win a tremendous advantage.

Can anyone deny the compelling fact that the success of the antimissile defense depends on somehow reducing the number of offensive missiles in the adversary's arsenal? This is precisely why, with the advent of the Antiballistic Missile Treaty, deterrence of nuclear war became the true peacekeeper. Why do both Mikhail Gorbachev and Ronald Reagan so emphatically agree that under present circumstances, a nuclear war must never be fought and can never be won? It is because both superpowers now recognize the utter, certain, and total catastrophe of nuclear war without antiballistic missile protective shield. Then, what do we buy when we get that protective SDI shield? What do we receive for the literally trillions of dollars of expenditures? We get a far more dangerous world than we had before.

Mr. President, we cannot find the answer to peace and security in this nuclear world by building more weapons. This is true whether those weapons are offensive or defensive. We cannot buy security and safety. For the first time in the world's history, we cannot, with all our marvelous technology and our superb economy, find salvation in offensive or defensive military strength alone. So where does our salvation lie? It lies in arms control. It lies in negotiating an agreement with the other superpower. Does that mean we approve or trust the Soviet Union? Of course not. It means we have to understand that no matter how aggressive they are, no matter how seriously their ideology erodes human freedom, the Soviet Union has the same yearning to survive that the United States has. The Soviet leader has clearly expressed the same understanding of the totally destructive consequences of a superpower nuclear war as our President.

We do not have to worry about the honesty or sincerity of the Soviet leader, we only have to be concerned over his understanding of the power of the U.S. 10,000 strategic nuclear warheads and of the sure destruction that follows from knowing that the Soviet leader understands, as an absolute certainty, that the United States has the capability of delivering that awesome destructive power on the Soviet Union. On the other hand, Secretary Gorbachev does not have to trust the American Government to agree not to institute an attack. He knows that we understand that any nuclear attack on the Soviet Union by the United States would provoke a retaliation that would utterly destroy this country.

Given this situation, what purpose does arms control serve? Can both superpowers simply rely on the nuclear standoff continuing indefinitely? In the words of Churchill at the dawn of the nuclear age; "Safety was the twin child of terror." Why not keep it that way? The answer is that we cannot. Not without an arms control treaty like the ABM that prevents the superpowers from building a defensive system that could permit a preemptive first strike from so decimating the offensive arsenal of the adversary that star wars or SDI just might permit the attacking nation to become the lone survivor of an all-out, superpower exchange.

So, Mr. President, arms control is essential to peace in the nuclear world because it stops or freezes the dynamic technological momentum that, without arms control, will push both superpowers out of their deterrent stalemate into a nuclear first strike that could win world domination. Arms control can enable us to achieve peace without the colossal burden of military spending that such projects as star wars and their accompanying air defense and civil defense supplements would require.

We have a choice. We can ignore arms control. We can forget about agreements with the Soviet Union. We can rely on building bigger and better and more devastating offensive and defensive nuclear weapons than the Soviet Union. In the process, we will literally spend trillions. We will also greatly increase the prospect of nuclear war. Or we can negotiate an agreement to end the arms race with the Soviet Union. We can reinforce such an agreement with the strongest possible verification we can negotiate and pour our scientific resources into refining and improving the verificiation technology. We can further buttress the agreement with constant and aggressive reliance on the Standing Consultative Commission, promptly challenging any and every Soviet violation of the agreement. Finally, we can make it absolutely clear to the U.S.S.R. that if they do violate the agreement in any militarily significant way and refuse to stop the violation, we will renounce the treaty and resume the arms race that will be to the serious disadvantage of both nations.

Certainly there is no sure, risk-free panacea for peace in this troublesome nuclear age. We need both military strength and vigorous arms control. Military strength alone is not enough. Arms control can never eliminate a heavy burden of military preparedness. The two can and must work together. Without military strength, arms control becomes a beautiful but empty, idealistic dream. Without arms control, military strength leads us down the road to national bankruptcy and a far more dangerous world.

THE MYTH OF THE DAY: WELFARE RECIPIENTS ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR MEDICAID'S HIGH COSTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that the cause of medicaid's cost explosion can be traced to the excessive use of health care services by AFDC recipients.

While medicaid was enacted in 1965, it faced a troubled infancy as the States and the District of Columbia struggled to implement this new program to provide health care for the poor. So, it was not until 1972 that the Federal Government was able to gather and monitor statistics on medicaid enrollment and costs. At that point, medicaid cost $6.3 billion and covered 17.6 million persons. A decade later, medicaid coverage expanded to 22 million Americans and cost a whopping $30 billion. The program had grown at an annual compound rate of 16.9 percent. By contrast, Federal revenues grew at a compound rate of only 11.7 percent and State revenues grew at a slightly lower rate of 11.4 percent. So, it is clear that medicaid's rapid rate of growth has quickly been outstripping the ability of the Federal and State governments to meet its bills.

In my own State of Wisconsin, medicaid is now a billion dollar program with the Federal Government meeting 57 percent of its cost.

The tremendous rate of growth in medicaid has led many to conclude that this explosion in costs can be laid at the doorstep of the AFDC welfare population.

And they are dead wrong. Let us look at the numbers.

In 1982, the AFDC population made up 69 percent of the 22 million Americans eligible for medicaid, yet they were only responsible for 26 percent of all costs in that year.

That is right. Sixty-nine percent of medicaid recipients only ran up 26 percent of the costs for the entire program.

By contrast, the aged, blind, and disabled made up less than 30 percent of medicaid recipients yet incurred over 70 percent of total program costs.

How can that be?

First, the aged, blind, and disabled disproportionately use health care services. Even without the hardships of blindness or SSI-qualifying disabilities, the aged use health services at a rate 3½ times the total population. In addition, disabilities at any age increase service utilization and medicaid services for SSI recipients have increased at an annual compound rate of growth of 20.5 percent, compared to 13.9 percent for AFDC recipients.

Second, the aging of the population has increased the demand for institutionalization. While the number of aged medicaid recipients is actually declining slightly, reflecting in part the improved economic status of the elderly, the percentage of medicaid aged in nursing homes has increased, suggesting an evolution to an older and more impaired aged medicaid recipient.

Third, the decision to extend medicaid coverage to the SSI population, particularly the disabled, and the coverage of nursing home care in ICF-MR's [intermediate care facilities for the mentally retarded] has been a major factor in the rapid growth of medicaid costs. In 1975, the disabled accounted for 24 percent of all medicaid expenditures in nursing homes; by 1982, it had risen to 38 percent and is continuing to escalate rapidly. Costly ICF-MR's provide care to the one-third of institutionalized disabled who are mentally retarded.

Thus, the image of the welfare mother and her children accounting for the explosion in medicare costs misses the mark by a country mile. And by permitting this myth to continue, without refutation, we merely undercut the support which this vital "safety net" program deserves.

For many elderly, medicaid is there when they have exhausted their resources in the nursing home. Medicaid is there for the mentally retarded and the blind, the disabled, the least fortunate of our society when they most need it.

And far from being the cause of the medicaid cost spiral, Americans under age 65 who are in poverty and are not blind or disabled are perhaps the least protected by medicaid. And as I have pointed out before, we need to see that we better target these limited resources to meet their needs as well.

THE VISION OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING AND THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this week we observed the first Federal holiday commemorating the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Much has been said of his leadership and of his legacy to America: His efforts for civil rights, on behalf of the poor and in support of the cause of peace stirred a complacent nation to action and changed the very fabric of American society within a single generation. He appealed to the very best aspects of American character and his legacy is reflected in our progress toward equality and social justice.

But Dr. King's vision was not limited to home; he had a vision far greater. A dream that the United States would assume its rightful place as a leader in the world for human rights—the rightful role for a nation which once referred to itself as the leader of the free world.

Unfortunately, we have made far too little progress toward achieving this broader goal. For all of our rhetoric, we have little of substance to demonstrate our willingness to follow through on our commitment to human rights. Among Western nations, we have had a poor track record for ratification of human rights treaties—the essential building blocks for securing these rights.

But why, Mr. President? Why? How could we fail to take action when it is within our grasp to do so? How can we fail to give meaning and substance to our rhetorical commitment to human rights? The sad answer, Mr. President, is that there is no excuse for our past inaction.

Yet while we cannot undo the past, we can change the future and we have a unique opportunity this year to do just that. President Reagan has called upon us to ratify the Genocide Convention, the most basic and fundamental of the human rights treaties ever drafted. Here is a treaty which seeks to guarantee the most fundamental right of all: The right to live for every national, ethnic, racial, and religious group; the right to live without fear of extermination. And what could be more basic?

The Federal holiday for Dr. King, a dedicated servant of the cause of human rights, is an important symbol of the man, his people and, most of all, his cause. As important as that is, it will ultimately be incomplete until we see the realization of that dream: both here and abroad. And ratification of the Genocide Convention this year will be a most fitting step in that direction.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COCHRAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

FORECLOSURE POLICIES OF THE FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I take advantage of this opportunity to bring to the attention of my Senate colleagues that the Subcommittee on Appropriations which I chair, the Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies, will conduct a hearing on Friday of this week at 9:30 a.m. in room 138 of the Senate Dirksen Office Building to examine the foreclosure policies of the Farmers Home Administration. The subcommittee has jurisdiction over the funding of this agency. I am concerned about the possible impact of what may be a new policy relating to farm foreclosures on the budget and on the appropriations bill that our subcommittee will have to prepare later this year.

For some background on the subject, when I was back in my State over the Thanksgiving holiday, a friend brought to my attention some instructions that had been promulgated by the Department of Agriculture to county supervisors of the FmHA in my State, and presumably throughout the country, relating to foreclosure policy.

Attached to these instructions were some forms. One was entitled "Notice of Intent To Take Adverse Action."

Reviewing these instructions and the attachments to them, it became obvious to me that the Department of Agriculture, through the Farmers Home Administration, was going to be communicating with almost all Farmers Home borrowers and putting them on notice that immediately after the first of the year foreclosure action was contemplated against every one of them who was $100 or more behind in the payment on his Farmers Home loan.

Well, this struck me as unusual because my recollection had been that the Farmers Home Administration had a policy of leniency and that it would work with farmers to help them work their way out of indebtedness and prevent foreclosure, that that was the policy of the Farmers Home Administration and the Department of Agriculture.

So I wrote a letter upon returning to Washington to the new Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration. My letter was dated December 3, 1985. In my letter, I said:

> When I was in Mississippi this past weekend, I was handed a copy of Farmers Home Administration instruction No. 1924.71, et seq. I am enclosing a copy for your information. The interpretation of these instructions by some borrowers in my State is that anyone who is more than $100 delinquent on December 31 can expect foreclosure. It is my recollection that the policy of the Farmers Home Administration has been one of leniency, with a commitment to farmers to help them work out of their indebtedness problems if at all possible. I want to know if the policy has been changed and whether the interpretation of these instructions is correct or not. Your early advice would be appreciated very much.
> Sincerely,
> THAD COCHRAN,
> U.S. Senator.

Mr. President, I received a response to that letter today. It has taken almost 7 or 8 weeks to get a response to that inquiry. It seemed simple enough to me. I did appreciate a telephone call that I received earlier today from the Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration apologizing for the delay in responding to that inquiry.

But what disturbs me more than not getting an answer until January 22 to a letter dated December 3 about a fundamental policy of the Farmers Home Administration is the attitude on the part of the Farmers Home Administration that is reflected in these instructions and in these forms to which I have earlier referred. So Members will be on notice, I am asking unanimous consent, Mr. President, that copies of these attachments be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTICE OF INTENT TO TAKE ADVERSE ACTION

Dear :

We regret to inform you that a review of your Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) loan account indicates the need to take adverse action.

We have attempted to work out a satisfactory solution to your credit problems through the various servicing options available, but have not been able to do so. For your information and review, we have included with this material a copy of the FmHA notice entitled "Farmer Program Borrower Servicing Options Including Deferrals and Borrower Responsibilities" (Form FmHA 1924-14).

This "Notice of Intent To Take Adverse Action" requires a response from you within 30 days, using the attached form entitled "Borrower Acknowledgment of Notice of Intent to Take Adverse Action" (Form FmHA 1924-26). That form offers you the opportunity to request for consideration a number of servicing options. Further details are provided below.

We have conducted a review of your Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) loan accounts and determined the following where checked:

☐ You are presently $———— behind schedule on your FmHA loan installments which is a violation of your note and mortgage and/or security agreement.

☐ You have made unapproved disposition(s) of property that is covered by security instruments which secure your FmHA indebtedness. The property in question is (describe property):

☐ You have stopped farming or ranching which is a violation of your loan agreements.

☐ You have (insert the reason(s) for the proposed adverse action):

If the above listed violation(s) is not corrected by one or more of the actions described in the attached Form FmHA 1924-26, "Borrower's Acknowledgment of Intent to Take Adverse Action," FmHA intends to accelerate your FmHA debts and foreclose on your real estate and/or chattels. This may include repossessing your chattels or in other ways proceeding against property you own in which FmHA has a security interest or terminating the release of sales records.

You may, with regard to your Operating, Economic Emergency, Emergency, Farm Ownership, Soil and Water, Special Livestock, Economic Opportunity, Rural Housing for farm service buildings, and/or Recreation loan(s), apply for servicing options, including deferrals, that are explained in the enclosed Form FmHA 1924-14, "Notice—Farmer Program Borrower Servicing Options Including Deferrals and Borrower Responsibilities." Please read this form carefully.

If you wish to apply for any of the servicing options you must complete Part I of the enclosed Form FmHA 1924-26, "Borrower Acknowledgment of Notice of Intent To Take Adverse Action," sign the form, and return the form to the address listed on the letterhead of this notice within 30 days after you receive this notice. We will then arrange a conference with you to develop financial statements and farm operating plans which FmHA will use to make a determination on your request for servicing options. If you fail to attend this conference without offering a legitimate excuse or if you fail to provide necessary information, your request will be automatically denied and you will not be given an opportunity to appeal any adverse decision.

At the conference you will be given the opportunity to present information you believe will show you are eligible for the servicing option(s) you requested. FmHA will make a decision on your request based on the information submitted by you, the information in your FmHA case file and the plans developed by you and FmHA at the conference. Such a decision will be in writing and, if the decision is adverse, FmHA will explain how to appeal the decision and to have an appeal hearing. Such a hearing will cover both the denial of your request for servicing alternatives and other adverse actions FmHA intends to take against you as indicated above.

If you do not wish to request servicing options, you have the opportunity to appeal the adverse action(s) FmHA intends to take. In this case, you should complete only Part II of Form FmHA 1924-26, sign the form and return it to the address shown in the letterhead of this notice within 30 days after you receive this notice. You may appear in person, with or without an attorney or other representative, to present your information. The hearing officer will be an FmHA employee who has not been previously involved in your case. The hearing officer will arrange a mutually convenient time and place for the appeal hearing.

Several methods of curing defaults or liquidating your FmHA loan accounts are available. If you prefer to use one of those methods listed in Part III (Curing Defaults) or Part IV (Liquidation Action) of Form FmHA 1924-26, check the appropriate box, sign the form and return it to the address listed in the letterhead of this notice within 30 days of receipt of this notice.

Please note that Form FmHA 1924-26 must be postmarked within 30 days of the day you received this notice. If you fail to respond to this notice by completing, signing and returning Form FmHA 1924-26 in the prescribed time, FmHA will proceed to take the adverse action(s) against you without further notice and right of administrative appeal by you.

The Federal Equal Credit Opportunity Act prohibits creditors from discriminating against credit applicants on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, age (provided that the applicant has the capacity to enter into a binding contract); because all or part of the applicant's income is derived from any public assistance program; or because the applicant has in good faith exercised any right under the Consumer Credit Protection Act. The Federal agency that administers compliance with this law is the Federal Trade Commission, Equal Credit Opportunity, Washington, D.C. 20580.

Sincerely,

_____,

FmHA County Supervisor.

BORROWER ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF NOTICE OF INTENT TO TAKE ADVERSE ACTION

County Supervisor, FmHA

This acknowledges that I (we) received your Notice of Intent To Take Adverse Action dated:

(Complete Part I, II, III or Part IV and Part V.)

I. Servicing Actions:

I (we) request FmHA to consider the following servicing actions (check one or more)

A. ___ Rescheduling
B. ___ Reamortization
C. ___ Consolidation
D. ___ Deferral
E. ___ Limited Resource
F. ___ Subordination
G. ___ Restructuring the business and debt by selling a portion of my (our) assets

I (we) understand that if, after I (we) attend a mandatory conference and present necessary information, FmHA denies my (our) request, I (we) will be given opportunity to appeal.

II. Appeal:

I (we) do not wish to apply for the servicing options in Part I above. I (we) understand that I (we) may appeal FmHA's intended adverse action and I (we) wish to have the appeal hearing handled as follows:

(Check appropriate box)

A. ___ I (we) request an appeal hearing and I (we) believe FmHA's intended action is wrong for the following reason(s).

I (we) am (are) enclosing the following information for the hearing officer's consideration (Itemize specific documents).

B. ___ I (we) request an appeal hearing and I (we) will present information at the hearing which I (we) believe will prove FmHA's decision is incorrect.

C. ___ I (we) will not attend an appeal hearing but request the hearing officer to review the existing written record, and based on the review, determine whether FmHA's decision is correct.

D. ___ I (we) do not want to appeal the intended action and waive my (our) right to do so.

III. Curing Defaults (Complete this only if you have checked none of the boxes in I or II above):

I (we) do not wish to request a servicing option in Part I or to appeal the intended adverse action as allowed in Part II. I (we) wish to take the following action to correct the security agreement violations noted in Form FmHA 1924-25 and request a conference with you to discuss this action.

A. ___ Pay my (our) delinquent loan accounts current.

B. ___ Make restitution to FmHA for unauthorized disposition of security.

I will take this action within 60 days of the date this Form FmHA 1924-26 is postmarked. If I cannot accomplish this action within the 60 days, FmHA will proceed to take adverse action against me, and I will not be allowed to appeal the adverse action.

IV. Liquidation Actions (Complete this only if you have checked none of the boxes in I, II, or III above):

I (we) do not wish to request a servicing option in Part I, appeal the adverse action as permitted in Part II, or correct the security agreement violations as permitted in Part III. I (we) wish to take the following action to liquidate my (our) FmHA accounts and request a conference with you to discuss this action.

A. ___ Sell my (our) security for cash.

B. ___ Convey my (our) security to FmHA.

C. ___ Transfer my (our) security to someone who will assume the FmHA debt.

D. ___ Refinance my (our) debt with another lender.

I will take this action within 120 days of the date this Form FmHA 1924-26 is postmarked. I understand that I may be considered for FmHA debt settlement should sale, transfer, or conveyance of secured property fail to satisfy my (our) entire FmHA debt. I understand that if I cannot accomplish this action within 120 days, FmHA will proceed to take adverse action and I will not be allowed to appeal that action.

V. Certification:

I (we) hereby request one of the above actions. I (we) understand that if I (we) do not request any of the actions in Parts I, III, or IV or desire an appeal hearing in Part II, FmHA may proceed to take immediate action on my (our) loan accounts.

Sincerely,

(Signature of borrower)

NOTICE

FARMER PROGRAM BORROWER SERVICING OPTIONS INCLUDING DEFERRALS AND BORROWER RESPONSIBILITIES

SERVICING OPTIONS

All borrowers are expected to repay their loans according to planned repayment schedules. However, sometimes borrowers will not be able to pay as scheduled. If this happens, you may inquire about the following servicing options:

1. Deferral:

An approved delay in making regularly scheduled payments. Such a delay may be granted if FmHA finds that, due to circumstances beyond your control, you are temporarily unable to continue making the scheduled payments on such loan(s) without unduly impairing your standard of living. A more detailed description is available at any FmHA Office.

II. Limited Resource Program:

The Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) has authority to make limited resource farm ownership and operating loans to qualified applicants.

The program provides credit at an interest rate which is lower than FmHA's regular interest rate.

In addition to making loans at reduced interest rate, borrowers with existing farm ownership and operating loans who qualify as limited resource operators may have their loans rewritten at the lower interest rate.

III. Consolidation:

Combining and rewriting similar type loans made for operating purposes at new rates and terms.

IV. Rescheduling:

Rewriting loans made for operating purposes at the interest rate of the original note or current loan rate, whichever is the lesser.

V. Reamortization:

Rewriting loans made for real estate purposes at the interest rate of the original note or current loan rate, whichever is the lesser.

VI. Subordination of the FmHA lien to the lien of another creditor.

VII. Restructuring the business and debt by selling a portion of your assets.

If you would like additional information regarding any of the above items and how to apply you should contact the FmHA County Supervisor. You will be asked to attend a conference with the FmHA County Supervisor and you must furnish the information necessary for FmHA to make a decision on your request. The County Supervisor can advise you of the information needed for a decision.

FARMER PROGRAM BORROWER RESPONSIBILITIES

Please read carefully the following summary of major FmHA requirements. Farmer Program insured borrowers should understand what the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) expects of them and how FmHA can be of better service. This is not a complete list of all responsibilities of an FmHA borrower; this highlights only some of those responsibilities.

Responsibilities consist of, but are not limited to, the following:

Payments: Payments are due as agreed upon in the note(s). It is essential that payments be made on time. Extra payments are encouraged whenever possible.

Security: The loan(s) is secured by a Financing Statement and Security Agreement and/or a real estate mortgage or other security instruments (depending upon the type of loan or security). These instruments give FmHA a valid lien on crops, chattels, land, etc., as applicable.

Use of loan funds: FmHA loan funds will be used for the purpose(s) shown on the Farm and Home Plan or other plan of operation acceptable to FmHA, and/or Development Plan in cases of real estate improvements.

Releases and sales: The Form FmHA 1962-1, "Agreement for the Use of Proceeds/Release of Chattel Security," which you signed is the agreement between FmHA and you which explains what sales you plan to make, approximately when and to whom those sales will be made, and how the proceeds from those sales will be used. You must inform FmHA if you want to make any sales which are not listed on the form, if you want to sell to a purchaser not listed on the form, or if you make a sale and you receive an amount of proceeds different from the amount listed on the form. It may be a violation of Federal criminal law to make sales which have not been authorized on Form FmHA 1962-1 or to fail to account for sales proceeds.

Changes in operation: FmHA agreed to lend you money based on facts which you supplied about your operation. If any changes occur in your operation you should notify the FmHA County Supervisor at once.

Violation of responsibilities: Violation of any of the above responsibilities may result in denial of further FmHA assistance, and could cause your FmHA loan(s) to be accelerated.

Mr. COCHRAN. Let me read from one of these attachments. It is a document entitled "Notice of Intent To Take Adverse Action." It says that if the above listed violation is not corrected, the Farmers Home Administration intends "to accelerate your FmHA debts and foreclose on your real estate and/or chattels." Among the listed violations are that "You are presently $—— behind schedule on your Farmers Home Administration loan installments"; "You have made unapproved disposition is of property that is covered by security instruments"; or "You have stopped farming or ranching which is a violation of your loan agreements."

If any one of those three conditions exists, the borrower is told, according to this form, that Farmers Home is going to foreclose; no ifs, ands, or buts about it.

But there is another option given to the borrower, another attachment which is, according to these instructions, to be sent out by the Farmers Home county supervisor, giving the borrower a list of things he may check if he is interested in an alternative to foreclosure. I am assuming most would be interested in an alternative to foreclosure. But looking at this, to me, you would be led to believe that you could put a check mark by the word "deferral" and qualify for a deferral—a deferral of your repayment obligations to Farmers Home. A reading of these instructions would lead you to believe that there are some farmers who would qualify for that. And that is encouraging.

What is not encouraging is that after briefings of staff members on the Hill, now, since these instructions have been formulated and sent around all over the country, there is no criterion or eligibility standard that has been developed for the Farmers Home Administration to base a decision that a farmer qualifies for a deferral.

What I am saying, Mr. President, is that if, as earlier contemplated by the agency, it was going to send this notice around the country and then some farmers were going to say they wanted a deferral, the local county supervisor would have no guidelines on which to base a decision as to whether an individual farmer could qualify for a deferral. And where would we be then?

There are over 6,000 farmers in my State of Mississippi who would fall within the definition of those who would receive letters of notice of intent to take adverse action. Therefore, I am assuming that almost 6,000 farmers would contact their Farmers Home county supervisor and seek a way to work out their problems. But when they contacted the supervisor, they would not learn anything about whether they could qualify for deferral or not. And that is disturbing.

I think now that the Administrator and those in his agency and those higher up in the Department of Agriculture may realize what a problem this is going to cause.

Even though I did not have a timely response to the letter which I wrote in early December asking for an explanation about what this meant, others were able to get a response. Some newspapers began checking into it. They began hearing about this and writing stories in leading newspapers all around the country. I read a story in the New York Times which was interesting to me because it appeared that the information they obtained was quite easy to get. Although it is very difficult for a Senator to get an answer to a question, a reporter apparently can get a quick answer.

Not only did the New York Times write an article about the new policy and the new pressures that were going to be brought on borrowers by the Farmers Home Administration, so did the Washington Post, and so did the Wall Street Journal, and just this past week, in the Clarion-Ledger-Jackson Daily News, our leading newspaper in terms of circulation in my State of Mississippi, there was a long article with the headline "Farmers Home Administration To Pressure Delinquent Farmers."

What has all this done? All the stories in the newspapers, coupled with these instructions that have been sent out to all the FHA county offices throughout the country, have caused a near panic among Farmers Home borrowers.

So, on Friday, Mr. President, we are going to have an opportunity at least to question the Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration and the Under Secretary of Agriculture, Frank Naylor. Both of them will be at the hearing, I am told, so we can find out more about this new policy: What does it mean? What are the eligibility criteria for deferral or reamortization of loans?

We know that the terms of a Federal court decision that provided for a moratorium throughout some States on foreclosures has now come to an end because of the expiration of the effective date of that court order, so there is no longer—I am told—a judicially imposed moratorium in effect. The Farmers Home Administration may be free now to pursue the collection of delinquent Farmers Home loans.

Mr. President, I am not suggesting that they should not try to collect loans that are owed to the Government that are past due. What alarms me is the way in which the new policy is apparently being developed and implemented without adequate explanation to many of us who are going to be asked questions about it and have obligations to try to determine funding levels for agencies that are involved in this. I am not sure the number of employees in the Farmers Home Administration offices in my State of Mississippi will be sufficient to answer the telephone calls that will be coming in to inquire about the new procedures that have to be followed or the appropriate way to fill out the new forms that are being sent to farmers.

Let me say to my colleagues who may be interested in this subject and those who are going to be participating in the hearing on Friday that I am now told that this notice will not be sent out as had earlier been planned to every delinquent borrower. The notice to take adverse action will not be sent out to everyone, even though it was planned to be disseminated in early January. Only those who have wrongfully or fraudulently misappropriated secured property or may have violated the terms of the security arrangements with the Farmers Home Administration will be given notice of an intent to take adverse action. Not all borrowers just because they may be $100 behind on an interest payment or on principal will be given such harsh notice. That is under review, I am told, and those borrowers will probably get another kind of letter advising them that the Farmers Home Administration still sees its role as one where they are trying to be helpful to farmers, helping them work out of their current financial difficulties. That is what I hope we will see reflected in this new policy, Mr. President.

I am encouraged by the response I did receive today from the Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration to my earlier letter. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a copy of this letter from Vance L. Clark, Administrator, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, DC, January 21, 1986.

Hon. THAD COCHRAN,

Chairman, Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in reply to your letter of December 3, 1985, regarding the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) regulations pertaining to delinquent borrowers, and I do apologize for the delay in responding.

Previous FmHA regulations required that FmHA terminate the release of proceeds from the sale of chattel security prior to an appeal of the action. The new regulations referred to in your letter were issued primarily as a result of court decisions.

The notice and attachments which you refer to in your letter are sent to the borrower not only to inform the borrower of the default but also provide information regarding the servicing alternatives available to attempt to cure the default. For a monetary default, a borrower may request such assistance as rescheduling, reamortizing, or deferring payments on the loan. Farm ownership and operating loans may be rescheduled at a lower interest rate (limited resource) if the borrower meets certain guidelines. In addition, the regulations provide for more involvement of the borrower in planning the use of proceeds from the sale of FmHA chattel security and thus enable the borrower to be better informed of the availability of various FmHA servicing authorities.

The regulations offer borrowers the opportunity to restructure their indebtedness. It is FmHA's intent to use all its authorities to assist borrowers to continue farming when a reasonable chance of success exists. We will not be able, however, to keep everyone in business. Some borrowers are so deeply in debt that they cannot be saved.

I regret, Senator, that since my arrival at FmHA we have not had the opportunity to meet personally. Yet, it was nice to chat with you by telephone when I visited Mississippi recently. I did appreciate your kind words, and I did enjoy my visit to your fine State. The farmers of Flora were indeed most hospitable.

I appreciate your interest and concern about the farm situation and look forward to discussing personally our policies with you.

Sincerely,

VANCE L. CLARK,
Administrator.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the key sentence, as I see it, in this letter is this:

It is FmHA's intent to use all its authority to assist borrowers to continue farming when a reasonable chance of success exists.

I am reassured that this is the attitude of the Administrator, and I hope that as we further explore the policies and intentions of the agency at the hearings on Friday we will see that kind of attitude reflected in practice. We all know that the agency cannot keep every person in the country in the farming business but we do know that there can be a sensitive and understanding attitude reflected by the actions of the administrator and by those employed throughout the States by the Farmers Home Administration so that each Farmers Home Administration borrower will know that this Government is sensitive to his problems and it cares and is trying to help. I hope we can see that kind of attitude reflected.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that copies of the newspaper articles that I earlier described from the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal and the Clarion-Ledger/Jackson Daily News be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. TO SEND FARMERS FORECLOSURE WARNINGS: TWO-YEAR MORATORIUM ENDS

(By Keith B. Richburg)

The Farmers Home Administration, ending a court-ordered two-year moratorium, will begin notifying farmers next week that if they are delinquent on federal loans they must immediately take steps to repay or restructure those loans or face foreclosure of their farms.

Letters, titled "notice of intent to take adverse action," will be mailed out to any farmers who were at least $100 behind in loan payments at the end of December. About 90,000 farmers, a third of all those who took out FHA loans, are estimated to be behind in their payments.

The FHA, a division of the Agriculture Department, has oftentimes been the lender of last resort to America's cash-strapped farmers, and now holds about 12 percent of the nation's total farm debt.

The letters will tell the farmers that they are delinquent in their payments, and spell out seven steps the farmers can seek to take, including having the loan restructured, deferring some payments, combining loans and applying for new short-term, low-interest loans to help with quick cash-flow problems. The farmers will have 30 days to respond to the notices.

Vance L. Clark, the FHA administrator, said yesterday that the notices should not be interpreted as a decision to begin foreclosing on farms. Rather, he said, the letters will tell farmers that they are behind in their payments and will outline the available options.

"Foreclosure, that's the last thing that happens," Clark said. "There are a lot of options open to borrowers to preclude these foreclosures." He said that along with each notification he is sending a letter from himself telling each farmer that the FHA understands the farmers' plight and wants to help.

Still, Clark said, there eventually may have to be some farm foreclosure, bearing out the worst predictions of farmers and farm-state lobbyists. "Not everybody's going to make it this year. There's going to be some who have to leave the farm," Clark said.

The Farmers Home Administration was essentially barred from sending out notifications of foreclosures to farmers in November 1983, when a federal judge in North Dakota said the lending agency must first notify farmers of all other options open to them before moving forward with foreclosure proceedings.

That ruling, in a class-action case brought by farmers whose land was threatened forced the FHA to hold up new foreclosure notices while it drafted regulations giving farmers various options for handling their debts. Those regulations were published in the Federal Register in November.

"The judges said 'wait a minute, you have to tell them [the farmers] of other avenues,' so we cleaned up our act," Clark said. Before the judge's moratorium, which effectively ended yesterday, the FHA had foreclosed on hundreds of farms.

Rising production costs, a grain glut and falling farm prices—expected to go even lower because of new legislation signed by President Reagan to drive commodity prices down—all have taken a toll on thousands of American farmers, forcing many into massive debts and driving some out of business.

U.S. TELLS FARMERS TO MAKE PAYMENTS OR REARRANGE TERMS OF LOAN IN ARREARS

(By David Shribman)

WASHINGTON.—The Farmers Home Administration, signaling the end of a two-year moratorium on foreclosures, is telling farmers to make payments on their federal loans or arrange new terms within a month's time.

The agency, which is an arm of the Agriculture Department, is notifying about 90,000 farmers that they must bring their loans up to date or agree to new loan conditions if they wish to avoid foreclosures. The agency said it couldn't estimate how many foreclosures would result but maintained that the action wouldn't bring major dislocations in rural communities.

"We are not massively foreclosing," said Kathleen Lawrence, deputy undersecretary of agriculture for small-community and rural development. "The policy of the department is still to show forbearance to farmers who have any chance whatsoever to recover."

Though more than a third of the 270,000 farmers who have borrowed money from the agency are in arrears, the Agriculture Department hasn't initiated any foreclosure proceedings for about two years. The department had been prevented from beginning such action by a court order stipulating that the government publish new regulations specifying the rights of borrowers.

Those new regulations were approved by the court and published in October, freeing the government to take action to collect the loan payments or foreclose on farms, which have been suffering from a level of economic distress unsurpassed since the Depression.

"You can assume the effect would be tough on farmers," said Republican Rep. Gene Taylor, whose Missouri district includes many cattle and dairy farms.

Agriculture Department officials emphasized that the Farmers Home Administration would seek to avoid foreclosures on the $8.5 billion in farm and rural housing loans it has made, adding that in some cases foreclosure proceedings can take as long as two years.

The department's action was first reported by the New York Times.

The notices, which are to be sent by certified mail, outline the steps delinquent farmers must take to avoid foreclosures. The options available include renegotiating farm loans on the basis of lower interest rates, agreeing to new deferred payment plans and settling on different collateral arrangements. "We're telling the borrowers that there are things they can do to avoid foreclosure," said Ms. Lawrence.

Even so, lawmakers from farm districts warned that the action would initiate a new series of rural protests.

"You're going to see a replay of what we saw a year ago, when people started making the case that the farm economy just isn't strong enough to sustain itself," said Democratic Rep. Richard Durbin, whose Illinois district includes corn and soybean farmers. "The Reagan administration believes it is just a matter of will out here for farmers to recover. It's much more than that."

FMHA TO PRESSURE DELINQUENT FARMERS

(By Wanda Cantrell)

Mississippi farmers who have seriously delinquent loans with the Farmers Home Administration will begin receiving notices late next week that they must settle with the federal lending agency.

Farmers will be required to notify FmHA of the location of collateral for their loans and to meet with federal officials to work out a repayment plan, the agency, considered the "lender of last resort," said Friday.

Some 40 percent of Mississippi's $1.4 billion FmHA loan portfolio is delinquent, said the agency's acting director Dan Mattox. There are about 13,000 Farmers Home borrowers in the state.

Mattox stressed that the new demands do not immediately herald foreclosure for the delinquent farmers, who have been protected from foreclosure for more than two years with a pending federal lawsuit in Oxford. "We want to do everything we can to help the farmer and not foreclose," he said.

Mattox said he has not heard from lawyers handling the case for FmHA, and that he has no intention of moving forward with foreclosures at this time.

After several years of not pressing delinquent borrowers, the federal lender is beginning to crack down, particularly on those suspected of fraud in abusing FmHA loan collateral and those who have paid no money—interest or principal—on the loans for three years.

But despite the lack of foreclosure, the new move could have a serious effect on whether some continue to farm. "Our borrowers are going to have to show that they can pay the debt they owe—and how—before they will be eligible for planting loans this year," Mattox said.

"They will have to cash flow these accounts now."

Farmers across the nation are facing FmHA's tightening of money as a result of the recent lifting a court-ordered foreclosure moratorium of 44 states, Mississippi is one of the six states not affected by the North Dakota class action case.

U.S. Department of Agriculture Undersecretary Frank Naylor said Friday that there are 65,351 delinquent borrowers who have a total of 225,073 loans as of Jan. 10, representing about 25 percent of all FmHA borrowers.

The highest delinquency rates continue to be in the Southeast, where farmers are more dependent on federal credit. Mississippi has one of the highest delinquency rates in the nation.

About 40 percent of Louisiana FmHA borrowers are delinquent, and 21 percent of Alabama borrowers are delinquent.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

DEFICIT REDUCTION: CONGRESS MUST TAKE CHARGE

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the new year will be full of historic challenges. This will be the year of deficit reduction. This will be a year when the President's promise of soaring economic growth meets the reality of a $220 billion deficit. A year when priorities for tax reform, American competitiveness with our trading partners, and the need for a strong national defense will clash with the imperative to get our economic house in order.

Political commentators are calling this the year of "the great train wreck." The train, they say, is the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, which has been set on automatic and is barreling down a track that leads to economic chaos.

I do not believe we are heading down the track of economic chaos. I believe we can take control of the deficit reduction process that we voted for in December. If we sit back and set the train on automatic pilot then, yes, the wreck will occur. Domestic programs will be slashed, commitments to the health, welfare, and social progress of the Nation will be abandoned and national security threatened.

I have long supported an across-the-board freeze on Federal spending. The purpose of the freeze was to put a halt to hemorrhaging spending increases long enough for Congress and the President to work together on a long-term deficit reduction plan which would have bipartisan support. In fact, an across-the-board freeze in which all spending programs would be constrained temporarily was the cornerstone of my reelection campaign in 1984.

I mention my support for an across-the-board freeze simply to point out that the American people are willing, if not eager, to see the deficit reduced as long as it is done fairly and the sacrifices are reasonable and across-the-board. And the American people will support politicians during an election year who are willing to vote for such plans.

Last year, Senators BIDEN, KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, and I offered such a comprehensive, 1-year freeze plan to the Senate. That plan was not accepted. Instead, the Senate adopted a budget resolution in August which promised deep reductions in the deficit to be enacted before the start of the new fiscal year which began on October 1.

Well, we all know what happened. October 1 came and went, and Congress did not complete the reconciliation bill which contained the savings and new revenues that we had resolved to enact. November and December followed, and still no reconciliation bill. Finally, we left town without acting on the only major piece of legislation that would have actually reduced the deficit.

I still believe that a bipartisan approach to deficit reduction is the only solution. And I am encouraged to hear that others are now starting to talk about the need to tone down the partisan rhetoric and have all the major players in the budget process sit down around a bargaining table and examine all the options for deficit reduction.

We must act cooperatively and decisively this year to achieve deficit reduction. If we do not, we might as well admit that we are walking away from the great responsibilities of representative government. We might just as well admit that we are powerless to control our own destiny and that we are willing to surrender the power of the purse because the choices are just too painful.

We have a choice if we go on that track. We can surrender to either the President, who is prepared to sacrifice everything else for his defense buildup, or we can surrender to the anonymous budget technicans in OMB, CBO, and GAO who will generate the formula for cuts without regard to national priorities at all.

Mr. President, I do not know of a single Senator who voted for the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure in order to avoid tough choices or to surrender the power of the purse.

This year, Congress must take control of the budget process or risk losing control of it altogether. We have already heard enough of the details of the President's upcoming "prescription for pain" to know that his budget for 1987 will be dead-before-arrival. I hope that we will begin immediately to develop a congressional alternative to the President's proposals so that we can calm the fears of the American people who still believe in a sensible and responsible Federal Government.

I was pleased to read in yesterday's Washington Post that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, shares my belief that the best way to achieve deficit reduction is to get the political leadership in this town to sit down and start talking sense about the deficit.

I first proposed the idea of an economic summit in a resolution which I offered in August 1984. A bipartisan conference to tackle deficit reduction is needed now more than ever.

Senator DOMENICI's article speaks of the ghosts of budgets past, present, and yet to come. I am glad that his "ghost of budgets yet to come" did not point only to a year of partisan rancor and stalemate and the failure of leadership which guarantees that the train will topple off its tracks by the end of the year.

Instead, I share the vision that we can and must take charge of deficit reduction by having all parties come together to come up with a fair and balanced package. Senator DOMENICI's ghost of budgets yet to come points to a grand summit where everything is on the table, including the defense buildup and new revenues. Out of that grand summit emerges the blueprint for fiscal sanity in which we all can take credit for taking decisive action on the deficit and we all can accept the responsibility for the needed sacrifices.

The time finally has come to set aside the partisanship that has prevented meaningful action on the deficit. Cutting the deficit is not a Republican issue nor is it a Democratic issue. It is a national issue. How to cut the deficit will not be determined solely by the President or by Congress. It will be decided together.

If it takes a grand summit to confront the deficit head on, then I say let us give a grand summit a try. If it means realizing that new revenues are needed to meet the essential commitments of the Federal Government, then I say let us figure out where and how to do it to get the job done. If it means facing the need for sacrifice and compromise, then I say let us do it.

In the end, we all know that the only lasting fix to the deficit will be one that is perceived to be fair and balanced. Any other approach will ensure deadlock or will quickly unravel as the consequences become apparent.

The ghost of budgets yet to come showed us two views of the year ahead. Now it is up to us to wake up out of our dreams and to bring about the future that we plan to live in.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Senator DOMENICI be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GHOSTS OF DEFICIT FOREVER

(By Pete V. Domenici)

In less than three weeks the automatic spending cuts of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will be triggered unless a court challenge to the new law succeeds. The papers will be filled with the confusion of federal agencies trying to fulfill the law and the outrage of those program beneficiaries who see their activities threatened. Before the coming public panic consumes us, we should review where we are, how we got here, and where we are likely to end up in our struggle with the deficit.

As a prelude, I should note that I am extremely optimistic about the nation's economic potential. We have solved problems of the highest order. We have created millions of jobs for "Baby Boom" workers. We have embarked on a new era of entrepreneurship and rising per-capita incomes. A leanness and quickness characterizes the private sector.

The only cloud on the horizon, and a cloud of mammoth proportions in my view, is the inability of the government to control deficits. The extraordinary deficits we now face symbolize this impotence and also hold the substantive prospect of plunging the nation into an unprecedent economic recession—ironically, one that could well be avoided. The deficit, simply put, remains the foremost policy and political problem confronting the nation. If I may borrow from Dickens, I will call upon three ghosts to lead us on our budget odyssey: the ghosts of budgets past, present and yet to come.

I. BUDGETS PAST

Our Ghost of Budgets Past conjures up a scene of candidate Ronald Reagan speaking in Chicago in September 1980. He explains in some detail his four-part plan for the economy and the federal budget: 1) a 10 percent across-the-board tax cut for individuals in each of the next three years to increase take-home pay and the dismal national savings rate; 2) major changes in the corporate tax code aimed at reviving the staggering American economy; 3) an all-out attack on waste, fraud and abuse in government spending, coupled with a permanent shrinking of the government's programs, directed at saving tens of billions of dollars a year; and 4) a major increase in defense spending.

The president-to-be calmly explains that the increase in defense spending will be "affordable," because his other policies will yield a combination of new revenues to the government (from economic growth) and less domestic spending (from a shrinking of federal domestic programs.).

Our ghost next takes us to March 10, 1981. The president releases the details of his 1982 budget, which replaces the budget of former president Jimmy Carter. The budget is truly revolutionary. It calls for domestic spending cuts in fiscal year 1982 alone of $67 billion. Between FY 1981 and FY 1986, the domestic cuts would total $475 billion.

On top of unprecedented domestic spending restraint, the president fufills his second major campaign promise by requesting the largest single defense increase in the nation's history. For FY 1982, this increase would reach nearly $29 billion and would push defense spending from the FY 1980 level of $146 billion to $226 billion in just two years—an increase of 55 percent.

The budget also keeps the president's promise on taxes. It requests individual and corporate tax cuts of $54 billion in FY 1982 and $718 billion through FY 1986.

Above all, our ghost points to the line in the president's budget that shows that if all his policies were fully implemented, the federal budget would be balanced by FY 1984 and would be running a $28 billion surplus by 1986.

Two major points overlooked by many in that first, fateful budget will come back to haunt the nation. First, almost $75 billion in domestic cuts necessary for achieving a balanced budget in 1984 are not itemized and "will be identified later." Second, the economic projections underlying the budget assume real growth in the economy almost double the historical average for the past 12 years (4.6 percent projected compared to 2.5 percent actual for the 1972-84 time frame).

Finally, our Ghost of Budgets Past takes us to the private conference room of the Senate majority leader, Howard Baker, in early spring of 1981. In the room for an extraordinary meeting is the president, who has left the White House and journeyed to the Hill. The president leans across the table and tells the 12 Republican members of the Senate Budget Committee that he will not support a bipartisan attempt in that committee to freeze cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security recipients as part of a deficit-reduction plan. He asks them to join his opposing effort. In front of the senators is a sheet showing savings from a one-year freeze on the COLAs—$88 billion over five years, and more than $24 billion in the year 1986 alone.

The senators relent. They go back to committee and vote against the move to freeze

COLAs. Social Secrity, although larger than all domestic non-entitlement spending programs put together, is protected in future budget battles; it comprises almost 25 percent of the non-interest spending in the federal budget.

2. BUDGETS PRESENT

Our Ghost of Budgets Present arrives, looking weary and battered. He has watched three years of congressional deadlock; the deficits for the first four years of the Reagan administration have amounted to more than all the deficits accumulated by all other presidents in the nation's lifetime. America is amassing debt—corporate, individual and governmental—at a record pace.

Yet, no perceptible crisis is at hand. Unemployment has subsided below the 7 percent mark; inflation and interest rates are down and dropping further; the economy is perking along at about the historical average growth: 2.5 to 3 percent annually. Everyone thinks the deficit may be a problem, but the political will to tackle it head-on is fading. The short-term pain of policies that would really cut deficits overwhelms the short-term gain of voting to retain Congress' favorite programs.

Our Ghost of Budgets Present reveals an internal congressional staff memo showing that despite public displays of budget-cutting enthusiasm, Congress has allowed large spending increases since FY 1980; an increase of $132 billion (99 percent) in national defense; $169 billion in new spending for domestic entitlement programs (an increase of 60 percent), driven by new Social Security increases; and an additional $26 billion in domestic, discretionary spending (a 17 percent hike).

It turns out that many of the "cuts" were measured from baselines that assumed growth, so even with a cut there was frequently an actual increase in dollars. The memo also shows that revenues have dropped off from those original FY 1982 presidential projections by about $150 billion in FY 1986. Moreover, the gross national product forecast by that FY 1982 budget fell short of reality by $2.4 trillion for FY 1982-86! Almost nothing is "affordable" anymore, in the sense that word was used way back in September 1980.

Even worse, the restraint in spending that has occurred has spared programs that stress present consumption (pensions are a prime example) and hampered programs that stress investment in the future (research in nondefense scientific areas, basic physical infrastructure, education).

Interest payments on this debt are $200 billion annually and are the fastest growing element of federal spending. This means that America cannot make the basic commitment to the future that needs to be made in order to ensure the unparalleled prosperity to which all other indicators point.

We now move to February 1985. The president has emerged from his reelection campaign with one of the most overwhelming victories in America's history. Undeterred deficit-fighters in the administration and in Congress conspire to make one last fight to get deficits under control.

The president's budget asks once again for large domestic spending cuts, $180 billion over three years, with the elimination of more than a dozen major domestic programs as the center-piece of the plan. The budget also asks for a $30 billion increase in defense spending for FY 1986 alone, and rejects tax increases. It projects a deficit of $144 billion in FY 1988, twice as high as any deficit in the non-Reagan era, but a substantial move toward what economists are now calling "structural budget balance."

The ghost now takes us to a dramatic moment. It is May 9, well past midnight. The Senate has concluded debate on an unprecedented deficit reduction package, incorporating Social Security COLA freezes and eliminating several programs. It not only will meet the president's deficit reduction goal in FY 1986, it will yield substantially lower deficits by FY 1988.

The vote stands at 49-48 against the proposal. Sen. Pete Wilson of California arrives from a hospital, where he underwent emergency appendectomy surgery earlier. Against doctors' recommendations, he has come to the Senate in a wheelchair, an intravenous tube in his arm, to vote. He votes for the proposal. With the vote 49-49, Vice President George Bush, in his capacity as president of the Senate, votes for it. It passes, 50-49.

Although only a few suspect it at the time, that moment in the Senate chamber will be the high point for deficit cutting for the year. Our Ghost of Budgets Present speeds over a troubled summer. The budget finally hammered out between House and Senate falls far short of the Senate-passed version, in large part because the president finally opposes any change in Social Security COLAs. His decision dooms any significant congressional action.

Congress finds it impossible to pass almost any significant bills. Appropriations bills fail to move. Approaching is an autumn vote to extend the federal debt the government has run up. Sens. Gramm, Rudman and Hollings conceive a new deficit-cutting mechanism and attach it to the debt limit bill.

Our ghost now takes us to December 1985. Congress sends the president a farm bill that costs an estimated $50 billion during the next three years, about double what the president requested in his FY 1986 budget of nine months earlier. Congress finds it difficult to comply with even the watered-down budget it passed just four months earlier. Congress staggers through a chaos of short-term continuing appropriations and short-term debt extensions, all of which threaten to shut down the government.

Finally, Congress passes more spending bills, postpones action on a multibillion-dollar deficit reduction measure that the administration threatens to veto, and heads home. The president signs the farm bill into law. He signs all of the spending bills, even though they contain in the aggregate about $40 billion more in domestic spending than he wanted and about $30 billion less for defense. He signs the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill.

Within a fortnight, the Justice Department announces that it will join in attacking the constitutionality of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. The president asks for $4 billion more spending for the Commodity Credit Corporation, sending up his formal request Dec. 23. A year that began with high hopes for deficit reduction fizzles into the winter rain of utter failure. Our Ghost of Budgets Present decides to become a consultant to corporations on the impact of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

3. BUDGETS YET TO COME

Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come offers us a choice. First he takes us to February 1986. The president and Congress have been given the size of the automatic cut order (called a sequester order) mandated by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill for FY 1986. It will take a total of $11.7 billion from federal outlays, equally split between defense and nondefense programs.

This leaves defense spending in March 1986 about $40 billion less than the president's original request for the year. Nondefense programs will be cut in some cases below last year's level. Senators up for reelection later in the year are besieged by interest groups hit by the sequester.

Yet, this tiny cut pales in comparison to what may be necessary later in the year. Our ghost reveals internal staff documents that show deficits of more than $205 billion in FY 1987, a full $60 billion over the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target of $144 billion. The president presents his budget in early February. It contains a request for $20 billion more in defense spending. It terminates scores of federal programs through direct cuts and privatization ideas. It rejects new taxes. It is kept alive by Congress mostly as a vehicle for repudiation.

Here our ghost presents two scenarios. Sadly, one is more likely than the other. The first scenario is the hope of many of us who voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—a comprehensive compromise on the deficit. It goes like this:

(1) Late March 1986: the president and Congress, unable to come up with a budget for the 1987 year, agree to a "Grand Summit" on the budget. Tax reform plans in the Senate are temporarily laid aside in order to focus on deficit reduction.

(2) April 1986: After weeks of negotiations, Congress and the president agree on a historic deficit-cutting package, including fundamental reforms and reductions in domestic spending, a slowing of the defense buildup, and new revenues.

(3) May and June 1986: Congress passes new laws implementing the "summit" agreement and appropriations bills that are consistent with it.

(4) August 1986: the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget compare their spending updates and conclude that because of presidential and congressional action, the deficit targets of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will indeed be met.

(5) The stock market surges, interest rates drop, and the economy takes off. America soars into the future.

But that scenario may be unlikely for many reasons, so our ghost provides a second scenario, feared by many of us who are familiar with the realities of both the budget and of the politics of 1986:

(1) Late March 1986: The president's budget has been rejected in all quarters. Congress tries to devise its own budget and fails. The president vigorously pursues his tax reform plan in the Senate, opposing any tax increase within the plan.

(2) April and May 1986: the Senate, with 30 members watching primary results that will select their opponents in the November elections, is stymied. Tax reform is stalled, the budget cannot move, and appropriations bills await some resolution of the deadlock. The House puts off action, claiming it cannot act until some initiative is taken by either the president or the Senate.

(3) June 1986: The Supreme Court rules Gramm-Rudman-Hollings constitutional.

(4) Summer 1986: As the stock and bond market and most of the rest of the world watch, America's government is nearly paralyzed. The size of the amounts needed to meet the $144 billion deficit target prohibit action: $30 billion from defense and from nondefense spending translate into as much as $75 billion in budget authority from defense spending (or almost one-fourth of all new spending authority for defense) and about $45 billion from nondefense programs (or about one-third of all new budget authority in the appropriated, discretionary accounts).

(5) September 1986: Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in the amount of a $60 billion sequester goes into effect, causing grave concern among America's Western allies. Most Senate campaigns are now in the post-Labor Day "hot" period. Groups that participate in federal domestic programs, especially teachers and health professionals, descend on Washington in huge numbers. Many state governments begin to lay off large numbers of employees to try to compensate for cuts in state and local aid.

(6) October 1986: One month before the 1986 federal elections, the president decides that his position as commander-in-chief compels him not to sign the final sequester order because it would violate his oath of office to defend the nation's security. Already more than 100 lawsuits have been filed against the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts by potential program beneficiaries.

(8) November 1986: Huge numbers of incumbent senators and representatives of both parties are defeated at the polls, saddled with explaining their position on Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come concludes his gloomy scenario by revealing an internal staff memo that shows deficits will be $200 billion or more as far as the eye can see.

I conclude this little budget journey through time by saying that the concept behind the second scenario is a real possibility if both the president and Congress refuse to compromise on major deficit-reduction options. The amount of deficit reduction needed to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets, or to make any real dent in deficits regardless of any law, is very large.

If the nation's leadership fails to agree by late spring, especially in a year charged with important elections, the mechanisms of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will take effect. To allow that to happen would be a national, and even international, tragedy.

MILITARY REFORM

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as my colleagues are aware, Senator NUNN and I have carried on the work started by Senators John Tower and Henry Jackson to attempt to reorganize the military into more workable lines.

The September-October issue of Air University Review is almost entirely devoted to this subject, so I intend, at intervals, to put some of these writings into the RECORD so that my colleagues will have a better idea of how people wearing the uniform actually feel.

The first one that I will insert into the RECORD is written by Col. Thomas Fabyanic, entitled "The Cockpit Warning Light Reads 'Reform.'"

I ask unanimous consent that this article appear in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COCKPIT WARNING LIGHT READS "REFORM"

(By Col. Thomas A. Fabyanic, USAF, Ret.)

Periodic reform is an absolute necessity for any institution that intends to maintain its viability in the face of extensive external change or prolonged internal degeneration. Even a cursory examination of history will unearth numberous examples of political, economic, social, and military institutions that failed to meet the challenge of adaptation. A detailed study of these institutions, moreover, would reveal that in some instances collapse occurred at the very time institutional self-assessments were rendering judgments of basic soundness.

In military instititions, the need for reform usually becomes fully evident only after a clear military crisis of major proportions. This sequence of events need not be the case, however, since the external and internal causative factors that would indicate the need for reform quite often are evident beforehand. To recognize them, one needs to understand fully the phenomenon of war and, equally important, how it might be affected by prevailing and emerging circumstances. Such awareness, regrettably, is not apparent in today's U.S. military establishment.

If one views war within a Clausewitzian framework consisting of society, its government, and its military, and then applies that structure to the profound changes that have been occurring in much of the Third World, the first of several reform challenges for the U.S. military becomes very clear. Far-reaching political, economic, and social changes—accompanied by rising expectations—are evident throughout Latin America, the Middle East, and Southeast and Southwest Asia. Evident also are the conflicts likely to result, as well as our seeming inability to deal with them militarily. It is obvious that our employment concepts for "low-intensity conflict" or "constrained operations" are virtually nonexistent, and it is equally apparent that the conventional force structure available to us for use is based on an unsubstantiated assumption that what deters the Soviets will function adequately anywhere. Moreover, there appears to be little recognition that without prior development of employment concepts this force structure will remain irrelevant, regardless of its potential and flexibility. Vietnam and Lebanon are the most obvious examples of what probably lies ahead; whether future historians will view them as the beginning of the end of America's military prowess or as turning points in the continuing effort to achieve unparalleled military competence will depend largely on how we assess them now.

A far greater challenge, however, is an internal one involving the degeneration of our military organizational structure. In the course of organizational evolution, we have experienced a loss of military function. Anyone familiar with the existing structure can see the deficiencies readily. The Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) has become an institution within an institution; it routinely involves itself in professional military matters such as strategic and logistical planning and operational issues to include strategy and tactics. Too much authority is vested in the Secretary of Defense. By law, the secretary is responsible for professional military matters; but with very few exceptions, the individuals holding that office have not demonstrated sufficient competence. In the words of one analyst, "they found on-the-job training imperative," and "few passed the primer stage before they were replaced." The power vested in the secretary and OSD explains, in part, the corresponding lack of influence by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. In effect, the latter have been removed from the chain of command and replaced by bureaucrats who, for the most part, have no professional responsibility for the defense of the nation. The net results of this prolonged degeneration are obvious; they cast long, bold, and dark shadows that stretch from Vietnam, to a desert landing site in Iran, and thence through the remnants of a city called Beirut.

The most serious internal challenge, however, concerns professional military competence. Our only real reason for being, which is war, is not understood by many officers. All too frequently war is viewed as a great engineering enterprise; and, as a consequence, we prepare for war as it appears on paper rather than as it is likely to occur on the battlefield. Crucial issues at times are turned over to civilian experts who, like the bureaucrats in OSD, have a no long-term, direct responsibility for the nation's security. Such actions are necessary because programs still dominate purpose in the Pentagon and program managers continue to hold sway over strategists. The "management mania," although somewhat subdued, remains with us. Moreover, it is likely to remain, in part, because of the military's willingness to pay 75 percent of tuition fees for its officers to receive advanced degrees in business, management, and public administration. Given all this presumed management expertise by the uniformed military, one is tempted to ask, for example, why our defense procurement practices are in such a shambles. Those difficulties, when viewed in the context of our previously mentioned operational inadequacies, make one wonder whether we have sacrificed our previous military competence for a measure of managerial incompetence.

Perhaps it is time to reestablish ourselves as a professional military organization, one that understands war and knows how to prepare for it, deter it, and, if necessary, fight it across a spectrum of conflict. Fortunately, we have some professional officers who possess an understanding of war, and it is they who are capable of meeting the challenges of adaption. My advice to them is "Burners, now"!

TEXTILE WEEK ESSAY BY TINA DURHAM OF EASLEY, SC

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently, Textile Week was celebrated throughout our country. That week long observance focused attention on the importance of the textile industry to the economic well-being of our Nation. Various activities and events were held across my home State of South Carolina where textiles account for 48 percent of the manufacturing jobs. In Pickens County, all high school students were given the opportunity to write an essay pertaining to some aspect of textiles. Tina Durham, who attends Easley High School, won first place in this contest for her essay entitled "It Does Matter To Me." Tina is the daughter of Tommy and Sharon Durham, who are both long-time employees of Alice Manufacturing Co., in Easley.

I congratulate Tina for her well written essay and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"IT DOES MATTER TO ME"

(By Tina H. Durham)

The American textile industry, along with many other industries, is in desperate need of support from American citizens. Every individual in the United States relies upon the textile industry, whether directly or indirectly. For many years, there has been an ever-rising problem concerned with the trade of textiles. The foreign imports have increased so greatly until the American industries are worried about the role they will have in the future. The American people's freedom and power seem to be the only hope for these industries at the present.

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

—Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag

Our country was built upon these words and their meanings. It is only appropriate that we, as American citizens, should think of these words with honor and pride. When purchasing goods, the concern of the consumer should be centered around the Pledge of Allegiance.

Foreign trade is greatly affecting the American economy. Trade is no longer free or fair. As the foreign imports continue to increase, American jobs are being reduced. Every time a foreign-made product is purchased it decreases the demand for American-made products. The reduced demand for American-made products results in loss of jobs in this country.

When just one American job is lost due to an increase in imports, a chain reaction may follow. With the loss of a job, an individual loses the source of an income. This means he or she has no means of purchasing goods or services from others. As a result, other people are put out of work because they have fewer or no customers.

The wages people receive for thier services seem to be one of the major problems involved in American-made versus foreign-made. The American government has a set minimum wage, which is the least amount an employer can legally give an employee. In foreign countries, the wages are half as much or less than half as much. This means that they are able to produce more for less cost and, therefore, sell it for much less than the United States can.

These cheaper products are placed on shelves beside the higher American-made products. Some customers rarely look at anything other than the price of a product. Americans, to solve the job crisis, must start paying more attention to where a product is made rather than how much it costs. In the long run, Americans will end up the winners if they do so.

The support of the citizens in buying American-made goods will save American jobs and also save their own freedom. The future of the United States rests upon its citizens. The problem of foreign imports versus American-made products is a problem we must face and solve.

I am proud to say that it does matter to me, and I buy products made in the United States of America, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

LIBERTY HIGH SCHOOL HONORED FOR STATUE OF LIBERTY FUNDRAISING

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, on January 30, 1986, a group of very dedicated people are coming together at the Liberty High School in Bethlehem, PA, for a very special concert where the Oscar Mayer Corp. will present a donation of $250,000 for the restoration of the Statue of Liberty.

This event is the culmination of a project begun in January 1984, by Mr. Constantine "Gus" Loupos, a teacher at Liberty, who has been very instrumental in leading students of the Bethlehem Area School District in an effort to raise money for the Statue of Liberty's refurbishment.

So far, Mr. Loupos and his students in the Bethlehem area have raised some $30,000 for this effort. According to recent news reports, these students have raised more than any other students in the country.

As an incentive for the pupils to become involved in raising funds for Miss Liberty, the Oscar Mayer Corp. offered to donate 25 cents for every dollar raised by schoolchildren across the Nation.

Oscar Mayer has chosen to honor the Bethlehem School District for the amount of money it has raised and for the enthusiasm, commitment and involvement of the people involved in this fundraising effort.

At this time, Mr. President, I would personally like to recognize Mr. Loupos, his students, and those in the Bethlehem area who all have worked so tirelessly on this most important project.

I would like to thank Ms. Jean Cowden of the Oscar Mayer Corp. for honoring the Bethlehem School District, and also Ms. Sheila McCauley, director of the Liberty Centennial School Campaign for her exemplary work on this campaign.

As we all know, the Statue of Liberty is symbolic of the ideals on which this Nation was founded.

To have our schoolchildren—the future of our Nation—undertake such an endeavor as to raise $30,000 for the Statue of Liberty is most impressive.

I am indeed proud of all of the people who have sacrificed their time to donate their services for this noblest of causes.

THE BEST FOOTBALL TEAM IN AMERICA: THE UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to take this opportunity to congratulate the University of Oklahoma football team and coach Barry Switzer for winning their sixth national championship on New Year's Day.

The Sooners won by beating previously-unbeaten and No. 1 Penn State, 25 to 10, in the Orange Bowl.

Coach Switzer certainly deserves special recognition as this win brings to three the number of national championships he has won. He has brought great distinction to the Sooner football team, the University of Oklahoma, and our State. He is the winningest coach in college football.

Coach Switzer also won the national title in 1974 and 1975. The University of Oklahoma also secured the national title in 1950, 1955, and 1956 under Coach Bud Wilkinson.

Of course, the credit must be shared with the fine young athletes who make up the Sooners' team. Their brilliant teamwork and dogged determination against a tough Nittany Lion team made the national championship possible.

Among some of the noteworthy Orange Bowl statistics:

Lydell Carr's rushing total was the best against Penn State in a Bowl game;

Tim Lasher set an Orange Bowl record for most field goals kicked, he was successful on four attempts;

Tim also set a record for most points ever kicked against Penn State, 13.

I would also like to congratulate Penn State and Joe Paterno for their excellent season. They are a good football organization with a lot of pride and tradition. Knowing that they are an outstanding team makes the OU victory that much more significant.

My compliments to Coach Barry Switzer and the best football team in America: the University of Oklahoma.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, today, January 22, 1986, marks the 68th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. To millions of people in Ukraine, and to the thousands of Ukrainian Americans in Ohio and across the Nation, it is a day of special significance. On January 22, 1918 the independent republic was proclaimed. And while it endured but 3 short years, it is extremely important that this day and what it represents never be forgotten.

Ordinarily, the commemoration of an independence day is a cause for joy and celebration. But in this particular instance, there can be no such joy, and no such celebration. For the brutal fact of the matter is that Ukrainians still in the Soviet Union have been ruthlessly deprived of the basic human rights and freedoms of an independent people.

The people of Ukraine have been struggling for over 60 years to secure that freedom and independence. The Soviets, in typical and blatant disregard for basic human rights, have been attempting to grind down the Ukrainian people's spirit and destroy their national identify. They have not been successful. Despite systematic and unrelenting attacks by the Soviets on their customs, language and religion, the Ukrainian people have yet to let their desire for fundamental freedoms be dimmed.

Last year we witnessed a very personal example of that yearning for freedom in the case of Miroslav Medvid. It is a blight on our national conscience that we returned Mr. Medvid to a fate unthinkable at the hands of the Soviet oppressor. To insure that this will never happen again I have joined with a majority of my Senate colleagues in supporting a resolution to create a Special Senate Panel on Asylum. Let us use the occasion of Ukrainian Independence Day to pass this resolution so that the panel may begin its important task of examining and revising United States asylum procedures.

In this fact-paced world which gives us so many examples of human suffering and human rights violations, be they from South Africa, Chile, Afghanistan or Cambodia, the example of the continued suffering of the Ukrainian people cannot be allowed to drop from our consciousness. Over 50 years ago a Soviet-manufactured famine in Ukraine resulted in the deaths of 7 million men, women, and children. Time cannot be allowed to dilute the enormity of that tragedy. As long as the people of Ukraine continue to suffer under the stifling jackboot of Soviet imperialism, our solidarity with them cannot fail.

Today then is a day to commemorate, to keep the hope-light burning for the millions of Urkrainians in the Soviet Union and throughout the world, and to say to them: We have not forgotten your cause. We share your hopes and dreams that someday you shall truly be a free people and nation.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today, January 22, 1986, marks the 68th anniversary of the proclamation of independence in the Ukraine.

For a brief period of 3 years, the Ukrainian nation and its people enjoyed self-determination and a national identity. Ukrainian culture and religious tradition flourished. The Ukraine enjoyed the fundamental right of territorial integrity.

In 1921, this period of Ukrainian freedom was abruptly ended by the outside intervention of the Soviet Union. Troops crushed the Ukrainian democracy and replaced freedom with repression and continuing persecution. We are witnessing the Sovietization of the Ukraine. Its people are denied even the opportunity to explore Ukrainian history and their ethnic heritage.

Those of us who enjoy freedom in this country must continue to recognize an independent Ukraine. We must demonstrate solidarity with its citizens, and keep the spirit of their aspirations alive. For these reasons, we recognize the 68th anniversary of Ukrainian indepencence.

LUCIA CHASE EWING, FOUNDER, AMERICAN BALLET THEATER

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, on January 9, 1986, one of the great figures in American dance died. Lucia Chase Ewing not only cofounded the world-renowned American Ballet Theater but devoted almost her entire adult life to building and nurturing this great dance company and national cultural treasure. Her dedication to her company and her devotion to the art of dance were her most remarkable qualities.

But she was also a warm and quiet family person whose parents had adopted Rhode Island as their summer home. From her early childhood, she came to the seashore at Narragansett for a change of pace from her life in the international dance community.

Lucia Chase Ewing was a brilliant, dedicated, and generous individual whose lifetime work in the field of dance has made life richer for all of us.

I would like to share the obituary of Miss Chase that recently appeared in the Providence Journal-Bulletin with my Senate colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Providence (RI) Journal-Bulletin, Jan. 11, 1986]

LUCIA CHASE EWING DIES; LED AMERICAN BALLET THEATER TO WORLD RENOWN

(By Gerald S. Goldstein)

Lucia Chase Ewing, 88, of New York City and Narragansett, a ballerina who co-founded and co-directed the world-renowned American Ballet Theater, died Thursday at her Manhattan apartment.

Gracious, dignified and persevering, Mrs. Ewing was consumed with love for the ballet, both early in her career as a dancer and later, when over a 35-year span she built an international reputation for the New York company.

A glamorous, auburn-haired world traveler who performed actively until she was nearly 50 and danced character roles into her 70s, Mrs. Ewing co-founded the ballet company in 1940. She became co-director, with Oliver Smith, in 1945.

"It's a small circus," she said once in describing the life of a dance company director—but she attacked the job with a passion that lasted all her life.

As well, Mrs. Ewing loved her summer home in Narragansett, and often—even on damp, sunless days—could be seen walking the beach in front of the Dunes Club, where she was a member.

She came to Narragansett with maid, cook and butler, and was partial to giving small dinner parties on Saturday nights. She bought all the food at the tiny Ideal Market, as her parents had done before her in a family tradition that spanned 65 years.

During her tenure as co-director, the dance company attracted luminaries who won it a reputation as an innovator in American ballet. Among them were dancer Mikhail Baryshnikov and choreographers Jerome Robbins and Twyla Tharp.

Known professionally as Lucia Chase, Mrs. Ewing was a tireless campaigner for her art and her ballet company; during one four-month period the troupe visited 22 cities in 11 countries, prompting her to remark, "We're not particular where we go as long as we're out pioneering."

The pleasure her dance company brought to its audiences, both in this country and on international tour, was in contrast to the sorrow she experienced in her own life.

Her husband, carpet company heir Thomas Ewing Jr., died of pneumonia in 1933, seven years after they were married. In 1963, Mrs. Ewing's eldest son, Thomas III, 34, drowned when his sloop sank off Watch Hill.

Jealous of her private times at the seashore, Mrs. Ewing liked to say that she lived two lives—one as Lucia Chase, New York theater director, and the other as Mrs. Thomas Ewing Jr., low-profile Narragansett resident. So great was here desire to keep the two separate that she once threatened never to speak to a Journal-Bulletin reporter again because he refused, in a story featuring one of her historic properties in town, to leave out all references to the Lucia Chase of international ballet fame.

Despite here refined demeanor, Mrs. Ewing did not shrink from battle when she thought she had been wronged; once she sued the Town of Narragansette because she thought a property revaluation was unfair; eventually she won out-of-court concessions.

But she contributed to the town as well; she was one of a group of donors who helped buy what is now a public park on the ocean side of the post office.

Among the properties she owned in Narragansett was the historic, 100-acre Sunset Farm on Point Judity Road, where her millionaire husband once kept the polo ponies he brought in by rail.

Her summer home, "Moonraker," on Taylor Street was flanked by four other turn-of-the-century guest houses she owned: "High Tide," "Miramar," "Sans Souci" and "Seashell."

She inherited her love of the Rhode Island shore from her parents. She was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Chase of Waterbury, Conn., who summered for years at Narragansett Pier.

Mrs. Ewing was a millionaire many times over. Her husband, the eldest nephew of carpet king Alexander Smith Cochran, inherited the company and left $7 million. Her family had wealth of its own, however, amassed through the Waterbury Clock Co.

Mrs. Ewing was known internationally for her fierce commitment to the Ballet Theater, now directed by Baryshnikov, who succeeded her in 1980. In a statement released after her death, he said of her:

"She was a realist, but she lived like an idealist, and in the darkest time she could force the sun to shine. She stood by us all with love and a will of iron and a heart like a lion."

Mrs. Ewing contributed much of her own money to the theater, and fought vigorously for backing from other sources.

"She was single-tracked on the ballet—it was everything to her," said a nephew, Irving Sheldon of Saunderstown.

Educated at St. Margaret's School and Bryn Mawr College, she left social life behind and moved to New York to study theater, voice and dance, eventually making a debut with the Mikhail Mordkin Ballet.

Among many awards she won was the Medal of Freedom, presented by President Carter at the White House in 1980.

Mrs. Ewing suffered a stroke in 1983 and had been unable to visit Narragansett since then, according to her secretary, Lois Doherty.

Mrs. Ewing is survived by a son, Alexander, of Millbrook, N.Y.; two sisters, Mrs. Edward T. Carmody of Middlebury, Conn., and Mrs. John Griffith Davies of Bourton-on-the-Water, Gloucestershire, England; and three grandchildren.

A funeral service will be held at 9:30 a.m. Monday at St. James Episcopal Church, Madison Avenue, New York City. Burial will be private.

U.S. APPEALS COURT RULING TO PERMIT JAPANESE AMERICAN WORLD WAR II INTERNEES TO SUE GOVERNMENT ACCENTUATES GREATNESS OF AMERICA

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, on Monday, January 20, 1986, Americans of all races and religious faiths celebrated the birthday of a great champion of human rights by observing the first national holiday ever dedicated to the memory of a nonwhite citizen, Martin Luther King, Jr. In keeping with that same spirit of justice for all, on Tuesday, January 21, a day later, the U.S. Court of Appeals, here in the Nation's Capital, reversed the decision of the lower court and ruled that Japanese Americans detained in relocation camps during World War II and never compensated can sue the Federal Government for property losses sustained because of such detention.

The decision of the appeals court is good news not only for those Japanese Americans it affects but for our country as a whole. The majority ruling in this case affirms that justice delayed is justice denied—and injustice of the magnitude inflicted upon the World War II internees cannot be healed by time, without a national recognition of the wound to our own body politic itself. Implicit in this opinion is a recognition that the Federal Government erred. The real tragic mistake was the internment of 120,000 U.S. citizens and resident aliens for no reason other than their ethnic origin, although the error the appeals court recognized in its opinion was in the suppressing of evidence that contradicted claims of wartime expediency in earlier arguments before the Supreme Court. This judicial recognition of that injustice benefits all citizens because it reaffirms our great Nation's commitment to a government of justice and fair play for everyone, regardless of race, color or ethnic origin.

The appeals court ruling supports the 19 detainees who brought the suit, as well as those other Americans of Japanese ancestry who have never received any compensation for their losses incurred at the time of their internment. It is important to bear in mind, however, that this ruling does not affect reparations legislation currently pending in Congress, which is designed to accord official recognition of the injuries inflicted by unjustified and illegal Government action and to offer compensation to all those interned, including those who may have received as little as 10 cents on the dollar for lost property under the American-Japanese Evacuation Claims Act of 1948. I am most gratified that the appeals court has established the creation of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment by Congress in 1980 as the starting date from which the statute of limitations should run. This should spur early congressional action on the bill to carry out the commission's recommendations. I heartily applaud the majority statement in the opinion that "it ill behooves the Government of a free people to evade an honest accounting" of this historic injustice. America is undeniably the land of the free and home of the brave, where the biggest dreams of the littlest people still come true.

IN CELEBRATION OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I join with Ukrainians all over the world in celebrating the 68th anniversary of the Proclamation of the Independence of Ukraine. To mark this important event, I am honored to be a cochairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America's annual Ukrainian Independence Day celebration, which will be held in Washington tomorrow.

On this date 68 years ago, the Independent Ukrainian National Republic was born. After centuries of living under czarist Russian domination, the Ukrainians people, through the act of January 22, 1918, rejected Russian colonial imperialism and established, by popular, democratic vote, their own independent republic. Freedom of speech, the press, religion, assembly and association, were among the rights guaranteed under the act. In addition, all minorities were given both national and personal autonomy.

Ukrainian independence, however, was shortlived, and within 3 years, the struggling nation was defeated by the stronger military forces of the Russian Bolsheviks.

In the 68 years since the defeat of the independent republic, life in Soviet-dominated Ukraine has been characterized by persecution, genocide, and a campaign of russification aimed at eliminating every vestige of Ukrainian cultural and religious life.

During 1932 and 1933, 7 million Ukraininans were purposefully starved to death in government-planned famines, while others were deported to slave labor camps in Siberia. In addition, certain Ukrainian religions were abolished and the Ukrainian language was removed from the educational system.

Despite these blatant violations of their rights, the brave Ukrainian people continue the struggle to regain the independence they once enjoyed. The past six decades have shown that all the military strength of the Soviet authorities can never succeed in crushing the spirit and the drive for freedom of the Ukrainian people.

The large Ukrainian-American community in my State of Michigan has been a source of continuing inspiration to those Ukrainians still struggling against Soviet oppression, and has helped keep the dream of freedom alive in the hearts and minds of their countrymen.

Today, we demonstrate our solidarity with the effort to ensure the human rights of the Ukrainian people. As part of that effort, we repeat our call upon the Soviet Government to honor its pledge under the Helsinki Final Act, to protect the human rights of all its people.

We must renew our pledge to speak out on behalf of the many Ukrainians who have been unjustly subjected to imprisonment, exile, or psychiatric incarceration for defending their cultural identity and religious beliefs.

American support for the restoration of Ukrainian liberation signifies not only our disdain for the injustice of Ukrainian subjugation by the Soviet Union, but also our firm commitment to the right of self-determination of all the peoples of the world. In the same way that the American people have shown their opposition to the apartheid policies of the South African Government which denies the rights of its nonwhite citizens, so too must we be clear and unwavering in our call for the restoration of human rights to the citizens of Eastern Europe's captive nations.

As Americans, whose freedoms are guaranteed by law, it is often difficult for us to conceive of the persecution and repression endured by Ukrainians and citizens of other captive nations.

The recent case of Ukrainian seaman Miroslav Medvid reminds us not only of their suffering but also of our responsibility to respond to the cry for help of those seeking freedom.

The controversy surrounding the true intentions of Seaman Medvid is not yet resolved. Nevertheless, his case serves as a poignant reminder of the countless numbers of Ukrainians whose struggle for freedom is far from over.

As a nation which has always provided refuge to people throughout the world fleeing oppression, I believe top priority must be given to both thoroughly investigating the Medvid incident, and establishing proper procedures for the handling of asylum cases. We must ensure that full consideration is afforded every individual seeking asylum in this country.

Mr. President, by repeatedly demonstrating our support for people struggling for their rights to live as free individuals, we give renewed meaning to the democratic principles on which our own Nation was founded.

Today's remembrance of the ongoing struggle in Ukraine is an important part of that effort, and I am proud to be a part of it.

PROBLEMS IN THE THIRD WORLD

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, as legislators, we know only too well that all the money in the world won't solve a problem unless that problem is properly defined.

Solutions to the environmental disasters and development problems in the Third World have eluded us for years. Despite an enormous expenditure of funds by international organizations and individual countries, many Third World nations are no better off than they were several decades ago. Indeed, in some cases, they are actually in worse shape.

To understand why aid programs have failed in the past, we must have a much better grasp of the true nature of the problems we face in the developing world.

The Cox newspapers recently published a superb eight-part series which makes an important contribution to our understanding of the complex issues involved. A team of Cox reporters spent nearly a year examining the causes of disasters in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Their chilling reports make clear that human practices and policies are too often responsible for the disasters we label "acts of God." As the reporters discovered, precious aid resources are devoted to these emergencies as they occur, but that means little money or energy is left over for the kind of long-range planning which could have averted the disasters in the first place.

Mr. President, we simply cannot afford to waste increasingly limited aid funds on shortsighted, ineffective aid programs. For us, it is a budget question. For the Third World, it is a question of lives.

The Cox series serves as an excellent primer on the nature and scope of the problems in the Third World. The Atlanta Journal and Atlanta Constitution, as well as other Cox newspapers, began running the series in early December.

Inserted below is the initial overview story, but I strongly urge my colleagues to read the entire series. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

"ACT OF GOD" OFTEN CAUSED BY ACT OF MAN—ALTERING THE ENVIRONMENT MAKES IT MORE VULNERABLE

(By Andrew Alexander and Jeff Nesmith)

WASHINGTON.—As the world grows more crowded, it is becoming more vulnerable to droughts, earthquakes and other so-called "natural disasters."

The result is that millions of people, mostly in poor countries, are living every day in increasing danger of being swept away by some event that will be dismissed as an "act of God."

But an in-depth study by Cox Newspapers—based on satellite imagery, specially constructed computer models, and interviews in 15 nations on five continents—has produced evidence that, more often than not, human deaths in events like an African drought, a Mexico City earthquake or a Bangladesh flood are not simply "natural disasters."

Rather, they result from acts of man—unrestrained population growth, shoddy construction, poor land use planning, overgrazing, overcultivation, deforestation—that are forcing people into areas where they are more vulnerable to calamities.

On television screens the tragedies are pathetic, often gripping, but they seem faraway. In fact, they affect us directly beause a disaster-prone world is an unstable world.

As former President Jimmy Carter says, a failure to understand the impact that hopelessness and despair can have on other people causes a "distortion" in our understanding of revolution and social upheaval.

Besides that, disasters are expensive. Repeatedly, we see dollars diverted from other causes to lessen the suffering from a disaster that might have been avoided.

The Cox inquiry found evidence that on a scale perhaps unparalleled in history, humans are altering the environment in ways that are making it more prone to disasters.

Long before the Ethiopian famine etched the listless gaze of starving children on the consciousness of America, a U.S. government official stationed in Addis Ababa sent this alarming internal report back to his superiors in the State Department:

"There is an environmental nightmare unfolding before our eyes. It is the result of the acts of millions of Ethiopians struggling for survival: scratching the surface of eroded land and eroding it further, cutting down the trees for warmth and fuel and leaving the country denuded, diverting streams to irrigate dry land and depriving others of their water source."

Vast regions of the country would become "permanent disaster areas," the American official warned, and masses of people would be forced to the edge of death.

That memorandum was written in 1978. Today, although hundreds of thousands are said to have died, experts fear the conditions could worsen again within the next few years.

DISASTERS OCCURRING MORE FREQUENTLY

Other key findings from the Cox Newspapers survey:

The frequency and severity of "natural" disasters are rising. The upward trend is expected to continue. Predicts noted disaster expert E.L. Quarantelli: "We're going to have more and bigger disasters."

Repeated warnings—like the one issued seven years ago from Ethopia—that could have diminished the impact of past disasters have gone unheeded. New warnings are being neglected today by decision-makers throughout the world, including those within the Reagan administration, despite predictions of more devastating and more frequent disasters.

The magnitude of disasters in developing countries is now so great that even larger amounts of foreign emergency assistance can't significantly mitigate them. "The problem is growing too fast for us to keep up," says a United Nations official. "It is beyond our ability to cope."

Disaster relief operations often are slow to respond, lack coordination, rely on inadequate or poorly trained staff, and sometimes end up doing more harm than good. Inappropriate relief aid, like powdered diet food sent to African drought victims or high-heeled shoes to earthquake sites, abounds. Yet there are no international guidelines to discourage it.

Although well-intentioned emergency aid often is not cost-effective because little of it is tied to relief projects aimed at preventing the calamity from recurring. Further, emergency assistance often is given on political—not humanitarian—grounds. It also tends to favor sudden disasters such as earthquakes, which kill quickly, while neglecting "creeping" disasters such as drought, which affect far more people.

"It is a paradox that in our technological age, with an enlarged capacity to manipulate nature, man's vulnerability to injury from natural hazard seems to be increasing," observes Bindi V. Shah of the London School of Economics.

Indeed, figures from a Swedish Red Cross study show that, worldwide, the average number of people affected by drought each year rose from 18.5 million in the 1960s to 24.4 million in the 1970s. The annual number of flood victims grew from 5.2 million to 15.4 million during the same period, while the average number affected by earthquakes jumped from 200,000 to 1.2 million. And those affected yearly by civil strife, which contributes to disasters such as the famine in Ethiopia, nearly quadrupled to 4 million between the two decades.

DECISION-MAKERS TO PEASANTS AT FAULT

"It is not only population growth and people's migration into disaster-prone areas that cause the increase in disasters," the Swedish Red Cross reported last year, "but new hazards created by people."

Recent studies indicate that these trends have continued into the 1980s.

"All the evidence in this office is that we are faced with more emergency situations than we ever have been," says Marcus Thompson of Oxfam, the British relief organization.

But who is to blame?

Experts say nearly everyone, from powerful decision-makers to landless peasants. And that includes the media.

"Journalists often innocently accept the view that high winds and water killed so many thousand victims of a given cyclone," write disaster specialists Anders Wijkman and Lloyd Timberlake. "They do not dig to see why so many people were allowed to live in such dangerous houses exposed to a storm surge, indeed, why they could not live anywhere else."

"I think the media are not generally very responsible in the reporting of disasters," says Frederick C. Cuny, a respected disaster expert. "But I still blame it more on the [disaster relief] system, because the system hasn't looked at the problem and then done a good job of educating the press."

Late last August, as he talked to a reporter in his Dallas office, Cuny issued a private warning that had been repeated publicly for decades: "Mexico City is probably the most vulnerable city in the world to earthquakes. One of these days we're going to get a wave, everything will come tumbling down, and you guys will call it a natural disaster."

His prediction came true three weeks later, and he flew to Mexico to help. Sifting through the rubble, he concluded that the earthquake had been powerful enough to damage even the best-designed buildings, but he also saw the human hand in the "natural" disaster that killed more than 8,000.

"I would say probably 60 percent of those deaths could have been prevented had the construction work been done properly," he said afterward. "It's very much a man-made disaster."

Most disasters are preceded by warnings.

Geologists had recommended that plans for evacuation be prepared a month before November's volcanic eruption in Colombia triggered mudslides that killed more than 20,000.

CROWDED LIVING AREAS INCREASE RISK

The 5,000 who were washed away in Bangladesh last May by cyclone-induced tidal waves had been cautioned repeatedly against inhabiting the tiny, shifting "char" islands formed by silt collecting in the river deltas. But land shortage caused by high population had forced them there. After the storm, the survivors settled there once again, just as they did in 1970 after 300,000 perished in a similar storm.

The 150 Puerto Rican peasants buried when rains triggered a landslide in October lost their lives because population pressure and lack of affordable land had left them little choice but to build their shanty-town on a slope known to be unstable. Contributing to the tragedy were leaking water lines and septic tanks that saturated and loosened the ground, a problem authorities conceded had been recognized for 15 years.

Although it was hailed throughout the world as a pioneering study, Global 2000 was greeted with hooting derision by the Reagan administration.

A similar warning was sounded this year by the World Bank, which declared that destruction of environmental systems is "assuming massive proportions" in many Third World countries.

In travels to five continents, Cox reporters found seeds of disasters to come.

On the Asian island of Borneo, a fire in a tropical rain forest—an unheard of event that received scant press attention in the West—burned 8.6 million acres two years ago, an area almost as large as Maryland and Delaware combined. Experts say a major cause was deforestation.

Few, if any, people died in the months-long blaze because the island is sparsely populated. But as part of a development program, Indonesia plans by the end of the century to relocate tens of thousands of citizens to Borneo from the overpopulated main island of Java. The government plans to clear more than 80 million acres of rain forest—an area larger than Georgia and Florida combined. In an interview, a top government minister conceded that by drying out the island environment, the deforestation could increase chances of another massive fire—this time in an inhabited area.

BANGLADESH WELLS ENDANGER ITS WATER

In the northeastern part of Bangladesh, one of the most densely populated countries on earth, so many wells have been drilled that water tables are dropping. Many experts predict that a critical shortage is imminent—crop losses and pockets of famine would be likely—yet action has been stymied for years by a dispute over the best solution.

Throughout Central America, the Caribbean and Mexico, population growth and stagnant economies will result in massive dislocations by the end of the century. Traced in a series of special computer models developed by Cox Newspapers for this series, the trends inevitably will turn up the pressure on America's southern borders.

In the Soviet Union, Kremlin planners desperately seek water to refill the Caspian Sea, which is drying up partly because too much of the water in its tributaries has been diverted for irrigation projects. In recent weeks, final approval was decreed for the initial phase of a massive project to divert and reverse part of the flow of rivers that empty into the Arctic. Some experts has warned that too much diversion could damage th Arctic ice cap and provoke regional and even global climatic changes.

And in Africa, Ethiopians continue to die amid what one relief worker fears may become a "cycle of famine."

Optimists like M. Peter McPherson, head of the U.S. Agency for International Development, believe that the current focus on Africa's problems will yield help and hope for the future.

But McPherson concedes that "right now, yes, we're losing ground."

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on January 22, 1918, the courageous people of the Ukraine proudly declared their independence as a nation. Exactly 1 year later, on January 22, 1919, the governing council of the Ukraine, the Rada, passed the Act of Union incorporating all the lands of the Ukraine into a single nation. January 22 has become an important symbol of the determination and strength of the Ukrainian people, providing all of us an opportunity to reflect upon the proud heritage of our fellow citizens, Americans of Ukrainian descent, and to renew our commitment to the principles of freedom for which Ukrainian Independence Day stands.

It is fitting that as we honor the declaration of Ukrainian independence, we should pay special tribute to the men and women of the Ukraine who today carry forward, at great personal sacrifice and in the face of terrible odds, the quest for human liberty. It is almost a decade now since the establishment of the Ukrainian Helsinki Watch Group; in the wake of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, 10 Ukrainians joined together to declare their commitment to the full implementation of the Helsinki provisions, in the face of official harassment and repression in their native land.

The arduous work of defending human rights, often carried on in prison, today commands attention and sympathy the world over. The heroes of the movement are many. In some cases, their names are well known to us. Valentin Moroz, whom I have the honor to know, now lives among us; others—Lev Lukyanenko, Mykola Horbal, Mykola and Raisa Rudenko, Yosyf Zisels, and Vasyl Stus—are prisoners and aliens in their own land. In many cases, however, men and women whose names may never be known to us nonetheless perform heroic tasks. The name Myroslav Medvid will not soon be forgotten. Important legislation would require a full accounting of his tragic case, so that it can never be repeated.

There is a second tribute to be paid today to the hundreds of thousands of Americans of Ukrainian descent whose energies and talents have enriched our land, who have made valuable contributions to the growth of America through their participation in the arts, science, politics, business, and other endeavors. We in Maryland are very fortunate to have a large and active Ukrainian American community. Through their stable family life, their sense of community responsibility, and their social and religious activities, Ukrainians in Maryland have greatly enriched the quality of life in our State.

January 22, Ukrainian Independence Day, is therefore a day for tribute and reflection. We pay tribute to the dream of freedom, and to the courage of those who pursue it; we pay tribute to Americans of Ukrainian heritage for their enduring commitment to the principle of liberty which they have so amply demonstrated throughout their history and for the continuing contributions Ukrainian Americans have made to the strength, progress, and prosperity of our Nation. Let us reflect on the events of 68 years ago even as we honor the heroes of today.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 638, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 638, a bill to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise in support of the motion to proceed on S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985.

I believe the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, Senator DANFORTH, and my colleagues on the Commerce Committee have done an admirable and conscientious job in their thorough examination of the complex issues surrounding the return of Conrail to the private sector. I support the committee's bill which provides for the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp., the bidder recommended by Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole.

Mr. President, I believe now is the time for the Senate to move forward and consider this matter. The Senate and House, through extensive committee hearings in both bodies, have thoroughly reviewed the issues presented. Before this matter even came to the Congress, Secretary Dole spent over 2 years studying this issue and developing her plan to sell Conrail.

One issue that has been the subject of much debate is the question of taxes. Unfortunately, while there are legitimate issues presented by this sale, the tax impact of this transaction has been the subject of a great deal of overstatement and, in certain instances, even misinterpretation.

For example, the claim has been made that Norfolk Southern will receive special tax treatment under this transaction. This claim simply is not true. Existing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code that govern a stock sale will apply in this case—there are no special tax breaks or special treatment in either S. 638 or the agreement between Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation. There is only one difference in this transaction, and that difference is unfavorable to Norfolk Southern: it must give up Conrail's net operating loss and investment tax credit carryovers.

Another exaggerated claim is the benefit to Norfolk Southern from use of excess depreciation; that is, depreciation that Conrail would not be able to utilize against its own income. However, a stand-alone Conrail, either through sale of tax benefits or the establishment of subsidiary corporations, would clearly take advantage of every available option to use this excess depreciation. Conrail has made abundant use of tax shelters in the past, and it would clearly do so in the future, with a longrun revenue loss comparable to any revenue impact of a purchase of Conrail by Norfolk Southern.

All of these issues are overshadowed by one point—who pays Federal taxes and who does not? The contrast here between Norfolk Southern and Conrail is dramatic. An independent Conrail is a tax shelter—it contributes nothing to the Federal Treasury. Conrail has never paid any Federal income taxes, and under the Morgan Stanley plan or any other stand-alone option, it will not in the future pay any taxes to the Federal Treasury.

Compare this to Norfolk Southern. Norfolk Southern is now and will continue to be a significant Federal taxpayer, but more importantly, Norfolk Southern pays the vast majority of all the Federal taxes paid by the entire railroad industry. In 1984, for example, Norfolk Southern paid over $150 million in Federal taxes; the net amount contributed by the entire industry was only about $172 million. Moreover, as a profitable member of the Norfolk Southern rail system, Conrail in the future will become a taxpayer itself.

In summary, I urge the Senate to move forward to the consideration of S. 638. This issue has been exhaustively studied and we have before us a sound public policy option—selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I found the remarks of my distinguished colleague and friend from Oregon having to do with the tax aspects of the transaction to be of particular interest, and I think it is a subject to which I intend to reply in some detail but I do not believe it appropriate to do so in this moment.

I will be brief on that subject in my remarks today, and then at a later point I will address the issue more fully. But as a preparatory statement I would point out that there are some specific representations and agreements that are made as pertains to the handling of the tax aspects for this transaction as a part of the agreement. In some instances that would not be that important. When the U.S. Government is a party to the agreement, then it becomes particularly relevant.

This company, Conrail, has better than $2 billion in net operating loss carry-forwards, and there are some specifics that deal with the manner in which those funds are to be handled. They are very relevant. They are not unimportant considerations.

I will address that subject later in much greater detail, and point out that not all of what looks like gold glitters—quite the opposite. I think this agreement that we are called upon to approve by legislation does real harm to the whole concept of tax equity and tax fairness, and does provide for some tax special benefits written right into the deal. But, as I said, I do not want to discuss that now.

I want to discuss my colleague's question of whether or not we really ought to be proceeding at this point with this legislative proposal. Many of us have strong opposition to the entire issue as to whether the sale should be made. But that is not the main thrust of what I am about to say.

The issue at the moment is, should we or should we not proceed forward at this time to deal with the sale of Conrail?

You have to take into consideration in discussing that subject the fact that this Government which is very much in need of revenue has sitting out there an offer from Morgan Stanley $200 million over and above the Norfolk Southern deal, and the First Boston Corp., and Allen Co., have a proposal to come in with $400 million over the $1.2 billion.

I am not prepared to debate on the floor of the Senate the merits of the Norfolk Southern proposal, the merits of the First Boston and Allen Co., proposal, but I am prepared to maintain as strongly as I know how that when there is anywhere from $200 million to $400 million out there on the table available to the Government, we owe it to the taxpayers of this country to explore whether or not we can get not only that $200 million or $400 million but to explore whether or not it is not possible to obtain a figure substantially in excess of either the $1.2 billion, the $1.4 billion, or the $1.6 billion.

I should point out parenthetically that the manner in which the Government took bids in connection with this matter was most unusual if not unique. The Government obtained an appraisal. Normally, an owner selling some portion or all of their assets would not then share that appraisal with the public.

But what happened in this instance is that the Government obtained the appraisal, immediately went public with that fact, and told the bidders what the appraisal was. As a consequence, eight bids came in, and to the best of my recollection, I think all eight of them were at the $1.2 billion figure. So you truly did not have a competitive bidding situation.

Beyond that fact, we must deal with the entire issue of antitrust. The antitrust department has indicated in phase 1 that they now think there may be some reason to permit the deal to go forward. They think that the Senate ought to continue considering this matter at the very same time that they proceed forward with an evaluation and examination of the balance of the antitrust issues which are truly the most important issues in phase 2.

The answer to that matter is that phase 2 will not be concluded for some time.

Let me share with my colleagues a letter just received, January 21, 1986, from the U.S. Railway Association. Because I think it is so important, I am going to read it in the entirety. It is not that long.

DEAR SENATOR METZENBAUM: Steve Berger asked me to respond to your January 17 inquiry about an assessment of the latest Norfolk Southern divestiture plan. We received a similar request from Congressman James J. Florio, USRA's reply to which is provided as an attachment. Submitted December 3, that reply is now out of date in certain ways which I will cover here.

Generally, the attachment describes the schedule for our review of the divestiture plan, the criteria enunciated by the Department of Justice for its assessment of the plan, and the information required by Justice, its consultants, and USRA in order to assess compliance with Justice's criteria. USRA could finish its study of the divestiture plan within four to six weeks after receiving the appropriate details of the plan from Norfolk Southern and the divestiture carriers, Guilford Transportation Industries and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie.

Here we come to the critical language.

Unfortunately, despite the optimism expressed in our December 3 letter, the carriers have not yet provided Justice or USRA with the required information. We also are informed that Justice is about a month behind the original schedule for selecting its expert consultants and initiating their contract work. Justice now indicates that the consultant contract might be awarded during the first week of February.

The as yet available data and analyses thereof are essential for the application of Justice criteria. The attachment indicates several specific areas of concern with the earlier divestiture plans, as determined by both Justice and USRA analyses. Justice's estimate of the level of effort for its consultants to study the revised plan is 497 man days over approximately two months.

We will advise you periodically as to the status of information supplied by the carriers, and any other circumstances that might bear upon our work schedule as set forth above.

Sincerely,

JOHN WELLS,
Vice President and Staff Director.

What that letter says in essence is that they are trying to do an analysis but they cannot get the information from the carriers as to what the facts are, and the Justice Department has not even commenced the study that it has promised the Congress that it would complete.

There are many other major problems with respect to this proposed sale, and I intend to discuss each of them in some detail.

Let us start off with the fact that Conrail is a money-making operation. It has been since 1981. It recently was recognized as one of the best operated railroads in the country.

In 1984, Conrail earned over $500 million. In 1983, Conrail earned $313 million. In 1982, it earned $174 million. In 1981, it earned $39 million.

That is not bad, to go from $39 million to $313 million to over $500 million; 1985 from all reports was a good year. In the last quarter, I think the earnings were up 22 percent, according to my recollection.

What are we doing with that? We are saying that this very viable, efficiently operated railroad that is earning somewhere around $500 million a year we are going to give away. That is the only term I can use, we are going to give it away for $1.2 billion, and we are going to give them some goodies with it. We are going to give them $800 million in cash. That is not bad. One billion two hundred million dollars and you get $800 million in cash. That means your net costs are $400 million for a railroad earning $400 million or $500 million a year.

Then we are going to give them $250 million in excess assets in the pension fund. Under the laws we are familiar with, those pension funds have been and continue to be terminated to the extent of over $9 billion in the last 5 years during the Reagan administration.

Then we are going to give them $3.5 billion in depreciable capital assets. We are also going to give them something in the area of $2 billion of net operating losses, although there is some language with respect to that subject as I indicated to the distinguished Senator from Oregon earlier. There are some limitations with respect to the efficacy of the limitations that are provided for in the memorandum of agreement.

Some, including the Department of Transportation, have argued that Conrail's profit figures since 1981 are inflated because Conrail has not had to pay State taxes or industry-level wages.

But Conrail is paying industry-level wages now. In 1984, it paid out $60 million in additional dollars to its employees to bring them up to the industry standard. In 1985, Conrail deposited in escrow $12 million for the purpose of paying its State taxes.

The result: Conrail's performance for 1985 sets the record straight. After taking into account these new costs, Conrail made a net profit in 1985 of $440 million.

Think of it. For $1.2 billion, you get $800 million in cash, you get $440 million in profits, you get $250 million that you can pick up by terminating the pension fund, and you get $3.5 billion to depreciate.

You would not believe that such a deal was possible if it were not the reality that it is here on the floor of the U.S. Senate and we are being asked to approve it.

Conrail is continuing to turn in a strong financial performance, despite 1985's weaker business environment for the railroad industry. Its operating income performance far exceeded most other railroads and was comparable to Norfolk Southern. Conrail's 1985 earnings are only half the picture. In 1985, Conrail spent $562 million for capital projects and maintenance. Conrail's cash balance increased by $60 million to $910 million.

Unquestionably, Conrail's performance puts it right at the top of the class compared to all other major railroads in the country. Conrail is a viable, long-term contender.

I heard some argue yesterday on the floor of the Senate that Conrail could not continue to make it. Why? Why could not Conrail continue to make it? It is doing exceptionally well. It is keeping its capital expenditures up. It is making profits. It is a well-run operation. There is absolutely no reason why we should give away the Conrail properties to Norfolk Southern for a paltry $1.2 billion.

That is particularly true in view of the increased offer from Morgan Stanley of $1.4 billion and the fact that the Allen/First Boston group has an offer in at $1.6 billion.

Why in the world are we continuing this $1.2 billion Norfolk Southern offer with all of its attendant antitrust and labor problems when Morgan Stanley has an offer on the table that would pay the Government $1.4 billion up front in cash?

So that I may make my position clear with respect to the Morgan Stanley offer, there are some in this body that feel very strongly that the Morgan Stanley offer should be accepted. I am frank to say to you that I think we can get more than the $1.4 billion for this railroad. I am frank to say to you that I think the figure will go up considerably if we just give the free enterprise system an opportunity to act. I believe that what we ought to do is withdraw the matter from the Senate at the present time, that the Secretary of Transportation should then take sealed bids, sealed bids setting out the terms and conditions under which the U.S. Government would be willing to sell this property, and I predict, as I predicted earlier that we could get more than $1.2 billion, I predict we can get substantially in excess of $1.4 billion.

There is another aspect of this giveaway that is worth noting. Most everyone knows that the Government would receive $1.2 billion for its interest in Conrail's common stock. What some people may not realize, however, is that $851 million of long-term debentures and 73 million shares of preferred stock which the Government holds would be canceled entirely. Conrail has never declared dividends on the stock nor paid interest in cash on the debentures. Its cumulative income has not reached the $500 million target points, but it will reach that target point in 1988.

Under continued Federal ownership, in 1988 Conrail will pay the Government nearly $300 million in interest and dividends and Conrail will pay $300 million more in 1989 and an additional $300 million in 1990.

I want to emphasize that. We are talking about picking up $1.2 billion and what a great idea that is. If nothing happens between now and 1988, we are going to have Conrail repaying the Government $300 million in interest and dividends, another $300 million in 1989, and another $300 million in 1990, or $900 million in that short period alone.

Thereafter, as long as Conrail remains profitable, it is obligated to pay the Government half its yearly income in interest and dividend payments until the debentures are retired in the year 2011.

Mr. President, that is a substantial amount of money. That is revenues that the Federal Government could put to use in reducing the deficit. But under this deal, the preferred stock and debentures would be canceled and all that money would be lost.

I think there is some irony in the fact that we got back into session yesterday and the first thing we did was have a White House conference in which the Republican leadership of the House and the Senate met with the President and talked about the challenge of balancing the budget and all of the cuts that will have to take place by reason of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Then, having said that, we return to the floor of the Senate to give away—and I mean literally give away—the best single income producer that the U.S. Government has in the arena of business operations.

We do not make that kind of money with respect to any other arm of Government, but we do with Conrail. And lo and behold, the editorial writers want us to give it away; my colleagues on the other side of the aisle want us to give it away; the President wants us to give it away; and everybody is excited about the fact that we are going to pick up $1.2 billion. But we are going to get $900 million by 1990 and under any and all circumstances, we are going to have a continuing source of income; we are not going to have to give away the $800 million that is like cash in the bank and we are not going to have to give away to a new buyer the $250 million that is in surplus in the pension fund and we are not going to have to give away the money gained by using the net operating loss carryforward as well as the right to depreciate $3.5 million in assets.

Conrail has a pension plan that could be liquidated for profit—cash—of $250 million. No matter how you look at this, here is a situation where the Federal Government put $7 billion into this property.

Consider this: The administration and Norfolk Southern argue that while Conrail may be profitable today, it is not in the long run a strong enough corporation to survive on its own. The U.S. Railway Association, Conrail's banker and independent overseer, sees the situation as opposite.

On July 29, 1985, USRA completed a Conrail sales study which said as follows:

> . . . All available evidence supports a finding that Conrail can generate positive cash flow for the foreseeable future. Traffic shortfalls compared to the forecast should not threaten Conrail's survival as long as the rail regulatory framework allows service to be shaped to meet the demands of the marketplace.

And again from the same report:

> Conrail's viability as an independent entity is reasonably assured.

According to USRA, Norfolk Southern's pessimistic view of Conrail viability is overstated. I quote again from the report:

> Norfolk Southern's 10-year outlook for Conrail—that negative cash flows would occur in serious magnitudes by the 1990's, culminating in the need for renewed Federal aid—was determined by U.S.R.A. to be rebuttable.

Morgan-Stanley, one of Wall Street's most respected investment houses, agrees with USRA's assessment of Conrail's future.

Morgan-Stanley has assembled a group of 41 sophisticated investors, including the New York Life Insurance Co., Columbia University and the Pennsylvania public school employee's pension fund, who are ready and willing to invest their money in Conrail. These investors know what they are doing.

If Conrail were not a viable operation, they would not be going to the public to raise money, they would not be investing their own money. They know that Conrail is going to continue to make money. That is the reason they are so willing to pay $1.4 billion instead of the $1.2 billion that has presently been offered.

Let us talk about another aspect of this matter not having to do specifically with dollars and cents. Let us talk about Conrail being a vital asset to the Northeast and Midwest regions of the country.

Over the past 4 years, for example, Conrail has taken business away from every other rail carrier in the region by the old-fashioned expedient of offering lower prices and better service.

Thanks largely to Conrail's good management, Conrail is now a first-class railroad. It has one of the lowest debt-to-equity ratios and one of the lowest operating ratios of any railroad in the industry. It also has the most modern physical plant and rolling stock in the industry.

I fail to see how this plan to sell Conrail—or more properly, to give it away—serves the interests of the Northeast and Midwest, or of the taxpayers of this country.

Yesterday, we heard on the floor of the U.S. Senate concerns expressed by one of those who could not be particularly considered an easterner. The distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER] talked about the impact that the sale of Conrail would have on the regional railroads serving South Dakota and those States that are nearby.

What do we get in return for the Federal interest in Conrail? Why are we doing this? I do not see any reason to do it. One of the things that concerns me about going forward with this sale has to do with the matter of jobs. I stood on the floor of the Senate just before the last session ended and saw where we indicated our willingness to spend billions of dollars with respect to a program called OPIC. OPIC is a way of exporting American jobs around the world. We have no reservation about doing that. Here is a situation where we are making money—100 percent opposite from the OPIC situation—where we do not need any money to subsidize the railroad, where the railroad is making a profit, where, when we sell the railroad as proposed by this legislation, thousands of railroad workers in my region of the country will lose their jobs.

How many? Nobody seems to know.

Norfolk Southern estimates that 2,530 NS-Conrail positions will be eliminated in the course of consolidating NS and Conrail Operations.

The management of CSX Corp. has said that CSX would immediately lose approximately 4,000 jobs because of freight traffic diversions from its lines to the combined Conrail-N.S. System; 900 of these jobs would be in my own State of Ohio. Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky would also be particularly hard hit with job losses.

According to an estimate prepared by Morgan-Stanley, 8,130 jobs would be lost throughout the rail industry as a result of the proposed Conrail-NS merger.

In its July 29 report, USRA addressed the issue of job losses. The Association studied the estimates submitted by all of the railroads as well as the industrywide estimate prepared by Morgan-Stanley. USRA concluded that the Morgan-Stanley estimate of 8,130 jobs lost was probably too high, but, "* * * the concept of a rail labor impact greater than Norfolk Southern's job loss (predictions) * * * is generally valid."

Not a single rail labor union has endorsed the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern. Those that have taken a position have endorsed the Morgan-Stanley alternative.

Transportation Department officials have been telling Norfolk Southern for months that it would have to improve its labor package to win this sale.

The fact is, Norfolk Southern has not improved its labor package.

This sale plan would provide Conrail's employees a combined payment of $375 million for their 15-percent share of Conrail's stock, and for wages deferred between 1981 and 1984.

That is not enough.

The value of the E.S.O.P., calculated on the basis of the amount Norfolk Southern is paying the Government per share of stock, is $212 million. Add to that the deferred wages of about $290 million per year between 1981 and 1984, and the total comes to $502 million, not including interest.

If you add in interest on the deferred wages compounded at a conservative rate of 10 percent, the total amount comes to $762 million.

The N.S. $375 million figure short changes the employees by $387 million.

In other words, Norfolk Southern plans to buy out Conrail's employees for less than half of what they are due. It is no wonder they oppose this sale so strongly.

Mr. President, I intend to address myself further to this issue during the balance of this afternoon but for the time being I believe I am prepared to yield the floor.

I ask unanimous consent that when I resume my remarks they may be included together and that there be no problem with respect to the two-speech rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, as we look at this proposed sale, I think we have to consider what else does the sale have to offer the American public. In addition to costing thousands of jobs in the Northeast and Midwest, the proposed sale would substantially reduce rail competition in the region.

Combining the Norfolk Southern and Conrail systems would produce a carrier of unprecedented size and power. The new system would control nearly 50 percent of the tonnage and nearly two-thirds of the freight rail revenues in the region.

That is a dominant position—the kind of position that inevitably encourages arbitrary rate increases and destroys a company's incentive to provide timely and efficient service.

I am not alone in my concern about the impact of the proposed sale on competition.

The Governor of my own State of Ohio is opposed to this sale. So is the Governor of Maryland.

Hundreds of communities throughout the Northeast and Midwest oppose the sale.

The list of shippers and corporations opposing the sale is several pages long.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of shippers and corporations opposing the sale be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Mr. DURENBERGER assumed the Chair.)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the American Iron and Steel Institute, representing the entire steel industry, is against this sale.

General Mills, GTE Corp., LTV Corp., Monsanto and 147 other companies, associations, and communities have formed a Coalition for a Competitive Conrail, dedicated to fighting the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Railroad.

Now, why? Why all of this economic power concentrated in opposing the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern?

The answer is simple. It is because these States, communities, and companies are scared to death of the market power that a Norfolk Southern-Conrail combine would exercise.

And for good reason.

Last January, after 6 months of study, the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department concluded that a sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Railroad would "have a significant adverse effect on competition." The Department announced that it would oppose the merger "unless its competitive problems are remedied through a prior or concurrent divestiture of assets" owned by Conrail and/or Norfolk Southern.

On the surface, that looked pretty positive. But, unfortunately, it left open the question of what would be divested—and to whom.

Norfolk Southern subsequently negotiated divestiture agreements with two railroads—Pittsburgh and Lake Erie and Guilford Transportation Industries.

These are not, to put it mildly, powerful competitors.

The Pittsburgh and Lake Erie has not in recent years made a profit. The company lost $11.6 million last year, $23.5 million in 1983; and $12.6 million in 1982.

In 1984, the Guilford system made a profit of $5.1 million. That was the only positive sign in the last 4 years.

But are these the railroads that the Justice Department envisioned as viable competitors to a Conrail and Norfolk system, which together earned $982 million in 1984?

Last summer, Norfolk Southern negotiated agreements with Guilford and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie. Under the terms of these agreements, Norfolk Southern would have divested the absolute minimum amount of trackage needed to comply with the Justice Department order.

Even so, Guilford estimated that it would receive additional gross revenue of $161 million from operations over its new lines.

But an August 30, 1985, study prepared by the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission found these assumptions to be, and I quote, "generally without merit." According to the report, Guilford underestimated its projected $63 million rehabilitation costs, and even with the necessary rehabilitation, Guilford's operating facilities would be inferior to those of Norfolk Southern-Conrail.

Again, I quote directly from the ICC staff report:

> Guilford will not be able to maintain competitive schedules on the trailer or flatcar traffic at Chicago.

Continuing the quote:

> Guilford's revenue gain is overstated by $25 million. Guilford is a highly leveraged company and must generate sufficient cash flow to service its debt. Guilford will be perilously close to being unable to meet all of its annual fixed charges.
> In the long run it does not appear that Guilford will be a financially viable carrier.

With respect to the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad, the report had this to say.

Even if all of PLE's projections are accepted, PLE admits that it cannot service all of its substantial debt using revenues from rail operations. Substantial income from the sale of, and use of, non-rail assets is needed to cover debt payments. PLE's proposed operating ratios are highly optimistic.

In concluding, the ICC staff report said, "P&LE is not now a financially viable carrier and its acquisition of the new lines will not enable it to reverse its already precarious financial position."

The Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust agreed with the ICC finding. In a letter to the Secretary of Transportation dated September 25, 1985, he stated:

Based on the information we have obtained to date . . . It does not appear that the proposed divestiture will establish a rail carrier in the designed corridor capable of providing long-term, viable competitive service. And, he stated there is:

No assurance that Guilford will provide the sort of competition with the merged NS/Conrail that would be necessary in order to eliminate the problems created by the sale of Conrail to NS.

In response to the Assistant Attorney General's findings, Norfolk Southern developed a second divestiture plan, which too, was found to be unacceptable.

Finally, on its third try, Norfolk Southern came up with a plan that the Justice Department could live with. On November 19, the Assistant Attorney General announced that this third proposal, "appears on its face to address the competitive concerns that must be addressed."

But the Assistant Secretary's announcement does not hide the fact that this third plan is as flawed as the first two plans.

It merely confirms the fact that supporters of the Norfolk Southern purchase have attempted, bit by bit, to hack away at competitive concerns, by providing half a loaf each time the merger appears endangered because of concerns about competition.

The fact is, this merger has not, nor will it be required to face the normal public scrutiny required of a typical railroad merger. By virtue of a highly unusual provision in this bill which grants future immunity to this transaction from antitrust and other laws, such scrutiny will likely never occur.

Because of this immunity, there is substantial likelihood that the limited analysis by the Justice Department may be the only scrutiny of the sale's competitive effect ever provided.

In fact, the effort to have this transaction approved by Congress, based only on the Justice fix, without analysis of the competitive effects by the courts, or by agencies like the ICC or USRA that are familiar with railroads, creates the appearance of an effort to move the merger through Congress precisely to avoid the intense scrutiny a proposal of this magnitude requires.

In that sense, Mr. President, I believe further discussion of the entire Justice review process may be enlightening.

Let us start with the initial standard used by the Justice Department. Former Antitrust Chief Paul McGrath said the merger could go forward if Conrail could be replaced in the market by one or more railroads which could provide "long term, viable, and competitive rail service."

This was the first major compromise with the public interest.

Normally, mergers are governed under the Clayton Act. Section 7 of that act bars mergers where the effect "may be to substantially lessen competition." The requirements of our antitrust laws are not satisfied by the fact that Norfolk Southern is creating two minimal competitors through the divestiture of some of its assets.

That is not the point.

Under the antitrust laws, the question is: What will competition look like after the merger? Will a market with a Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination, CSX, and a Guilford/P&LE combination be significantly less competitive than the current market? The answer is clearly yes, and without the antitrust immunity, this merger would never survive judicial scrutiny.

The fact is these divestitures do not even retain the current level of rail competition in the Northeast-Midwest region.

Let me cite one example: According to the most recent proposal, both Guilford and Norfolk Southern are going to be competing for business at the important St. Louis gateway. Norfolk Southern will keep Conrail's current east St. Louis yard, a new, modern, efficient facility. Guilford will be stuck with the decrepit Madison yard. This yard will take substantial sums to rehabilitate, and even then it will not equal the newer facility in terms of location and access.

If the Justice Department were really interested in preserving competition, it would give Guilford the Conrail yard, and make Norfolk Southern, with its superior resources, refurbish the inferior Madison yard.

But the Justice Department did not do so.

Why?

Because, departing from the mandate of the Clayton Act, justice is not trying to preserve competition. Justice is meeting a much weaker standard. It is merely attempting to create a railroad which can minimally compete in the area.

In its initial review, the Justice Department eliminated from further consideration any market where Norfolk Southern and Conrail did not service 50 percent of the market. This rule has never been validated by the ICC nor the courts for railroad merger analyses.

Second, markets where a third carrier other than Norfolk Southern or Conrail had a monopoly were eliminated. The Justice Department never provided a satisfactory explanation for this decision.

Notwithstanding the obvious flaws associated with this analysis, the Justice Department still identified 39 counties where this merger would be harmful to competition.

The antitrust division has given a tentative OK to divestiture plan No. 3. but even its proponents claim, in their most optimistic projections, that it will solve competitive problems in markets totaling only $214 million.

Restating the facts, even if the Justice Department's market elimination screens were proper, and even if the new firms are true competitors, the new divestiture plan will mitigate the harm to competition for less than half the business affected by this merger.

The attorney general from my State of Ohio, Anthony Celebrezze, identified 14 counties in Ohio which were completely ignored by the Justice Department. Several other State attorneys general reported similar results.

Even in the 15 problem counties where new service is provided, the new service is clearly no equal to that provided by the current competitive environment.

Of these 15 counties, only 8 will be served directly by Guilford or P&LE.

With respect to the other seven, Guilford and the P&LE will have to depend on switching, trackage, and car-haulage agreements.

With whom? You guessed it—Conrail/Norfolk Southern.

Unquestionably, these types of agreements are inferior to the single-line service that Norfork Southern/Conrail will provide.

Indeed, the major justification put forth by the supporters of this merger is the increased single-line service which Norfolk Southern/Conrail will be able to provide its shippers.

If single-line service is so much better than interhauling and switching, how can anyone expect Guilford and P&LE to compete with Conrail/Norfolk Southern?

And there is more.

These minimal switching services which Norfolk Southern has agreed to provide Guilford and P&LE only last for 5 years. What happens to competition after that?

Trackage rights are clearly no substitute for real competition. The needs of the tenant—tiny Guilford or P&LE—will always come second to the needs of the owner—Norfolk Southern. The opportunities for Norfolk Southern to intimidate its tenants into going along with new rate increases are obvious.

I know that a number of my colleagues want to vote for this bill, but are genuinely concerned about the antitrust aspects of the sale. Many were unprepared to vote for the bill without some indication from the Justice Department that the divestitures would pass muster. They claimed, and rightly so, that to pass the legislation last summer would have been like buying the proverbial pig in a poke. But the fact is, we still do not know how this merged and divested rail system will work.

I asked my staff to review some open questions about the divestiture with top antitrust division officials.

Has Justice verified that the new lines to be acquired or used by Guilford and P&LE are of sufficient quality to provide competitive service? The answer ws no.

This question is to be answered in the so-called phase II Justice Department investigation.

What about the quality of the yards to be sold? Again, to be determined in phase II.

What about the total costs of the divestiture to Guilford and P&LE?

That is right: We do not know yet.

What will be the impact of these costs on the debt structure of these weak, faltering entities?

You guessed it, see phase II.

A key element in the divestiture plan is the opening of the Detroit market to Guilford. To operate in that city, Guilford will acquire a portion of the Oakwood yard "sufficient to allow it to assemble its trains and interchange traffic with other carriers."

How much of the yard, must Guilford share with its rival, Norfolk Southern?

Again, this will be determined in phase II.

In order to compete throughout the Midwest corridor for valuable automotive traffic, Guilford will have to purchase specialty equipment, presumably from Norfolk Southern.

Can they do so? At a reasonable cost?

The antitrust division does not know.

To meaningfully commpete in the key St. Louis and Chicago gateways, Guilford must have access to the facilities of the St. Louis terminal railroad and the Chicago belt railway. Norfolk Southern says it will use its "best efforts" to secure this access.

Can it be obtained at a competitive cost?

Of course, we do not know.

Guilford and P&LE claim they can offer service at competitive speeds.

Has Justice verified this yet? No.

P&LE is being granted trackage rights only on secondary lines. NS claims that "they are suitable for the type of operation intended by P&LE."

What type of operation are they talking about?

A competitive one?

Has DOJ verified this?

Not until phase II.

There is no question that the Antitrust Division has been pressured into putting its best face on a proposal about which they know very little. There are so many questions yet to be resolved in phase II, one wonders what the point was to phase I.

In view of the fact that phase II is still a long way off, let me state some of the facts which we do know about this plan.

As I stated previously the ICC concluded that the P&LE has no capacity to incur new debt. But, the ability to take on such debt is critical if P&LE expects to be a viable competitor. How else will it upgrade its facilities? How else will it increase its capacity if needed to undercut a Norfolk Southern price hike?

Guilford proposes to service local customers on its long-distance trains. This will slow down its trains, resulting in inferior long-distance service to NS/Conrail.

Conrail's line through New York is more direct than Guilford's.

Guilford claims that it "will operate through freight trains on its lines with schedules that will be fully competitive with NS/Conrail operations."

Let us check the facts.

Chicago—New York intermodal service NS/Conrail, 11 trains daily; Guilford, 2.

Chicago corridor general freight service: NS/Conrail, 30 trains; Guilford, 2.

St. Louis corridor general freight service: NS/Conrail, 26, trains; Guilford, 2.

Mr. President, these remarks only highlight the major competitive problems which I have been able to identify on the basis of the limited available information about this third divestiture plan. Heaven only knows what might be found in an independent review, either by an antitrust court or by the ICC.

But the sad fact is, there has been none of the scrutiny to which any merger of this size would normally be subjected. The entire antitrust consideration process has been shrouded in secrecy.

The Antitrust Division now proposes to begin the phase II study process.

But the Department does not plan to issue a determination until next year, presumably after Congress approves the sale.

Today, we are putting the cart before the horse. We are acting on this sale bill, knowing full well that it may be illegal under the antitrust laws of the United States.

If we move forward with this legislation, if we approve this sale today, or next week, or next month, does anyone really expect that the Justice Department will have the initiative or the will to kill it based on antitrust considerations?

I, for one, do not. I do not believe the Justice Department, which is only one department in this administration, will buck the President and the Congress, and act to kill the sale on the basis of the antitrust concern.

Mr. President, our consideration of this matter is premature. We have a right to know how much more money we can obtain by selling Conrail. We have a right to know whether the $200 million more offered by Morgan Stanley and the $499 million more offered by Boston Corp. and the Allen Co. is the most that can be obtained. We have a right to know what is the best offer that is possible. And we have a right to know what the new railroad operation will be like, how many jobs it will cost, what impact it will have with respect to competition in the area.

This move to go forward with respect to the sale of Conrail at this time is premature, much too premature.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today to support the motion to proceed to S. 638, a bill to approve the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp. I believe the time has come for Congress to act on this vital piece of legislation to provide a permanent solution to the uncertainty that has plagued rail shippers and employees in my region for years.

Mr. President, I am one of the 25 or 30 Senators in this distinguished body who was here and witnessed the bankruptcy of the Penn Central Railroad; the turmoil that bankruptcy imposed on its shippers and consumers; and the problems Congress faced in restructuring this vital transportation system. As a member of the Commerce Committee at that time, I helped write the legislation which was to become the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973. This act, known as the 3R Act, established the United States Railway Association [USRA] and charged the association with establishing a quasi private sector system which would provide rail service to the Northeast and Midwest. In 1976, Congress passed the 4R Act, the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, which implemented the final system plan. Later, in 1980, Congress passed the Staggers Rail Act that deregulated the railroad industry and in 1981 we passed the Northeast Rail Service Act [NERSA] to provide additional assistance to Conrail's profits. All of these laws have helped Conrail reestablish itself as a carrier capable of providing rail service.

Today, with extensive sacrifices by rail labor, Federal Assistance, the benefits of Government ownership, and the able stewardship of Conrail Management, Conrail has become a profitable operation. And, as provided for in the Northeast Rail Service Act, the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to return Conrail to the private sector in a way that best ensures the financial viability of the railroad, preserves service and, consistent with the first two, maximizes return to the Federal Government. After conducting a thorough and extensive sale process, Department of Transportation Secretary, Elizabeth Dole, has recommended that the Government sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp.

I support the Secretary's recommendation and believe Norfolk Southern will provide a strong, stable future for Conrail. On the day of closing, Norfolk Southern will present the U.S. Government with a check for at least $1.2 billion. Norfolk Southern does not leverage any cash out of Conrail to make the purchase and it has agreed to a series of protective covenants that limit the amount of money that may be taken out of Conrail. Norfolk Southern stipulates minimum levels of investment in Conrail's fixed plant and essentially leaves Conrail operating much as it is now.

However, a Norfolk Southern sale has positive benefits particularly for New England and Connecticut for the following reasons:

First. The Norfolk Southern purchase of Conrail creates the potential to dramatically increase North-South traffic by rail instead of by truck. This increase in rail traffic would significantly benefit my State since Connecticut has steadily lost its ability to ship or receive goods by rail from the South. A Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination can provide a fast and economical single line service for rail shippers from Connecticut to points in the South.

Second. The sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern enhances the expansion of Guilford Transportation Services from the Northeast to major markets in the Midwest. The Department of Justice has insisted on divestitures of lines west of Buffalo, NY to Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc., a Conrail competitor. Guilford has served Connecticut shippers well since its Boston and Maine subsidiary took over 150 miles of lines Conrail chose to no longer operate for freight service in Connecticut. An expanded and strengthened Guilford will be good for Connecticut and New England since it will be able to provide service from this region all the way to Chicago and St. Louis on the west, Washington on the south, and Montreal on the north.

The expansion of Guilford Transportation Industries also means that for the first time since before the Penn Central merger, New England will have two viable competitive rail operators serving its region, enhancing the options for New England shippers and the region's own economic infrastructure.

Third. The alternative proposals to purchase Conrail bring nothing but purchase money to the deal. Norfolk Southern, on the other hand, has an excellent reputation for managing railroads and its purchase of Conrail brings the prospect of expanded rail traffic to the Northeast region of our country. Norfolk Southern does not own any nontransportation companies. Instead, it concentrates its energies and resources specifically on transportation. We have seen much too much retrenchment of rail service in New England not to be concerned about the longevity of the basic system.

Fourth. As a strong supporter of rail labor, I believe a sale to Norfolk Southern is the best guarantee of long-term employment for Conrail employees. As a stand alone entity, Conrail has continued to prune its work force in order to maintain its viability. In addition, Conrail employees have made enormous sacrifices throughout Conrail's march to profitability. Their battle is not over. Last year, Conrail laid off 3,200 employees, nearly 10 percent of its work force. Norfolk Southern estimates that only approximately 1,200 jobs will be affected by the purchase of Conrail. A stand alone Conrail faces a continued strain of rationalizing its system and continuing abandonments even in its best years. A Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination, with its inherent strength and commitment to rail service, is the best guarantee that jobs will be preserved.

Mr. President, today we have before us the opportunity to approve a sale which will generate new rail traffic and provide Conrail with a long-term partner committed to the business of railroading. This sale will also increase rail competition in the Northeast by expanding Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc. and enhancing the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Co. I urge my colleagues to support S. 638 and the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Transportation Department's proposal to sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp.

Mr. President, I have looked repeatedly at this proposal from the perspective of both a Senator from South Carolina and as chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Like many Senators, I have evaluated this transaction from the viewpoint of my constituents, in order to understand who would be made better off and worse off in my State by the proposed railroad merger. I have heard from many people on both sides of the issue, and I have determined that the proposed merger would yield healthy, beneficial economic results for South Carolina. So I am in favor of it from the perspective of a Senator from South Carolina.

As chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I have had an opportunity to evaluate this proposal from the perspective of the committee with jurisdiction over antitrust issues. The proposed transaction is a very large merger of two railroads which compete directly with each other in certain areas. As such, the proposal carries certain antitrust implications, The Secretary of Transportation has understood this from the outset, for it was she who submitted the merger proposal to the Justice Department for antitrust review. The Justice Department has conducted that review during the last year.

As we all know, the Judiciary Committee has devoted considerable attention to the antitrust issues, even though the legislation authorizing the merger was not referred to the Judiciary Committee. As the committee with responsibility for overseeing the enforcement of the antitrust laws and overseeing the Justice Department, it has been appropriate for the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the Justice Department's antitrust review of the Conrail sale. Our inquiry was begun pursuant to an agreement with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, Mr. DANFORTH. From the beginning, the scope of the Judiciary Committee's inquiry has been limited to the Justice Department's work on the antitrust problems associated with the sale.

For some time now, those who oppose the sale have cited, as a reason to delay Senate consideration of the matter, the Justice Department's continuing review of the antitrust aspects. In my view, it is now time for the Senate to get on with its debate and vote on this legislation. The hearing record on the antitrust aspects of the sale is complete and extensive; that record establishes that the Justice Department's work on the merger has been—and will be—thorough, proper, independent, and reliable. The Justice Department has identified some significant antitrust concerns with the merger, but the Justice Department now anticipates that the antitrust implication will be resolved in a manner totally consistent with antitrust law and competition policy. Therefore, the Senate can feel confident that the antitrust problems attending this merger will be remedied, and should move on to consideration of the transportation policy implication of the proposal.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to speak on the subject of Conrail. I oppose the sale in its present form and hope that we can find an alternative method of selling it which will provide competition. I would like to recount some of the struggles that I have had in getting an answer from the Justice Department about the antitrust impact, and discuss the regional railroad issue as it pertains to the Midwest and other regions of the country.

About a year ago, I raised a number of questions in the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee regarding the antitrust issue. Of special concern to me was the fact that the Pittman analysis had been used by the Justice Department in advising the ICC, the Interstate Commerce Commission, regarding the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific merger in the western part of the United States. The Pittman analysis was a Department of Justice method for analyzing the anticompetitive impact of a railroad merger that was developed by a Department of Justice economist, Dr. Russell Pittman. The Pittman methodology was used by the Department of Justice in its study of the Sante Fe/Southern Pacific merger, which it opposes as anticompetitive.

However, the Justice Department used a different economic analysis regarding the Conrail sale. And I asked a number of pointed questions to which I was promised answers, which I have never received. Subsequently, I wrote and other Senators wrote, and there were long delays in getting an answer on the antitrust issues or in getting an adequate explanation of why one economic model had been used to analyze the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific merger in the western part of the United States but the same Justice Department, the same people, used a different analysis in the Conrail/Norfolk Southern study.

Following my remarks today I will insert for the record additional materials which explain the differences between these different methodologies and describe their significance in more detail.

Subsequently, I asked a nationally well-known private transportation firm, Rubie Associates, to analyze the Norfolk Southern/Conrail merger using the Pittman analysis in exactly the same way it was applied in the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific merger. When that was done there were quite different results, especially as the issue relates to the impact on regional railroads and on regional shippers.

Thus, to me, as I look at it from my part of the country—and I think throughout the West and the Midwest and the South—a key issue is the issue of regional railroads or regional trucking firms or regional transportation groups connecting into a Conrail monopoly. I believe that much of the debate thus far has centered on the amount offered in the sale, whether more money can be gotten out of Morgan Stanley or another offer, and what the tax advantages and disadvantages are. But to the United States as a whole there is a real issue at gateways—that is, where a smaller railroad connects with a bigger one—with traffic diversion problems, and other issues relating to the anticompetition aspects of this merger. And that is true of smaller regional and short-line railroads across the United States.

When we passed the Staggers Rail Act deregulation paved the way for some fundamental changes in the railroad industry. Many of those changes have proved to be wise, but some have proved to be not so wise. But we did breathe life into railroads that probably would not be here today without it. Many of those same railroads will experience severe financial setbacks if the Norfolk Southern bid goes through. We will essentially wipe out many of the good things Staggers provided. And I, for one, get especially concerned when those railroads that will be set back are operating in my State. For the Chicago & North Western, and many others, this transaction would be one giant step backward from the advances made over the past few years.

When S. 638 was before the Commerce Committee, I offered an amendment that would have given some protection to the regional railroads.

It was my feeling at the time that some of the railroads were getting special agreements with Norfolk Southern in return for key support. The amendment was an attempt to treat all of the regional and small railroads equally. On the morning of the vote, the Department of Transportation and the Norfolk Southern circulated letters stating that negotiations were underway with the other small railroads and hinted that agreements were close to being reached. This, of course, was not the case and none of these railroads concerns were ever addressed.

In addition, an amendment was viewed and referred to by the Department of Transportation as an attempt to repeal parts of the Staggers Act, and a reinstitution of regulation. My amendment was defeated in the Commerce Committee.

Subsequently, weeks and months passed. And the Justice Department of Transportation still did not come through with specific answers on the antitrust area. I think my colleagues from Pennsylvania did an excellent job yesterday outlining some of those unanswered antitrust questions. They go to the heart of my concern with this sale.

I would like to see the Government get out of the railroad business. I think private enterprise can do a better job of running this railroad. I also think that we are in an era where we will see prosperity of the railroads again. I am seeing prosperity on the short-line railroads that feed into the major railroads.

So progress is being made. But a great mistake that we could make is to allow a monopolistic carrier take control of the east coast. That is precisely what the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would do.

As we look around the United States, I think it is important to remember that the trucking industry and the railroad industry are both very important in terms of moving grain, timber, machinery, and products of all sorts. There is a strong feeling that we should preserve the railroad lines and indeed strengthen them in many cases. But this will not happen if we have a monopoly carrier east of the Mississippi.

I believe I could say there is almost unanimous agreement among the shippers, regional railroads, and labor groups west of the Mississippi that the Conrail sale in its present form should not go forward because of the antitrust questions, because of the gateway and traffic diversion problems, and because of the prices that will be charged or could be charged by this monopolistic carrier. There will not be competition.

Earlier this year I pleaded with the Department of Transportation to come up with some kind of a gateway agreement or diversion, with some assurances so that we could be in a situation where there could be assurances to regional railroads, in the West, and in the South, and in the Midwest—assurances that these smaller railroads would not be subject to predatory pricing practices. No agreements were forthcoming.

It is for that reason that I shall offer an amendment when and if we proceed to that stage of this debate.

Let me say I am one of those Senators who tomorrow at 1 o'clock will not be voting for cloture because I believe that until we have this fundamental answer on antitrust we should not go forward.

That is not said in any obstructionist way. I have not, during my time in the Senate or in the House, engaged in filibuster tactics. I have not engaged in obstructionist tactics. Perhaps one should do more of that kind of thing around here. But I have not done so because of a firm belief that the process should work, and we should go forward. But in this case, the Department of Transportation and the Justice Department are saying to us, go ahead, go forward, and we will provide you with the antitrust analysis and other details later. That is not the way Congress should act.

We should have that analysis before we go forward. But if cloture is invoked, and we are forced to proceed forward, I shall offer an amendment on the traffic diversion issue. I would like to describe that amendment.

This amendment is designed to protect small and regional railroads from unfair market dominance and other anticompetitive pressures which could be exerted by a combined Norfolk Southern-Conrail [NS/CR]. The amendment would apply only to the extent that the ICC finds anticompetitive or unfair market control has been exercised by NS/CR.

The amendment is designed to protect smaller railroads in the Midwest and the West, it also applies to small railroads within the immediate NS/CR region. It does not apply to the larger railroads such as CSX, Burlington Northern, Union Pacific, and so forth.

In effect, the amendment simply gives the affected railroads a cause of action before the Interstate Commerce Commission if within 10 years of the consummation of the sale the ICC finds that these small or regional railroads have experienced traffic diversions of 3½ percent or greater, due to the anticompetitive impact of the sale. That is 3.5 percent or greater. If the diversions are caused by fair competition or some other nonmonopolistic force, no remedy will be available. The remedy under the plan would be to allow the affected railroad, following an ICC investigation and determination, to purchase at fair market value enough track or trackage rights from NS/CR to allow for adequate competition in the affected region.

The philosophy behind this amendment is quite simple: The rail system of the Midwest or the Western part of the country, as well as the smaller Northeastern carriers, should not be sacrificed for the sole benefit of a single railroad.

We do not believe this transaction should be made at the expense of other railroads. But, if Department of Transportation figures are accurate, this amendment should never have to be used.

Indeed, I hope the Department of Transportation will support my amendment because they say that the percentage of diversion will be much less.

The DOT estimates that "[t]he diversion figures for the Midwestern carriers are all below the 2-percent figure, both in the base case and the liberal case estimates," and that the "[i]mpact on the Western carriers is de minimus, both in absolute and percentage terms."

So, this amendment should not pose a problem, assuming these estimates are accurate. Indeed, we have made the numbers extremely conservative. The amendment would require diversions in excess of 200 percent of the DOT's most liberal case estimate before it could be used by railroads outside the immediate Norfolk Southern/Conrail region.

I hope that the Department of Transportation will support my amendment because they say that in the most extreme case diversions will not exceed 2 percent. The diversion figures are all below the 2-percent figure in the most liberal case estimates. My amendment gives them 3½. I hope that the managers of the bill will embrace my amendment, become cosponsors, and say we will take it without a rollcall vote if, indeed, they believe what the Department of Transportation says.

We have used the 3½-percent diversion figure because it represents the point at which the very existence of some of the smaller railroads is actually threatened. Additionally we have made it very clear that the diversions must be caused by anticompetitive factors arising from Norfolk Southern-Conrail mergers. Diversions for other reasons simply will not be considered by the ICC.

This amendment is a result of a sincere desire on our part to avoid a potential catastrophic situation in railroads in other parts of the country. Conrail originally became the ward of the Federal Government because of the large number of railroad failures in the Northeast.

Let me say as a Member of the House of Representatives in those days, I well remember the great railroad problems in the Northeast. I am glad Conrail has shown a profit and has turned around. I believe it is in the national interest that it be sold. I am not an obstructionist to that cause. But I say selling it under the present plan will head us back in the same direction because it will have regional railroads failing elsewhere in the country, and in particular in my part of the country.

Conrail originally became a ward of the Federal Government because of the large number of railroad failures in the Northeast. It would indeed be ironic if by finally turning this system over to the private sector and getting the Government out of the railroad business we set the wheels in motion for larger railroad failures in other parts of our country, thereby starting the process all over again.

Our amendment will provide for protection against that happening. It would not require any reregulation of the industry. Indeed, it may never have to go into effect if DOT figures are accurate, it will never need to be used.

Regardless of how you decide to vote on the merits of this bill, we hope you will be able to support this amendment as a reasonable means of protecting railroads outside of the Norfolk Southern-Conrail region. I ask my colleagues' support for this extremely important amendment and invite them to join as a cosponsor.

There are a number of other issues before us.

I might also say that I have joined in sponsoring another amendment with my colleague, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON]. This amendment involves the antitrust questions, questions that have not yet been resolved and which I mentioned earlier. When S. 638 reaches the Senate floor if cloture is invoked, we intend to offer this amendment to provide an opportunity for independent and thorough review of the antitrust issues without delaying the sale.

The amendment simply makes the sale subject to the antitrust laws and ensures that interested parties have a chance to have the issues hear in Federal court.

The current bill exempts the sale of Conrail from review by the Interstate Commerce Commission which has reviewed every other merger involving profitable railroads and it provides no opportunity for judicial review of antitrust issues.

A letter prepared by Senator Dixon and cosigned by myself and others points this out. The letter says in part:

As even the Department of Justice admits, however, the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern raises serious anticompetitive concerns. On January 25, 1985, then Assistant Attorney General McGrath wrote Secretary Dole that, "without appropriate divestitures, the proposed merger would violate both Clayton Act and Interstate Commerce Act merger standards. The merger would have a significant adverse effect on competition for the transport of commodities to and from a number of locations in several States."

The letter continues:

Norfolk Southern, negotiating with the Justice Department in closed sessions, has proposed three different divestiture plans in an attempt to resolve the antitrust concerns. The first plan was studied by the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission and found to be woefully inadequate. The second plan was also quickly found wanting. Now there is yet a third plan, the details of which are still not in the public domain.

I would say before the Senate votes on this matter, we should certainly know what that antitrust plan is. We do not.

There are still real doubts as to whether the carriers scheduled to acquire lines from the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern combine, the very marginal Guilford and Pittsburgh and Lake Erie railroads, can provide meaningful competition. Even if they could, the current divestiture proposal still leaves unresolved many significant competition issues. If, as we believe, they cannot, passage of S. 638 will mean that Congress has effectively endorsed creation of a monopoly.

Further, shippers and railroads that will be severely adversely affected by the sale to Norfolk Southern have been provided virtually no opportunity to have their views considered. The ordinary process of ICC review, with full information, and the ability to present and cross examine witnesses has not been utilized, even though a merger just as large as the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern transaction, the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger, is now undergoing ICC review.

I might emphasize this. The Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger is being handled in an entirely different manner, an entirely different way. A very curious situation, indeed.

Going back to Senator DIXON's excellent letter:

Our amendment will provide affected railroads, shippers, ports, and other interested parties with the opportunity that has so far been denied them. It creates a mechanism for full, independent consideration of the antitrust issues. If Norfolk Southern's latest divestiture plan actually does resolve all antitrust problems, such a review will not delay the sale. If there are, as we believe, still major anticompetitive problems that must be resolved, this amendment provides the opportunity for creating an appropriate remedy without further Congressional action.

The Justice Department acknowledges that it does not have sufficient in-house expertise to evaluate fully the latest divestiture plan. Further, they have not yet even picked a consultant to help it evaluate the proposal, and the details of that proposal have not yet been made public.

We do not believe the Senate has the information before it that would permit it to find that the antitrust issues have been resolved. The very least the Senate should do, therefore, is to ensure that S. 638 provides for independent evaluation of the unresolved antitrust issues, and a judicial mechanism for their resolution.

We strongly urge your support for this essential amendment. The antitrust concerns raised by the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern are far too serious to be totally exempted from administrative or judicial review.

The remarks I have just made have been taken from the letter signed by Senator DIXON, myself, and other Senators, and I think they point up the need for that amendment but also point up the need for continued consideration.

Mr. President, earlier this year I informed the chairman of the Commerce Committee that I was prepared to go forward on Conrail at a time when the Justice Department had promised that we would have an adequate written answer on the antitrust letter that I had sent. I still have not received that answer or any analysis comparable to that used in the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific case. For that reason, I feel that the word of the Justice Department and the Department of Transportation to me personally was broken. Therefore, I shall not support the cloture motion.

Mr. President, in concluding, let me say that even if the Department of Justice does not believe that the anticompetitive issues are important, I can tell you that there are many railroads in the Midwest and around the country that literally consider it to be a matter of life or death, a matter of survival or nonsurvival. It is that important if a predatory monopoly is allowed to exist. That is the way these railroads feel.

I have received numerous letters from shippers and railroads and people interested in transportation from around the country saying that we should make that point clear.

It is curious that even though some agencies do not consider it important, the affected railroads and shippers certainly do.

I recall that in some of the first Commerce Committee hearings we held on this issue, our distinguished colleague from Nebraska, Senator EXON, and I asked the Department of Transportation witnesses time and time again whether a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger would have an adverse impact on the Midwest. The consistent answer was that it would not.

I might add with some amusement that even the materials we have received here on our desk, prepared by the Department of Transportation, state that my State of South Dakota would have no adverse impact. I say this with some amusement because I certainly get a different message from my State and the Railroads which service my State. Just the opposite feeling is held by the Chicago and North Western Railroad, as well as by short line operators, as well as by truckers, and as well as by shippers. So there is a distinct difference. And quite frankly, I tend to trust those in my State. I urge my colleagues to take a close look at the materials supplied by the Department of Transportation and compare notes with transportation officials and railroads in your own State. My guess is that you will find two very different stories in most cases.

Since the time that Senator EXON and I asked those questions in the Commerce Committee, things mysteriously have seemed to change considerably. Railroads, shippers, and labor organizations throughout the Midwest and West have come out in strong opposition to the merger of these two rail giants. In addition to the feeling in my State, a strong sentiment from Western and Midwestern States has come out in opposition to the merger because of the severe impact it would have on those States.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate would consider that while we may solve the problem of getting Conrail sold by moving forward on this bill, we will be creating a whole host of new problems unless we handle the sale correctly.

I am for the sale, if it is done right. I would be prepared to hesitatingly vote for the Morgan Stanley alternative because it promises more competition. I hope that in this legislation, as it wends its way through the House and Senate, there will be gateway and traffic diversion protections similar to the ones in the amendment that I will be offering on diversion.

I challenge the Department of Transportation to support my diversion amendment since they say no more than 2 percent of the traffic would be diverted. My amendment would not kick in until 3.5 percent is diverted.

I ask that the managers of the bill on both sides consider cosponsoring my amendment, because it falls within a safe range. It would never be used if the figures provided to us by the Department of Transportation are accurate.

I urge my colleagues to support that amendment, because it would provide competition in railroads, it would save the regional railroads; it would help truckers and other transportation modes that feed into Conrail.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit the materials to which I earlier referred into the RECORD at this point.

The additional materials include:

First. The excellent testimony of Mr. Andrew C. Robertson of Reebie Associates. Mr. Robertson's testimony describes in some detail the differences between the Pittman methodology applied by the Department of Justice in the Sante Fe/Southern Pacific merger; and the much less rigorous analysis and methodology applied by the Department of Justice in the proposed Conrail/Norfolk Southern merger.

Second. A cover letter from Mr. Robertson which outlines his work, along with two very short but very illustrative attachments which, first, give a State-by-State snapshot of the anticompetitive impacts of this merger, and second, a summary discription of the major statistical differences between the two different Department of Justice methodologies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The material follows:

TESTIMONY OF ANDREW C. ROBERTSON BEFORE THE SENATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

My name is Andrew C. Robertson. I am employed by Reebie Associates located at 200 Railroad Avenue, Greenwich, CT 06830. I have participated in several rail merger analysis projects over the past five years including UP-MP-WP, GTW-MILW, ATSF-SP, and most recently USDOT's sale of Conrail. I have submitted testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission on behalf of Grand Trunk Western concerning their anticipated losses to NS-CR and the viability of NS' proposed divestitures to P&LE and GTI. I am thoroughly familiar with the marketing and antitrust issues that surround the NS-CR case.

INTRODUCTION

In March 1984, the Department of Justice (DOJ) submitted testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission addressing the anti-competitive impacts of the proposed Santa Fe-Southern Pacific (SF-SP) railroad merger. The testimony of DOJ economist, Dr. Russell Pittman, was based on an analysis of the combined market shares of SF and SP. Reebie Associates provided market share information to Dr. Pittman. As Dr. Pittman's primary contact with our firm, I am very familiar with his methodology and analysis.

In May, Reebie Associates was asked by RBC Associates to use the Pittman-DOJ methodology to produce a comparable market share analysis of the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail (NS-CR) consolidation. In my testimony, I will briefly outline the Pittman-DOJ analytical approach. I will then use the market data produced by his analytical approach to support five conclusions:

1. By Dr. Pittman's standard of merger affected tons, the scope of the anti-competitive impact of NS-Conrail is much larger than that of SF-SP.

2. NS-Conrail will control many more market areas than ATSF-SP, primarily in the Northeast and Midwest.

3. Many commodities most severely impacted by NS-Conrail such as coal, iron ore, pulp and corn are not protected from rail monopolies by motor carrier competition.

4. Many NS-Conrail markets identified as problems by the Pittman-DOJ methodology are not addressed by the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie-Guilford divestiture plan.

5. The Pittman-DOJ methodology appears to differ significantly in form and substance from that used in the DOJ's evaluation of NS-Conrail.

PITTMAN-DOJ METHODOLOGY

Market definition

Dr. Pittman used Business Economic Areas (BEAs) to define geographic areas in his analysis. These areas were established by the Department of Commerce to correspond to the economic areas surrounding major centers of industrial and commercial activity. BEAs have been used extensively in every recent rail merger case.

In the Pittman-DOJ methodology commodities are defined by Standard Transportation Classification Code (STCCs) at the five digit level of detail. This level of detail is precise enough to separately identify industries that share similar transportation requirements.

Market share test

Dr. Pittman's anlaysis is designed to identify every case where intramodal competition in the rail market would be significantly affected by a merger. Dr. Pittman employed a market share screen known as the "10-10-50 Test" in his examination of the SF-SP rail merger. By this test, in the analysis of the NS-CR consolidation:

NS market share is greater than 10%
and Conrail market share is greater than 10%
NS-CR combined market share is greater than 50%.

Dr. Pittman's methodology would identify as a "problem" market "problem" market a case where for a particular commodity flowing between two BEAs, NS' share of rail traffic is 25% between two BEAs, NS' share of rail traffic is 25% and Conrail's share is 40% with a combined share of 65%. As both NS and CR have at least 10% shares and together over 50% of the rail market, this hypothetical case would meet Dr. Pittman's standard. This rule is applied to markets defined by origin-destination traffic lanes, total inbound flows to destinations, and total outbound flows from origins.

The Pittman-DOJ methodology separately identifies these markets where either NS or CR have total control from those where NS and CR are competitive. Although, a market where a NS share of 92% is combined with a CR share of 8% would not meet the 10-10-50 test, Dr. Pittman considers these exclusively served markets to be "potential" problems.

Market shares are assigned to NS or CR if they participate in a rail movement as an origin, destination or overhead carrier. Therefore, NS would have a share of the traffic moving from N&W in Virginia to B&M in Massachusetts or by a joint FEC-SOU-GTW route.

Market share reports

In Dr. Pittman's testimony, he produced eight tables to provide different perspectives of the competitive impacts of SF-SP. I have used Dr. Pittman's exact report formats with the 1983 ICC Rail Waybill Sample and 1982 TRANSEARCH truck and barge data to reproduce the Pittman-DOJ analysis for the NS-CR case.

Six reports use the "10-10-50" Test" to identify problem markets for three geographic orientations.

By Origin-Destination Traffic Lane e.g. traffic from Cleveland to Chicago—Tables I-II.

By Destination e.g. traffic into Cleveland—Tables IV-V.

By Origin e.g. traffic out of Cleveland—Tables VI-VII.

For each of these geographic orientations, there is a separate "sort" of the data to focus on the commodities and locations most impacted by the NS-CR combination.

Dr. Pittman also designed two reports (Tables VIII-IX) to identify markets where combining railroads either alone or in combination have 100% market share.[1] These reports rank the locations and commodities dominated by NS or Conrail.

MARKET ANALYSIS

I have examined the market share reports and testimony developed by Dr. Pittman for SF-SP and the comparable market share reports created for NS-CR. My comparison of the data supports the conclusion that the NS-CR combination, by several measures of market power, is more significant than the SF-SP merger. Furthermore, the proposed divestitures to P&LE and GTI fail to address several markets that rely on NS and Conrail competition.

I have appended to this testimony, the first two pages of each of my eight market share reports (Attachment 1). I will use these reports to illustrate my analysis of the impacts of NS-CR.

Origin-destination pairs with high NS-CR shares

Tables I and II identify the origin-destination markets where NS and Conrail rail shares meet the "10-10-50 Test". Table I identifies the locations most affected by the combination. Review of the report's first two pages shows that of the twenty-six origin-destination pairs most affected by NS-CR, 12 are not addressed by the proposed P&LE-GTI divestitures. I have examined every traffic lane in Table I and have identified the origin-destination markets that cannot be served by the P&LE/GTI new lines. Of the 22.1 million affected tons in this report, only 44% can possibly be routed by the expanded P&LE/GTI systems.

In some cases, the new lines of GTI and P&LE do not serve affected market pairs e.g. Chicago to Lansing. In others, they cannot offer service that is independent of NS or CSX e.g. Ft. Wayne to Baltimore. In my analysis, I have assumed that GTI/P&LE will have access to the broad range of NS-CR shippers in their new divested markets. This is a very liberal assumption when considering the very limited scope of NS' line divestitures in key markets such as Chicago, St. Louis, and Indianapolis. The second largest impacted traffic flow—coal from Wheeling to Cleveland—will probably be unaffected by the divestitures because NS ensured that P&LE did not gain access to coal mines near Wheeling and utilities in Cleveland.

Table II identifies the commodities with the most affected tonnage when the "10-10-50 Test" is applied to origin-destination pairs. The principal affected commodities, viz. coal, grain, scrap, plastic pellets, paper and motor vehicle parts are all similar in their reliance on rail transportation. Review of the "Truck/Barge" shares show that rail has little significant intermodal competition for most of the affected commodities.[2]

Destinations with high CR/NS rail shares

Tables IV and V show the results of the application of the 10-10-50 Test to total commodity movements into a market area. Table IV identifies Cleveland, Evansville, Washington, Boston and Wheeling as the areas where NS and Conrail compete most vigorously for terminating traffic. In Cleveland, there are 37 affected commodities with over 10,000 tons. Intermodal competition is important (i.e. truck-barge share over 50%) for only eight of those commodities.

The GTI and P&LE divestitures do not serve the Washington and Evansville markets. It is more difficult to estimate the potential strength of GTI and P&LE in markets they do serve. Review of the "Other Rail Share" traffic terminating in Boston indicates that Guilford has limited shares for most affected commodities. GTI's weak market position in its present markets such as Boston, Philadelphia and New York and P&LE's weakness in Pittsburgh make it difficult for them to serve as an effective replacement to Conrail.

Table V identifies the commodities most affected by NS-CR control of destination traffic in key market areas. Many of the same commodities identified in the origin-destination analysis appear in this table. Table V shows that NS and CR in combination will have dominant market positions for several large commodity movements.

Coal into Cleveland 64

[1] Dr. Pittman's methodology makes no provision to identify markets that do not meet the "10-10-50 Test" or this 100% market control test. For example, a market where Conrail has a 90% share and NS has a 5% share would not be picked up by the Pittman-DOJ methodology.

[2] The source of barge and truck market information, TRANSEARCH, does not fully describe intermodal competition at the 5-digit STCC level of commodity definition chosen by Dr. Pittman.

Paper into Cleveland	85
Corn into Baltimore	70
Steel into Lansing	91
Plastics into Boston	63

These very high shares show the large scale of the proposed NS-CR system. They also indicate that GTI and P&LE must be able to attract a substantial amount of traffic if they are to serve as a meaningful competitive check to NS-CR.[3]

Origins with high CR-NS rail shares

Tables VI and VII show the origin markets that meet Dr. Pittman's "10-10-50 Test". The results differ from the destination markets because of the different mix of rail freight consuming and producing industries in each market and CR's and NS's access to their industries.

Table VI shows that Cleveland origin traffic will be most affected in terms of tonnage. Detroit is not served by GTI or PLE and will be highly dependent on NS-CR for traffic to the East and South. The P&LE was given very little additional trackage in Pittsburgh to complement its relatively weak market position. Both PLE and GTI serve Toledo but only via highly circuitous routes. P&LE was given enhanced access in the Wheeling and Youngstown areas. However, NS chose to retain access to every major traffic generating point on the divested lines. In sum, the new divested lines will have a limited benefit in several of the most impacted origin market areas.

Table VII shows that the NS-CR combination will eliminate intramodal competition at the origin for several rail dependent commodities. NS-CR will have over 50% shares of at least thirteen origin commodity movements of over 1,000,000 tons.

Corn from Toledo, Columbus and Lafayette, IN.

Sheet Steel from Pittsburgh, Youngstown and Cleveland.

Motor Vehicle Parts from Detroit.

Cyclic Intermediates from Houston.

Steel Pipe from Cleveland.

Soybean Cake from Champaign, IL.

Steel Bars from Celevland.

Broken Stone from Toledo.

As most of these commodities are heavily dependent on rail transportation, Conrail and NS are now the only competitive alternatives available to many "affected" shippers. To be truly competitive, P&LE and GTI's new systems will have to serve a much broader market than their traditional bases in the steel and paper industries respectively.

Origin-destination pairs served exclusively by NS-CR

The Pittman-DOJ methodology focuses in those markets where there is clear evidence of serious intramodal competition. The Department of Justice has traditionally been less concerned about instances of present monopoly control deeming them to be unaffected by a new combination of competitors. Dr. Pittman separately identified these cases in his Tables VIII and IX.

Table VIII shows the origin-destination markets currently controlled by NS and/or Conrail. Review of the first two pages of the table show that Conrail has complete control of many important rail markets. If NS acquires Conrail it would, in turn, become the monopoly carrier in many parts of the Northeast. The data also show that a combination of NS and Conrail market shares in several markets such as Cleveland to Wheeling and Toledo to Cleveland will result in the elimination of "potential" NS and CR competition. It should be noted again that the Pittman DOJ methodology only selects markets where NS-CR share is 100%. If their combined share reaches only 94% or 97%, they would be screened from Tables VIII and IX.

Table IX identifies the commodity movements now controlled by NS or Conrail. The combination of NS and Conrail monopoly markets will have the most immediate impact on the coal, stone, steel and grain industries. The combined NS-CR route structure will also include many of the important service routes for piggyback shipments as well.

COMPARISON OF NS-CR AND SF-SP MARKET IMPACTS

The comparison of the NS-CR and SF-SP rail combinations cannot be based solely on review of quantitative market share data such as that assembled by Dr. Pittman. Indeed, the Pittman methodology is not definitive as there are several other useful measures of the antitrust implications of a rail merger. There are many subjective issues differentiating NS-CR from SF-SP that cannot be portrayed in market share reports. However, the Pittman market share analysis is as comprehensive as any other presented in previous rail merger cases. A straight comparison of the NS-CR and SF-SP share data produced by the Pittman-DOJ methodology is an objective way to identify many of the differences and similarities between the two cases.

[3] The impact on Eastern coal-fired utilities will be particularly severe. The reliance of 50 power plants on NS and CR competition is confirmed in a recent study for the Interstate Commerce Commission Coal Fired Utilities Dependency on Rail Carriers as a Transport Delivery Mode.

Twenty-five destination markets most impacted by NS-CR. Six market areas have over 1,000,000 affected tons in the Pittman analysis of SF-SP. The same methodology identifies fifteen NS-CR market areas with over 1,000,000 affected tons. The 25 largest NS-CR market areas have in total 81.9 million affected tons or 139% of the top 25 SF-SP destination markets.

Origins (Table VI). The comparison of Exhibits 1 and 2 for origin traffic again shows that NS-CR will have a larger impact than SF-SP in terms of affected tons. Fifteen NS-CR origin markets are greater than 1,000,000 tons; only ten SF-SP markets are at that level. NS-CR affected tonnage in the top 25 origin areas is 111.7% of the total for SF-SP's top 25 origin markets.

The map in Exhibit 3 portrays the origin and destination markets with over 1,000,000 tons affected by NS-CR or SF-SP. Clearly NS-CR's impacts are more concentrated geographically than those of SF-SP. However, many more markets are affected by NS-CR.

Exhibit 3 not reproducible for the RECORD.

Exclusively Served Markets. Table VIII in Pittman's testimony identifies the origin-destination traffic lanes that would be controlled by SF-SP. They are concentrated in the region stretching from San Francisco to El Paso.

The pattern of NS-CR controlled traffic lanes is less clear. However, there is a high concentration in the Northeast where Conrail is today the dominant carrier.

One simple comparison of the potential monopoly power of NS-CR versus SF-SP can be made. Dr. Pittman's SF-SP Table VIII has 180 pages; my NS-CR Table VIII has 335 pages.

Commodity impacts

Dr. Pittman's Tables II, V, VII, and IX examine the commodities most affected by a rail merger.

Traffic Lanes (Table II). Dr. Pittman identified two commodities with over 1,000,000 affected tons in traffic lanes were SF and SP compete: corn and plastic pellets. Coal, corn, crushed stone, and steel scrap meet that criterion in the NS-CR analysis. The traffic lane movements of coal affected by NS-CR total over 11.7 million tons, more than the total combined tonnage for the 40 largest affected commodities in Dr. Pittman's Table II.

Destinations (Table V). Exhibits 4 and 5 identify the commodities at origin or destination most severely impacted by SF-SP and NS-CR respectively. The four commodities most affected at destination by NS-CR—coal, paper, corn and sheet steel—have combined tonnage almost equal to all ten of the largest commodities affected by SF-SP at destination.

Origins (Table VII). The ten commodities most affected by NS-CR at origin have over 43 million impacted tons—over 242% larger than the comparable total for SF-SP's ten largest affected commodities. In both SF-SP and NS-CR cases, the commodities most affected by rail mergers are, not surprisingly, those most dependent on the rail mode.

Exclusively Served Markets (Table IX). Dr. Pittman's testimony identifies coal, copper ore, corn, sodium compounds and cement as the commodities most vulnerable to SF-SP control. Coal, crushed stone, piggyback traffic, iron ore and steel scrap are the commodities most vulnerable to possible NS-CR control. However, while only two SF-SP commodities have over 1,000,000 affected tons. 18 NS-CR commodities have over 1,000,000 tons.

COMPARISON OF DOJ ANALYSES OF NS-CR AND SF-SP CASES

The Department of Justice chose an analytical approach in the NS-CR case that differed markedly from that employed by Dr. Pittman in the SF-SP case. At this point, the limited documentation available from the DOJ describing their NS-CR analysis makes it impossible to fully understand every facet of their approach. As a rule, it seems that the DOJ in NS-CR used a very fine screening process in order to arrive at findings that support a divestiture recommendation. Dr. Pittman offered very few prescriptive conclusions in his testimony. Indeed, the Department of Justice has yet to make a definitive ruling on SF-SP.

The DOJ analysis of NS-CR was in every way more limiting than that used by Dr. Pittman.

The DOJ's geographic area in NS-CR was the county; Pittman used larger Business Economic Areas.

In NS-CR, DOJ analyzed only origin and destination markets, Pittman also studied origin-destination traffic lanes.

In NS-CR, DOJ screened out market areas controlled by another railroad eg. BN in eastern Montana; Pittman did not use this screen.

DOJ screened small markets (under $2 million) from consideration in NS-CR; there was no volume screen in SF-SP.

If DOJ found one major shipper supporting NS-CR, e.g. Ford Motor in Wayne County, it screened out that county; Pittman had no comparable exclusion rule.

Present NS or CR monopoly markets eg. New York City were excluded by DOJ; Pittman examined exclusively served markets separately.

An intermodal competition screen was used in NS-CR; Pittman used evidence of intermodal competition as a check but not as a screen.

I do not have enough evidence to determine whether the DOJ's analysis of the NS-CR combination is better or worse than Pittman's SF-SP analysis. Certainly, the DOJ analysis in the NS-CR case differs radically from Dr. Pittman's. The use of counties, the $2 million volume screen, and shipper support (rather than opposition) to NS-CR has the inevitable effect of greatly reducing the scope NS-CR's anti-competitive impacts. Without additional documentation and a fuller explanation of their rationale, the analytical approach chosen by DOJ to study NS-CR remains open to question. The skepticism that surrounds the DOJ's findings on NS-CR can only be removed by a more complete explanation of the DOJ's approach and recommendations. In addition, the Department must explain why such radically different approaches were taken to analyze two rail mergers.

REEBIE ASSOCIATES,
Greenwich, CT, June 11, 1985.

Hon. LARRY PRESSLER,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PRESSLER: Per your request, I am forwarding to you copies of the anti-competitive impact analysis reports that I developed for RBC Associates.

These reports replicate the approach taken by Dr. Russell Pittman, the Department of Justice's economist who reviewed the anti-trust implications of the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger (ATSF-SP). In brief, Dr. Pittman's approach analyzes market share data to identify the markets where two railroads compete today and, after consolidation, would control at least 50% of the rail market.

I have produced eight tables that analyze the combined market shares of Norfolk Southern (NS) and Conrail in several different ways. The Pittman-DOJ methodology clearly identifies the commodities, origin markets, destination markets and origin-destination markets that would be controlled by NS if it acquired Conrail.

I have examined both the ATSF-SP reports produced by the Department of Justice and the NS-Conrail reports that we produced using the Pittman-DOJ methodology. Several observations can be made:

1. When using Pittman's measurement of affected tons, the scope of the anti-competitive impact of NS-Conrail is much larger than ATSF-SP.

2. Many commodities most severely impacted by NS-Conrail such as coal, iron ore, pulp and corn, are not protected by motor carrier competition from rail monopolies.

3. NS-Conrail will control many more market areas than ATSF-SP, especially in the Northeast and Midwest.

4. Many markets identified as problems by the Pittman-DOJ methodology are not addressed by the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie-Guilford divestiture plan.

5. The results of the Pittman-DOJ methodology differ significantly in form and substance from the supporting documentation used in the DOJ's evaluation of NS-Conrail.

Please find enclosed a brief explanation of the Pittman-DOJ methodology used to prepare these reports. If I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to call me.

Yours truly,

ANDREW ROBERTSON.

ATTACHMENT 5—MAJOR STATISTICAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN WHAT DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE DID IN SF/SP AND NS/CR

KEY FINDINGS

Taken together these findings make three important points:

(1) The number of commodities and locations affected by the NS/CR merger are greater than the Justice Department claims. Total problem tons are probably much greater, however, Justice has never indicated how many tons their study covers.

(2) Even assuming the so-called "divestiture" solution will work, the data demonstrates that it will solve less than one half of the competitive problems created by a NS/CR merger.

(3) The competitive problems created by NS/CR are far greater than those created by SF/SP, yet Justice spent more time studying SF/SP and used a much more rigorous analysis.

Tables I and II—Origin-destination pairs (traffic lanes)

(1) 56% of the 22.1 million problem tons identified will not be affected by the "divestiture" solution even if it works as planned.

(2) Traffic lane movements of coal affected by NS/CR total over 11.7 million tons, more than the total combined tonnage for the 40 largest affected commodities in SF/SP.

Tables IV and V—Destinations

(1) 6 destination markets have over 1 million problem tons in SF/SP, compared to 15 destination markets with over 1 million problem tons in NS/CR.

(2) The 25 largest NS/CR destination markets have a total of 81.9 million problem tons or 139% of the top 25 SF/SP destination markets.

(3) The four commodities most affected at destination by NS/CR—coal, paper, corn and sheet steel—have combined tonnage almost equal to all ten of the largest commodities affected by SF/SP at destination.

Tables VI and VII—Origins

(1) 10 origin markets have over 1 million problem tons in SF/SP compared to 15 origin markets with over 1 million problem tons in NS/CR.

(2) The 25 largest NS/CR origin markets have a total of 60.9 million problem tons or 111.7% of the top 25 SF/SP origin markets.

(3) The 10 commodities most affected by NS/CR at origin have over 43 million impacted tons—over 24% larger than the comparable total for SF/SP's ten largest affected commodities.

Tables VIII and IX—Monopoly control

(1) SF/SP's Table VIII has 57 pages while the NS/CR Table VIII has 335 pages.

(2) 2 SF/SP commodities have over 1 million problem tons subject to monopoly control, while NS/CR has 18 such commodities over 1 million tons.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the Senate's consideration of Conrail legislation, S. 638, at this time. I say "at this time" because I think most people would like at some time to see the Government out of the railroad business, but they want to do it in a way that is practical and fair and preserves competition. We are being asked by the proponents of a Norfolk Southern purchase of Conrail to rush to judgment without the benefit of a deliberate and thorough consideration of the anticompetitive impact of this merger by either the Justice Department or the Interstate Commerce Commission.

As my colleagues well know, a full year ago, the Department of Justice found that the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern would violate the antitrust laws and stated that divestitures must be made to provide long-term viable competition before they—Department of Justice—would approve the transaction. Upon examining Norfolk Southern's first divestiture plan, the Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, Douglas Ginsburg, found it to be inadequate in providing long-term viable competitive service. That was a year ago.

The Department of Justice subsequently stated in its press release of November 19, 1985, that the latest divestiture plan "appears on its face to address the competitive concerns" raised by the acquisition. Very significantly, however, Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg went on to say in the fine print, so to speak,

It is appropriate for the division and an independent consultant to begin the very detailed study of the plan that will be required before I can conclusively advise the Attorney General whether the proposed divestiture addresses the competitive concerns raised by this transaction.

Mr. President, I could not agree more with the Assistant Attorney General. I believe that this type of detailed study must be completed and subjected to very careful review by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary before the Senate considers S. 638.

In addition, I am troubled by the fact that this proposed merger has bypassed all the traditional review mechanisms for railroad mergers and consequently, interested States and other parties have not had the opportunity to participate and make their views known.

I realize that the original legislation creating Conrail exempts the sale from the usual review process. But in writing that legislation, perhaps we did not thoroughly consider that the sale may be to another railroad. Since this sale is proposed to another large railroad, perhaps we should follow the thorough procedures applicable to railroad mergers and acquisitions. The abbreviated review process has cut States, shippers, and other interested parties out of the decisionmaking process. Their only opportunity to be heard has been through their congressional representatives.

My point is that we should not rush to voting on this without thoroughly considering their views. They are the ones most directly affected.

Mr. President, I do not stand alone. Prior to the Justice Department's tentative approval of the new divestiture plan, the attorney general of the State of Ohio, Anthony Celebrezze, and 15 other States' attorneys general—15 of them—publicly opposed the Norfolk Southern merger because of its wide anticompetitive impact. They had looked at it carefully from the standpoint of how it was going to affect their States.

In testimony presented before the House Judiciary Committee on October 17, 1985, Attorneys General Neil Hartigan of Illinois, LeRoy Zimmerman of Pennsylvania, and Anthony Celebrezze of Ohio described in some detail the anticompetitive impact of the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger. They pointed out the deficient procedures used by the U.S. Government in evaluating the proposed sale.

I invite my colleagues, particularly those who are former attorneys general, to review this statement carefully. I believe we have a number of former attorneys general in the Senate. Senator BINGAMAN, Senator DANFORTH—floor manager of this bill—Senator EAGLETON, Senator SLADE GORTON, Senator WARREN RUDMAN, and Senator

ROBERT STAFFORD—I believe they are all former attorneys general. I doubt very much that they would, while they were in their States acting as attorney general, have recommended as the Justice Department has done that we go ahead while they are still studying the issue before them. Yet that is what has happened in this particular situation.

The main point that the State attorneys general made when they came in and testified was that there had to be a better study and that Justice had to give their opinion—Justice and/or the Interstate Commerce Commission.

They were concerned about something else. They were concerned that consideration of this merger was being made on a different basis from consideration of other mergers and other business transactions, that those procedures were being bypassed.

Subsequent to the release of Norfolk Southern's final divestiture plan, those 16 attorneys general plus 8 more attorneys general have expressed their opposition to the Senate's consideration of the merger at this premature time. And they make a special point of that. They do not say that they are against a merger into the indefinite future; they say we do not know enough about it to make that long-reaching decision at this time. So they say it is premature. Indeed, Mr. President, in a December 2, 1985, letter to our distinguished majority leader and minority leader, the 22 attorneys general wrote:

> The Department of Justice repeatedly has found that the merger would violate both the Clayton Antitrust Act and the Interstate Commerce Act. A determination of whether the latest—November 19—in a series of three proposed divestiture plans ameliorate these anticompetitive consequences can only be determined after careful study and review by the affected States and the Department's independent consultant.

This is still part of the quote:

> Even the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division has declined to give its unequivocal approval of the sale until after its independent consultant has completed its own study of Norfolk Southern's third divestiture plan.

That is very clear, Mr. President. The attorneys general urge that the Senate postpone floor consideration until after this independent consultant's investigation is completed and until interested States and their parties have an opportunity to study the latest divestiture proposal and comment on it. That is just the height of common sense, it seems to me, that we do exactly that.

I ask unanimous consent that the December 2, 1985, letter be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I agree with the attorneys general. I want to point out what my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] reported to us yesterday. The Department of Justice has not even hired their independent consultant yet. I repeat that: The Department of Justice has not even hired their independent consultant yet. I invite my colleagues to read yesterday's RECORD, where Senator SPECTER included a January 21, 1986, letter to him from the Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg.

Mr. Ginsburg reported that the divestiture plan has been given to all affected States, but I doubt that they have had time to review and comment on it. Mr. Ginsburg also reports that information was only requested on January 8 from Guilford [GTI] and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie [P&LE] Railroads—information about employment, financing, and equipment that is crucial for the detailed study of the final divestiture plan. So the Department of Justice does not have all the information it needs to approve this sale and yet, Mr. President, they tell the U.S. Senate it should go ahead and approve it. What kind of governmental nonsense is that?

Mr. President, I am particularly concerned about the impact of this proposal in my home State of Ohio. In September, the Ohio Department of Transportation released a report that went into great detail on the impact of the pending Conrail sale on Ohio's freight rail transportation system and its economy. Ohio would be particularly affected because the overlap in rail service currently provided by Conrail and Norfolk Southern is greater than in any other State. I repeat, if this legislation passes and the merger is completed, Ohio would be more affected than any other State in the Union so we are very concerned about this. That is the reason Ohio went ahead and did a separate study—to make sure that we knew how this was going to impact on Ohio.

The Department of Justice identified what they considered problem markets where competition would be most seriously affected. Half of these markets are located in Ohio. However, the study identified additional Ohio markets that are vulnerable to anticompetitive effects of the merger. These concerns were not addressed to Ohio's satisfaction by the divestiture plans submitted to the Department of Justice.

Mr. President, shippers throughout the country are also expressing concern about the anticompetitive impact of a Norfolk Southern takeover of Conrail. For example, last November 22 the National Industrial Transportation League, which directly or indirectly controls the routing of approximately 80 percent of the Nation's commerce, endorsed a public sale of Conrail and stated in a letter to all Members of the Senate that the current proposal to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation did not meet its criteria.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter of December 3, 1985, from the National Industrial Transportation League be included in the RECORD following the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, in my home State of Ohio many shippers actively oppose the merger with Norfolk Southern just because of its anticompetitive impacts. These include such firms as: Buckeye Industrial Mining Co. of Lisbon; Carpentertown Coal & Coke Co. of Medina; CITGO Petroleum Corp.; Early & Daniel Co. of Cincinnati; J.G.H. & Associates of Maineville; M.A. Hanna Co. of Cleveland; National Refractories & Minerals, Inc. of Columbiana; Ohio Mining & Reclamation Association of Columbus; Procter & Gamble of Cincinnati; Rail-Van Consolidated of Worthington; and RBS, Inc. of Cincinnati. As days go by, we hear more and more from these other Ohio companies.

Mr. President, the input I have received from Ohio and other States, businesses and other interested parties underscores a serious concern that I have with this proposal. The procedures employed for this proposal differ significantly from the rigorous scrutiny traditionally employed for rail mergers. The only formal scrutiny of the current proposal has been a study by the Department of Justice, and as explained in the attorneys general's letter this review did not use the most accurate and generally accepted method of describing geographic competition. It was inconsistent with the standard analyses employed by the Department in other rail merger cases.

Consequently, the Department's report may significantly understate the anticompetitive effects of the merger. That is particularly valid in Ohio, probably the State most affected by the Norfolk Southern purchase of Conrail.

Mr. President, there is another aspect I would like to use as an example of why the Department of Justice review is inadequate. It is crucial that the Department of Justice thoroughly review the Conrail sale to ensure effective competition, but I would point out the success of the sale depends on the ability of two smaller railroads, Guilford Transportation Industries [GTI], and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad, to provide viable competition. Yet grave doubts remain about the financial ability of the Guilford and PL&E to acquire the divested Norfolk Southern lines and effectively compete with a Norfolk Southern-Conrail giant.

I must take this opportunity to compare the situation to the Department of Justice's recent handling of the LTV-Republic Steel merger. As a condition of the merger, the Department of Justice insisted that LTV sell off its Enduro plant at Massillon, OH, with some 700 employees, in order to maintain competition in the steel industry. The Department approved the purchase of Enduro to an undercapitalized buyer and now there is less competition because the plant is closed, the workers are unemployed. How is that for competition under the guidance and leadership of the Department of Justice?

Mr. President, I would refer to an article in the January 30, 1986 edition of Business Week called "LTV-Republic: Did Justice Blow It?"

I ask unanimous consent that that article be printed in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, we are on the threshold of rushing to approve a merger, the impact of which we are only beginning to identify and appreciate. We do not have a pressing deadline. We certainly do not have an emergency which compels us to rush this legislation through the Senate. What is the hurry, I would ask? Things have been going along well. If we had all the information, I might be leading the charge here along with the distinguished Senator from Missouri to say that we will get the Government out of the railroad business. But here we have the Department of Justice, which has not even completed the analysis that they wish to make with an outside consultant before they even are willing to make the recommendation to the Attorney General of the United States, in the same letter saying they recommend the Senate go ahead with its action.

Now, what kind of topsy-turvy nonsense is that? Is that the way to set up a railroad system that is going to affect the long-term aspects of commerce and shipping in the United States? The point is we do not have a pressing deadline. We do not have an emergency which compels us to rush this legislation through the Senate. We must stop what may in retrospect come to be viewed as an irresponsible approval of the largest railroad combination in the Nation.

The magnitude of the anticompetitive problems which have been identified and the complexity of the analysis required to review this merger demands careful and thoughtful review by experts at the Justice Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by our own Judiciary and Commerce Committees before consideration by the Senate. To do less would be abdicating our legislative responsibilities. So I certainly urge my colleagues to postpone consideration of this legislation.

Mr. President, as I went through my comments, I referred to several other references, and I would like to go back and refer to some of them again.

I talked earlier about the reports that the attorneys general made when they came to Washington and what they proposed before the House committee. Sixteen attorneys general came from States around this Nation—not all of them just in the East, not all of them in the area primarily affected. They came from as far away as Nebraska, Minnesota, and North Dakota, as well as a majority of the Eastern States that would be directly affected by this legislation.

I will read just a few excerpts from the report they made. They talked about the merger's magnitude. They said:

The proposed sale of Conrail by the Department of Transportation to the Norfolk Southern Corporation is of unprecedented magnitude. It will create the nation's largest railroad, with 32,000 miles of tracks extending through 23 states. It will eliminate head-to-head competition between the Norfolk Southern and Conrail throughout many of our states. It will have a devastating effect on the Midwest, the Northeast, and the South.

That is a direct quotation. These are 16 of our State attorneys general.

The second item they took up was on antitrust immunity, and I quote from that section:

The proposal is unprecedented in another way. The authorizing legislation would immunize the merger from the antitrust laws, despite the fact that the merger will create a "mega-carrier" with devastating impact on railroad competition in the Eastern and Midwestern regions of our country.

The Department of Transportation's proposed legislation would shortcircuit all the hearing and review procedures that the Congress has carefully built into the Interstate Commerce Act (Chapter 13 of Title 49, U.S.C.) to assure that rail mergers do not violate fundamental antitrust principles. Under current law, all proposed rail mergers are subjected to a full-scale adjudicatory hearing, where interested parties have an opportunity to present evidence and to cross-examine the proponents of the merger. A complete hearing record is compiled upon which the ICC must base its decision to approve or disapprove the proposed transaction. As an added safeguard, the ICC's decision is subject to judicial review.

None of these protections will apply in this case. Instead, the proposed legislation would confer absolute antitrust immunity upon both Norfolk Southern's purchase of Conrail and Norfolk Southern's future operation of Conrail as part of the giant Norfolk Southern system.

Mr. Chairman, there is no emergency or pressing national need which justifies such a drastic and unprecedented proposal.

I am still quoting from the report. I will repeat the last sentence:

Mr. Chairman, there is no emergency or pressing national need which justifies such a drastic and unprecedented proposal. Conrail is not a failing company that can only be saved by a sale to a major competitor. To the contrary, Conrail is a thriving, profitable carrier. By the end of 1985, Conrail will have had five consecutive profitable years. Conrail had a net income of $210 million for the first six months of this year and expects to have $995 million in cash on hand at the end of the year. A study by the independent U.S. Railway Association concludes that there is every reason to expect Conrail's record of profitability to continue.

It is clear that a transaction of this scope and magnitude merits closer scrutiny than the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger has received to date. This Subcommittee's efforts have been highly successful in illuminating many of the heretofore unnoticed competitive problems with the proposed merger. However, the limitations inherent in the hearing process prevent it from fully replacing the rigorous analysis and judicial review which railroad mergers historically have received.

The Federal Government "bailed out" the bankrupt Penn-Central and other Northeastern railroads and created a viable Northeastern railroad system under the aegis of Conrail. Congressional approval of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger without an appropriate ICC evidentiary hearing would be the equivalent of legislatively sanctioning the acquisition of Chrysler by General Motors or of Lockheed by General Electric after the Federal Government's loans and guarantees resulted in the successful rehabilitation of these companies.

Secretary Dole's objective to see Conrail transferred to the private sector is commendable and one which we endorse. Such a laudable goal alone does not, however, justify a sale that will have enormous anticompetitive impacts in violation of basic antitrust principles.

In contrast to the rigorous scrutiny to which rail mergers are traditionally subjected, the only formal scrutiny of the current proposal has been a cursory study by the Department of Justice. This review did not use the most accurate and generally accepted method of describing geographic competition, and it was inconsistent with the standard analyses used by the Department in other rail merger cases. Consequently, the Department's report significantly understates the anticompetitive effects of the merger.

Mr. President, all that is a quotation from the testimony that was given by the attorneys general when they were before the congressional committee in the House.

I go to a third area of concern in the report of the attorneys general. They talk in their testimony about deficiencies in the analysis of the Department of Justice. I quote from that portion of their testimony:

The Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice concluded, based on a superficial analysis, that "the proposed [Norfolk Southern-Conrail] merger would violate both Clayton and Interstate Commerce Act merger review standards." (January 29, 1985 letter from J. Paul McGrath to the Secretary of Transportation.) Assistant Attorney General McGrath further noted that "the merger would have a significant adverse effect on competition for the transport of commodities to and from a number of locations in several states, with the greatest adverse effect occurring at locations along an east-west rail corridor running between Buffalo and Pittsburgh in the east and St. Louis and Chicago in the west."

As significant as those findings, are, it is clear that the Justice Department seriously understated the likely impact of a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger. In its January 29, 1985 letter to Secretary Dole, the Antitrust Division identified only 10 counties—five in Ohio, two in Michigan, two in Indiana, and one in New York—that would suffer effects from the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger so adverse as to warrant the government's opposition to the transaction on antitrust grounds. Separate analyses by competing railroads throughout the country have identified substantially more. For example, one study identified 53 Business Economic Area (BEA) pairs that under the formula traditionally used by the Department would be considered "highly concentrated markets" where the merger would be likely to "substantially lessen competition."

This disparity is a result of several deficiencies in the Antitrust Division's analysis. First, the Antitrust Division, without explanation, made no use of the Herfindahl-Hirschman Index ("HHI") in this case. The HHI, of course, is a formula used to measure the degree of concentration of a particular market. It was endorsed by the Department in both the 1982 and 1984 Merger Guidelines, and has been consistently used by the Department in analyzing the competitive effects of proposed mergers. In its Norfolk Southern-Conrail analysis, however, the Department employed a "50-10" test, whereby it examined only those geographic markets where (1) each of Norfolk Southern and Conrail currently has at least 10% of the rail transportation on movements in or out of the market, and (2) the railroads together have 50% or more of such traffic.

The exclusive use of the "50-10" test fails to recognize a substantial number of market areas which would be significantly affected by the proposed combination, since the "50-10" test would ignore all markets in which either Norfolk Southern or Conrail does not have a 10% share, regardless of the share of the other party.

So the report made by the attorneys general when they were before the House committee listed those basic three areas of disagreement. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I should like to go on with a few excerpts from the Ohio Department of Transportation report.

Probably, from what I have seen so far, I believe that the State of Ohio, expressing its very deep concern about the impact that this proposed legislation would have on our State, has commissioned what turned out to be the most detailed study, as far as I know, that any State has conducted with regard to this merger.

I would just excerpt a few things from the Ohio Department of Transportation report, because it is almost like a book it is so complete; so I would not want to either put the whole thing in the RECORD nor would I want to try to read it here today. It would take more than a day just to read it into the RECORD. Let me read some excerpts from that report.

On the negative side, the sale of Conrail to NS could adversely affect Ohio's transportation system and its economy in the following ways:

The reduction in competition could result in higher rates and lower service quality for Ohio shippers.

A combined NS/Conrail, without accounting for divestiture or traffic diversion, would have considerable market control in Ohio: about 64 percent of the route miles in Ohio would be owned by NS/Conrail; 45 percent of all rail stations would be served only by NS/Conrail; 58 percent of all rail shipments from Ohio would be originated by NS/Conrail; and 48 percent of all rail shipments to Ohio would be terminated by NS/Conrail. Though 8 counties in Ohio have been identified by the department of Justice as particularly vulnerable to anticompetitive effects of an NS/Conrail merger, reduced competition in 10 other counties also is of concern.

Consolidation of redundant yards, terminals, and operating lines would result in elimination of positions. NS projects 801 positions will be eliminated in Ohio associated with abandonments and consolidations.

The diversion of traffic from CSX and Grand Trunk Western to NS/Conrail would contribute to reduced service, line abandonments and employment layoffs by CSX (Chessie) and Grand Trunk.

CSX Corporation, owner of Chessie System, Ohio's other major carrier, projects reduced service, line abandonments and an immediate loss of 900 Chessie jobs in Ohio, primarily the result of NS/Conrail's ability to shut CSX out of current joint movements with Conrail. Grand Trunk projects a 10 percent loss in business, which could cause abandonments and service reductions in Ohio. NS places potential revenue losses at 90 percent below CSX's projections and 60 percent below Grand Trunk's projections.

Mr. President, that is just one part of the Ohio report. I will not go ahead reading more into this. Obviously, we need to take a long, long look at this proposed legislation before we pass it. One of the things that I come back to, one of the major points I would like to make, is that the Justice Department itself, charged with looking into the competitive aspects of this merger, charged with looking into the maintenance of competition, has refused to say exactly what they think about this until they do further study. And they have said this in a letter as recently as yesterday, which Senator SPECTER read into the RECORD yesterday. Yet they recommend that the Senate go ahead and make its determination as to whether this merger should take place.

I repeat what I started out with, that I am not against getting the Government out of the railroad business. I am not against it in any way. I think most Members of this body feel the same way. But to rush into this thing without doing the studies required to see what anticompetitive impact this will or will not have, and when the Justice Department has not completed their findings on this, we are moving to consider something that is going to have a major impact on the United States of America, on our transportation system, and one that will be a long time in existence. So what we do, we better do very carefully.

I see no big rush to judgment on this. I am not trying to put it off forever. But the Justice Department, in the letter that they sent over yesterday and which Senator SPECTER put in the RECORD, indicated that they could probably have their research done and make their conclusions this spring. Let me quote that part of the letter directly. It says:

> We hope to complete the process and make a recommendation to the Attorney General by late March or early April about whether the new divestiture proposal will do in fact what it appears to do on its face—provide long-term viable and competitive rail service to the areas identified in our January 29 and March 26, 1985 letters to Secretary Dole.

Mr. President, there is absolutely no reason why we should consider this legislation before the Attorney General of the United States is able to give us his best judgment and that of his Department on what the antitrust provisions of this legislation are likely to be. So I am very much opposed to this legislation going through at this time—I repeat, just at this time. I am not against considering it later or once they made their recommendations, but right now we are rushing to judgment on something that we do not know what the impact on it will be. And I do not want to see the U.S. Senate proceed on that basis.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

December 2, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader, Senate, Washington, DC.
Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD,
Minority Leader, Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS DOLE AND BYRD: Pending before the Senate is S. 638, a bill which would authorize the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern and thus create the nation's largest railroad with 32,000 track miles extending through 23 states. The proposed legislation would immunize the merger from the antitrust laws and would eliminate the usual and customary review of the merger by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts.

We urge you to defer floor consideration of this legislation until after the Department of Justice's independent consultant has completed its study of the antitrust implications of the sale and Norfolk Southern's latest divestiture proposal, and until interested States and other parties have had an opportunity to study the latest proposal and testify with respect to the proposal and the report of the Department's independent consultant.

On October 17, 1985, sixteen State Attorneys General submitted Joint Comments to the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law opposing the Norfolk Southern proposal on antitrust grounds.[1] The proposed sale clearly will have a profound impact on our national rail system, and on shippers, receivers and consumers throughout the country.

The Department of Justice repeatedly has found that the merger would violate both the Clayton Antitrust Act and the Interstate Commerce Act. A determination of whether the latest (November 19) in a series of three proposed divestiture plans ameliorates these anticompetitive consequences can only be determined after careful study and review by the affected states and the Department's independent consultant. Even the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division has declined to give its unequivocal approval of the sale until after its independent consultant has completed its own study of Norfolk Southern's third divestiture plan.

We support the goal of the Administration and the Congress that Conrail be returned to the private sector. There is no pressing national need, however, to justify restructuring our nation's rail system and immunizing the largest railroad merger in the United States from the usual and customary process less than one month after a complex divestiture plan is proposed and before that plan can be evaluated by the affected states and the independent consultant retained for that purpose by the Department of Justice.

Thank you for your consideration of these views.

Very truly yours,

NEIL F. HARTIGAN,
Attorney General of Illinois and 21 State Attorneys General Cosigning.

EXHIBIT 2

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL TRANSPORTATION LEAGUE,
Washington, DC, December 3, 1985.

MEMBERS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: The National Industrial Transportation League would like to take this opportunity to inform you about its members' recent policy actions on the disposition of Conrail.

The League is a voluntary organization of shippers, shippers' associations, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other entities concerned with the purchasing of transportation services. It is the only way nationwide organization representing shippers of all sizes and commodities using all modes of transportation to move their goods in interstate and international commerce. Its members, directly or indirectly, are responsible for the routing of about 80% of the nation's commerce.

The League has long been concerned about assuring adequate rail service to, from, and within the northeast and midwest. It has played an active role in the creation of Conrail as well as in helping to provide the mechanisms to assure the railroad's return to the private sector. It has provided its members and the shipping public with extensive educational opportunities to explore the ramifications of the various purchase offers reviewed by the Department of Transportation, Department of Justice, Congress, and others. It has acted as a clearinghouse to provide the shipping public with reliable information about the current transfer process.

While Congress intended in the Northeast Rail Service Act to expedite Conrail's return to the private sector, its circumvention of the Interstate Commerce Commission's traditional review process has left shippers and regional carriers without the degree of input to address critical operational issues they normally would have in major merger or consolidation proceedings.

League members strongly believe that competition is the key to creating a national rail transportation system which meets the nation's present and future commercial and defense needs. In fact, at its recent annual meeting, held November 19 to 21, the membership adopted the following merger policy:

"B-18. Railroad Mergers. The League supports the attachment of reasonable conditions to ICC approval of railroad merger applications that would retain and/or enhance competition through: (1) direct physical access by competitive carriers to industrial facilities affected by a merger or mutually accepted reciprocal switching charges; (2) grants of trackage rights; and, (3) required maintenance of, or opening of, economically viable interchange points."

Based on this concern with competition, the members also adopted the following position on Conrail's return to the private sector:

"The League supports a public sale of Conrail to enhance competition, maintain service, and develop the financial viability of the railroads in the northeast."

League members do not believe that the current proposal to sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corporation meets these criteria. They would urge your serious consideration of their recent actions as a means of resolving the current stalemate facing the shipping community.

The League looks forward to working with you and your staff on this important national policy issue. If you have any questions or wish to discuss the matter further, please do not hesitate to contact my office.

Sincerely,

JAMES E. BARTLEY,
Executive Vice President

[From Business Week, January 1986]

LTV-REPUBLIC: DID JUSTICE BLOW IT?

(By Zachary Schiller)

The scene is familiar in the Midwest: Another steel mill in another steel town is silent. Outside, jobless workers are circulating a petition demanding the reopening of their plant. But Enduro Stainless Inc., in Massillon, Ohio, is no ordinary industry casualty. Just last year it was a money-making stainless steel operation with a well-known name. Then the lawyers arrived.

The Massillon plant was part of Republic Steel Corp. when Republic and LTV Corp. merged in 1984. In a whirl of controversy over the deal, the Justice Dept.'s Antitrust Div. approved the merger on the condition that LTV sell off Enduro and another plant in Gadsden, Ala. Spinning off the plants, the antitrust lawyers reasoned, was the best way to maintain competition in the steel industry. Instead, the antitrusters may have sealed the fate of the plant by approving its purchase by an undercapitalized buyer.

FLIP-FLOP

None of the theories about antitrust law sounds very convincing in Massillon these days. Enduro isn't contributing much to competition anymore. And the Antitrust Div. is fending off criticism that it bungled the most closely watched merger of the Reagan Administration. The criticism comes from all sides of the debate now raging in Washington over antitrust policy. Hard-core antitrusters are saying the spinoff problems and LTV's own precarious finances support their contention that the LTV-Republic merger should never have been approved. Others, such as Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige, say it is folly to force companies to sell off assets to make mergers work.

The Republic-LTV marriage caused problems in Washington from the start. Shortly after it was announced, the Assistant Attorney General then in charge of the Antitrust Div., J. Paul McGrath, said the deal violated antitrust rules. Within weeks he had been publicly second-guessed by Baldrige and the President, who declared the deal an example of one that should not be blocked. Within weeks, McGrath reversed himself.

Justice staffers say the pressure to move the deal along didn't end once McGrath had approved the merger. It continued while the division reviewed the potential buyers for the two plants set for divestiture. Some industry sources say the buyer for the Massillon plant that Justice eventually approved, a company controlled by investor Robert Newstat, was a bad choice from the start. At the time, Newstat owned CDH Metals Inc., a major metals distribution company. Just after acquiring Enduro, Newstat sold CDH, and a few weeks later it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization. An LTV controller recently said in a legal filing that Newstat's company "never had the financial capability to effectively compete in the first place." What's more, some steel executives say Newstat's financial difficulties were well known. His problems with Enduro, says one industry source, "should have been foreseen, given his track record of the last several years."

Some antitrust staffers agree that McGrath overlooked some red flags. In approving the sale, in fact, McGrath overruled a staff recommendation against it. "The staff believed the financial problems of Newstat and his group were more serious than the people above us believed," says Eric F. Kaplan, who worked on the case until he left Justice last year. McGrath, who returned to private law practice early this year, says he doesn't remember much about the Newstat purchase but says he may have overruled his staff.

Once Newstat gained control of Enduro, he got into a bitter dispute with LTV that has both sides in federal court wrangling over a complex agreement under which LTV is to supply Enduro with raw materials. Newstat's lawyers say LTV charged too much and delivered poor quality steel. LTV admits it eventually stopped supplying Endura with steel entirely but says it did so Bellotti, Attorney General of Massachusetts, submitted to the Subcommittee his written Comment in Opposition to the Proposed Sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. A copy of Attorney General Bellotti's Comment is also enclosed.

only after Newstat had piled up more than $21 million in unpaid bills.

COLD COMFORT

In late November, Endura laid off its 700-person work force, blaming LTV for its problems. But Ken D. Saltz, president of the United Steelworkers' local in Massillon, places much of the blame on the Antitrust Div. Says Saltz: "We're outraged at the sale being allowed. . . . We took their word for it, and a lot of our benefits and livelihood are dependent on that."

It isn't much comfort to Saltz's members, but the Endura workers aren't the only ones whose lives have been changed by the LTV-Republic merger. On Dec. 13 a federal judge turned down an 11th-hour bid from an employee stock-ownership plan for the Gadsden plant that had Justice's lukewarm backing. Then the judge approved Justice's original choice for Gadsden: Akron-based Brenlin Group, which operates 14 metal-bending companies with sales of $240 million. Brenlin's chief executive, David L. Brennan, plans to get the financially troubled operation into the black by having LTV lay off the entire 2,000-person work force. Then he would reopen the plant the next day as a nonunion shop and slash the steelworkers' wages by $6 an hour. A strike is likely. If one does materialize, it will be just one more addition to the sad legacy of the LTV-Republic merger.

JOINT COMMENTS OF THE ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF THE STATES OF ILLINOIS, DELAWARE, IOWA, KANSAS, KENTUCKY, LOUISIANA, MARYLAND, MINNESOTA, NEBRASKA, NEW HAMPSHIRE, NORTH DAKOTA, OHIO, PENNSYLVANIA, RHODE ISLAND, WEST VIRGINIA, AND WISCONSIN

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, I am Neil Hartigan, Attorney General of the State of Illinois. I am accompanied today by my colleagues LeRoy Zimmerman of Pennsylvania, and Anthony J. Celebrezze, Jr. of Ohio. We are also presenting the views of the following Attorneys General: Charles M. Oberly (Delaware), Thomas J. Miller (Iowa), Robert T. Stephan (Kansas), David L. Armstrong (Kentucky), William J. Guste, Jr. (Louisiana), Stephen H. Sachs (Maryland), Hubert H. Humphrey, III (Minnesota), Robert M. Spire (Nebraska), Stephen E. Merrill (New Hampshire), Nicholas Spaeth (North Dakota), Arlene Violet (Rhode Island), Charlie Brown (West Virginia) and Bronson C. LaFollette (Wisconsin).

They share our belief that the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger is (1) anticompetitive; and (2) unnecessary to the return of Conrail to the private sector; and that it would (3) result in a radical restructuring of the American railroad industry; and (4) cause substantial economic harm to our states; (5) would not be sanctioned by the ICC if presented for approval as required for all other railroad mergers; and should not be (6) immunized from the antitrust laws.

At the conclusion of our joint remarks, I will address the specific anticompetitive harm to Illinois, General Zimmerman will discuss the specific adverse effects on the Northeast and Pennsylvania, and General Celebrezze will comment on the effects on Ohio. We are also submitting for the record a statement of Louisiana Attorney General William Guste detailing the impact in Louisiana.

We commend this Subcommittee for conducting this series of hearings to specifically examine the antitrust issues involved with the proposed merger. As the chief antitrust enforcement officers in our respective states, my colleagues and I share this Subcommittee's profound respect for our free enterprise system and the benefits conferred by a competitive marketplace.

We are here today, Mr. Chairman, to urge the Congress to reject the extraordinary and unnecessary proposed legislation to permit the largest railroad combination in American history.

I. MERGER'S MAGNITUDE

The proposed sale of Conrail by the Department of Transportation to the Norfolk Southern Corporation is of unprecedented magnitude. It will create the nation's largest railroad, with 32,000 miles of tracks extending through 23 states. It will eliminate head-to-head competition between the Norfolk Southern and Conrail throughout many of our states. It will have a devastating effect on the Midwest, the Northeast, and the South.

II. ANTITRUST IMMUNITY

The proposal is unprecedented in another way. The authorizing legislation would immunize the merger from the antitrust laws, despite the fact that the merger will create a "mega-carrier" with devastating impact on railroad competition in the Eastern and Midwestern regions of our country.

The Department of Transportation's proposed legislation would shortcircuit all the hearing and review procedures that the Congress has carefully built into the Interstate Commerce Act (Chapter 13 of Title 49, U.S.C.) to assure that rail mergers do not violate fundamental antitrust principles. Under current law, all proposed rail mergers are subjected to a full-scale adjudicatory hearing, where interested parties have an opportunity to present evidence and to cross-examine the proponents of the merger. A complete hearing record is compiled upon which the ICC must base its decision to approve or disapprove the proposed transaction. As an added safeguard, the ICC's decision is subject to judicial review.

None of these protections will apply in this case. Instead, the proposed legislation would confer absolute antitrust immunity upon both Norfolk Southern's purchase of Conrail and Norfolk Southern's future operation of Conrail as part of the giant Norfolk Southern system.

Mr. Chairman, there is no emergency or pressing national need which justifies such a drastic and unprecedented proposal. Conrail is not a failing company that can only be saved by a sale to a major competitor. To the contrary, Conrail is a thriving, profitable carrier. By the end of 1985, Conrail will have had five consecutive profitable years. Conrail had a net income of $210 million for the first six months of this year and expects to have $995 million in cash on hand at the end of the year. A study by the independent U.S. Railway Association concludes that there is every reason to expect Conrail's record of profitability to continue.

It is clear that a transaction of this scope and magnitude merits closer scrutiny than the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger has received to date. This Subcommittee's efforts have been highly successful in illuminating many of the heretofore unnoticed competitive problems with the proposed merger. However, the limitations inherent in the hearing process prevent it from fully replacing the rigorous analysis and judicial review which railroad mergers historically have received.

The Federal Government "bailed out" the bankrupt Penn-Central and other Northeastern railroads and created a viable Northeastern railroad system under the aegis of Conrail. Congressional approval of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger without an appropriate ICC evidentiary hearing would be the equivalent of legislatively sanctioning the acquisition of Chrysler by General Motors or of Lockheed by General Electric after the Federal Government's loans and guarantees resulted in the successful rehabilitation of these companies.

Secretary Dole's objective to see Conrail transferred to the private sector is commendable and one which we endorse. Such a laudable goal alone does not, however, justify a sale that will have enormous anticompetitive impacts in violation of basic antitrust principles.

In contrast to the rigorous scrutiny to which rail mergers are traditionally subjected, the only formal scrutiny of the current proposal has been a cursory study by the Department of Justice. This review did not use the most accurate and generally accepted method of describing geographic competition, and it was inconsistent with the standard analyses used by the Department in other rail merger cases. Consequently, the Department's report significantly understates the anticompetitive effects of the merger.

Even so, the Department concluded that a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger would violate both the Clayton and Interstate Commerce Acts without proper divestitures. But, as we discuss later, the divestitures proposed thus far—to Guilford Transportation and the P&LE Railroad—are completely inadequate.

A sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would constitute a radical and unnecessary departure from the long-term approach established by Congress to replace regulation with competition in the railroad industry. For example, the Staggers Act, 49 U.S.C. § 10101a (1985), states a congressional policy "to allow, to the maximum extent possible, competition and demand for services to establish reasonable rates for transportation by rail. . . ." Congress reaffirmed this policy in enacting the legislation which provides for the sale of Conrail as a single entity. The preservation of rail competition was a fundamental objective of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, and the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981. The House Report accompanying the Northeast Rail Service Act, 45 U.S.C. § 761 et seq. (1981), states:

"A balanced and competitive transportation system is essential to the entire country, and in selling the assets of Conrail the Secretary must not harm the delicate and competitive balance of the transportation systems of the country." H.R. Rep. No. 153, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1981).

Since the Staggers Act was enacted in 1980, however, the number of Class 1 railroads has decreased from 31 to 21, with three mergers now pending. Shippers are therefore faced with the loss of both regulation and competition in the battle to maintain reasonable rail rates. It is in this context that the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger must be evaluated.

Congress clearly did not envision such increased concentration and reduced competition when it promulgated its merger policy, which is generally unfavorable to mergers. Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the primary statute under which mergers have been challenged, is intended to prevent restraints of trade in their incipiency. Thus, Section 7 prohibits mergers and acquisition where "in any line of commerce in any section of the country the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly." 15 U.S.C. § 18 (1980) (emphasis supplied). The Supreme Court recognized that Section 7 reflects an "intense congressional concern with the trend toward concentration" in the United States economy. United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 363 (1963). Further, the Court held in Philadelphia National Bank that "if concentration is already great, the importance of preventing even slight increases in concentration and so preserving the possibility of eventual deconcentration is correspondingly great". 374 U.S. at 365 n. 42.

III. DEFICIENCIES IN DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE ANALYSIS

The Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice concluded, based on a superficial analysis, that "the proposed (Norfolk Southern-Conrail) merger would violate both Clayton and Interstate Commerce Act merger review standards." (January 29, 1985 letter from J. Paul McGrath to the Secretary of Transportation). Assistant Attorney General McGrath further noted that "the merger would have a significant adverse effect on competition for the transport of commodities to and from a number of locations in several states, with the greatest adverse effect occurring at locations along an east-west rail corridor running between Buffalo and Pittsburgh in the east and St. Louis and Chicago in the west."

As significant as those findings are, it is clear that the Justice Department seriously understated the likely impact of a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger. In its January 29, 1985 letter to Secretary Dole, the Antitrust Division identified only 10 counties—five in Ohio, two in Michigan, two in Indiana, and one in New York—that would suffer effects from the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger so adverse as to warrant the government's opposition to the transaction on antitrust grounds. Separate analyses by competing railroads throughout the country have identified substantially more. For example, one study identified 53 Business Economic Area (BEA) pairs that under the formula traditionally used by the Department would be considered "highly concentrated markets" where the merger would be likely to "substantially lessen competition."

This disparity is a result of several deficiencies in the Antitrust Division's analysis. First, the Antitrust Division, without explanation, made no use of the Herfindahl-Hirschman Index ("HHI")[1] in this case. The HHI, of course, is a formula used to measure the degree of concentration of a particular market. It was endorsed by the Department in both the 1982 and 1984 Merger Guidelines, and has been consistently used by the Department in analyzing the competitive effects of proposed mergers. In its Norfolk Southern-Conrail analysis, however, the Department employed a "50-10" test, whereby it examined only those geographic markets where (1) each of Norfolk Southern and Conrail currently has at least 10% of the rail transportation on movements in or out of the market, and (2) the railroads together have 50% or more of such traffic.

The exclusive use of the "50-10" test fails to recognize a substantial number of market areas which would be significantly affected by the proposed combination, since the "50-10" test would ignore all markets in which either Norfolk Southern or Conrail does not have a 10% share, regardless of the share of the other party.

For example, the Department identified Champaign, Illinois as a problem origin only for the commodity soybean oil. It identified Fort Wayne, Indiana as a problem destination for five commodities, not one of which was soybean oil. Yet, according to data compiled by CSX, Norfolk Southern carries 96.2% of all traffic from Champaign to Fort Wayne, and Conrail is responsible for the remaining 3.8%. Despite the fact that Norfolk Southern and Conrail have 100% of the rail market at this point pair, the Department did not identify it as a problem.

Second, the Department understated the anticompetitive effects of the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail combination because it deviated from its traditional practice of using a "point pair analysis"—that is, using actual flows of traffic between and among geographic points as the measure of railroad market share. Point pair analysis has been an important element of the government's evaluation of proposed mergers for some years.[2]

In the Norfolk Southern-Conrail analysis, the Department limited itself to consideration of traffic flows to particular locations and traffic flows from particular locations, and made no attempt either to correlate the two or to measure the true scope of the competitive foreclosure involved. For example, the Department did not identify Chicago as a problem origin or destination for any commodities, since no railroad dominates the traffic at this major gateway. However, a shipper in Chicago faces highly concentrated markets when he desires to transport commodities to certain cities. According to CSX-compiled data, Norfolk Southern carriers 9.6%, and Conrail 56.7%, of the traffic from Chicago to Pittsburgh. From Chicago to Cleveland, the combined market shares are greater; Norfolk Southern, 6.9%; Conrail, 75.4%. Even more concentrated is the market from Chicago to Buffalo, where Norfolk Southern carries 11.2% of the traffic, and Conrail has 80.3%. An analysis which only considers origin and destination points in isolation cannot be adequate, since the product which railroads sell is the movement of commodities from one point to another.

It is telling that the Department did not rely solely upon a "50-10" origin/destination analysis in the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific merger which is currently pending before the ICC. In that case, Dr. Pittman, the Department's economic expert, employed point pair analysis in which he applied the Department's Merger Guidelines. When questioned about the disparity between the Department's analysis in that case and in the Norfolk Southern-Conrail case, he conceded "I think I included some products by using both kinds of analysis, which it's conceivable that the Conrail analysis omitted unwisely." Santa Fe Southen Pacific Corporation—Control—Southern Pacific Transportation Company, Finance Docket 30400 at 13025 (emphasis supplied).

Application of the Santa Fe/Southern Pacific methodology to the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merge produces dramatically different results from those detailed in the Department's January 29 letter to Secretary Dole. A nationally known transportation consulting firm, which has often been retained by the Department, applied Dr. Pittman's Santa Fe/Southern Pacific methodology to the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger. The study found that the Department had overlooked nearly 100 million tons of railroad traffic which would be adversely affected by the Norfolk Southern-Conrail combination.

Third, the Antitrust Division's analysis also discarded any market area in which the "major shipper" did not object to the Norfolk Southern-Conrail combination. This represents yet another significant deviation from the Department's historic pattern of railroad merger analysis. While the views of the major customers of a proposed combination are relevant, it is not appropriate for the Department to conclude that no competitive problem exists in a particular market simply because a large customer failed to object to a merger. The Department's economic expert in the Santa Fe case agrees. Dr. Pittman testified that "the fact that a shipper supports the merger is not the be-all and end-all, but it is relevant information, yes." Santa Fe/Southern Pacific, supra, at 13182.

Major customers are often in unique positions of strength vis-a-vis their suppliers, and are therefore not significantly affected when the level of competition is reduced. For example, major shippers may have plants throughout the country and may be able to counter the market power of a Norfolk Southern-Conrail combination by leveraging shipments from other plants, while smaller shippers must depend upon the antitrust laws to protect them from the acquisition and use of such power.

Fourth, the Department used a $2 million revenue cut-off level in determining problem markets. This cut-off removes from consideration numerous smaller markets where individual shippers or receivers are especially dependent upon rail service.

Fifth, the Department did not consider the competitive effect of traffic diversions from other railroads because it found that "it is extremely difficult to estimate the size of future diversions." In fact, the United States Railway Association found that the proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail combination would divert hundreds of millions of dollars of traffic from several regional railroads.

Our objective in detailing the inadequacies in the Department of Justice's evaluation is to stress that there are enormous anticompetitive effects that the proponents of the merger have not even begun to address. The proposed divestiture and track-sharing remedies proposed by Norfolk Southern do not even touch on these effects. In fact, the anticompetitive effects of the merger are so fundamental and pervasive that it is difficult to visualize how they can be fixed.

[2] "Point pair" analysis refers to the measurement of the market shares of various carriers who transport commodities from one location, or "point", to another. The Department has in the past used cities, counties, and Business Economic Areas ("BEAs") as its "points" for purposes of such analysis. For example, the Department recently concluded that United Air Lines' proposed acquisition of certain Pacific routes from Pan American would reduce competition in the United States-Tokyo markets. It recommended that the Department of Transportation require divestiture of a route between Tokyo and one of three U.S. cities. (Department of Justice Press Release, September 17, 1985).

IV. INADEQUACIES OF DIVESTITURE PROPOSAL

Ironically, the proposed solution to the limited problems identified by the Department—that is divestiture of certain lines to the Guilford and the P&LE—is not adequate to cure even the limited problems identified by the Department. Neither the Guilford nor the P&LE will be able to provide viable, long-term competitive rail service. The detailed ICC staff study on the viability of Guilford and P&LE, dated August 30, 1985, concludes that neither railroad will remain financially viable. The ICC forecast for Guilford is that "in fact, after a very marginal first year, Guilford will be unable to service its debt, and this deficiency will grow in each of the succeeding years. In the long run, it does not appear that Guilford will be a financially viable carrier." ICC Staff Divestiture Study at p. 9. The forecast for the P&LE is even more bleak. "It must be noted that, even if all of P&LE's projections are accepted, P&LE admits that it cannot service all of its substantial debt using revenues from rail operations. . . . In conclusion, P&LE is not now a financially viable carrier and its acquisition of the new lines will not enable it to reverse its already precarious financial position." Id. at pp. 9-10.

The Department of Justice is in agreement with the ICC staff study findings. In a letter of September 25 to Secretary Dole, the Department concluded that the divestitures to Guilford and the P&LE will not establish long-term viable competitive service to the Norfolk Southern-Conrail mega-carrier. The Department's findings were based on managerial, operational, and financial inadequacies of the Guilford and the P&LE.

After the Department released its September 25 letter, Norfolk Southern hastily announced that it was changing the divestiture plan for Guilford. Instead of selling Guilford the old Nickel Plate Line to St. Louis, Norfolk Southern announced that it would provide trackage rights to Guilford from points in Indiana and Ohio to East St. Louis. This revised plan will do little or nothing to solve the fundamental inadequacies of the whole divestiture scheme.

The Justice Department itself is not satisfied with the new proposal. Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Douglas Ginsburg stated in a news conference that it did not appear that the new proposal addressed all his "concerns and questions." The new plan provides that Guilford can only carry "overhead" traffic. In other words, Guilford can carry traffic from Buffalo to St. Louis, but has little authority to pick up or deliver anything in between. Thus, while this substitute line may be somewhat faster and in less need of repair, it really does not provide Guilford any new markets.

In fact, the second proposal may well be somewhat worse from a competitive standpoint since Guilford will not own the track and will be dependent on cooperation from Norfolk Southern in order to provide what minimal competition it can muster. For example, if the tracks are crowded and there is a question of whose train and traffic is to get priority—Guilford or Norfolk Southern—it does not take an expert in railroad operations to know who will get the better service.

These are serious questions, and we believe they should be reviewed in depth before any action is taken. Once before, we were told by Norfolk Southern and Guilford that a perfect divestiture proposal existed, and now somehow, after criticism by the ICC and the Antitrust Division, we find that it was not so perfect, and there is an attempt at another last minute cure that is of highly questionable merit. The proposed Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger will restructure and determine the future of our nation's rail; the implications are far too important to rush to judgment on the basis of a continuum of last minute fixes.

The simple fact is that these small railroads cannot in any effective manner counter the substantial market power of a combined Norfolk Southern-Conrail. They would be attempting to compete in an extremely weakened financial state, with inferior, out-moded and out of repair equipment. In a business in which speed and reliability are the hallmarks of service to customers, these deficiencies spell disaster.

In contrast, the United States Railway Association has determined that Conrail is a viable railroad, and will continue to be for the foreseeable future. According to USRA: ". . . all available evidence supports a finding that Conrail can generate positive cash flow for the foreseeable future. Traffic shortfalls compared to the forecast should not threaten Conrail's survival as long as the rail regulatory framework allows service to be shaped to meet the demands of the marketplace." USRA Staff Report at p. 2-2.

Further, Conrail is not only viable, but has been an especially effective competitive force since its inception. For example, Conrail has withdrawn from the historically collective rate bureaus, the only railroad to have done so. Shippers have testified as to the aggressive nature of Conrail's pricing policies which directly resulted from the crumbling of the "equalized joint rate" system and its constraint of independent and, therefore, competitive prices.

V. CONCLUSION

It would be a tragic error for Congress to become an instrument in the largest and most anticompetitive railroad merger in history. There is simply no sound rationale for selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern. Conrail is a viable, independent railroad, and the Department of Transportation should maintain Conrail as a competitive force. We applaud the congressional intent to return Conrail to the private sector. However, it is not necessary to destroy the competitive railroad transportation environment in the Northeast, the Midwest, and the South to accomplish that objective.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, Senator GLENN has made a most comprehensive statement. I do not agree with it, of course, but I do want to compliment him for the care and the attention he has given this issue. I would take exception to several of his conclusions.

Repeatedly, the Senator from Ohio characterized what we are doing as a rush to judgment. I do not believe that that is a reasonable characterization of this bill. In fact, it is the very opposite of a rush to judgment. The process of selling Conrail did not begin a month or two ago and it did not begin a year or two ago. It began in 1981 when Congress decided, in the so-called NERSA bill, that we would sell Conrail. That set in motion a process which led us to where we are today.

As part of that process, the Department of Transportation first hired a consultant, Goldman Sachs, then solicited bids from over 100 possible bidders for Conrail, then received 15 different bids and screened them.

The Norfolk Southern proposal was put together approximately 2 years ago and was submitted to the Department of Transportation on June 19, 1984. It has been studied and restudied by the executive branch and by the Congress not for a few weeks or a few months, but since June 19, 1984.

The Department of Transportation has studied this question comprehensively, the Treasury Department has studied it, and the Justice Department has studied it. The Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, Mr. Ginsburg, testified before the Judiciary Committee that no other acquisition of this type, no other acquisition that he knows of, has received the kind of comprehensive attention and the kind of time that the Conrail proposal has received.

That is what the Assistant Attorney General tells us.

With respect to whether or not this is premature, the Justice Department has studied this, and they say that they do not see the antitrust problems. Their concerns have been satisfied. The Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division has said to the Congress go ahead. Do not delay any further. Yes, we have a consultant hired. What is the reason for the consultant to be hired? To review the factual bases on which the Justice Department reached its conclusion in the nature of, as Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg put it, dotting the i's and crossing the t's.

It is the nature of a closing at the end of a transaction to make sure that all the facts are as represented.

Furthermore, we have provided in the legislation, and also in the memorandum of intent between Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation, that if at the end the Justice Department turns out not to be satisfied, then the Department of Justice has veto power over this transaction—veto power.

Mr. President, I do not know of any other case in history where the Department of Justice has been given veto power for a railroad merger. It does have it in this case.

If we act—if we pass the legislation—still the Department of Justice has veto power if its antitrust concerns are not in fact met by the technical review that will be made.

The Senator from Ohio, senior Senator from Ohio, said, well, why rush? There is no hurry. Mr. President, there is a hurry. There is a hurry. What is the hurry? Norfolk Southern made a good-faith offer based on a solicitation of bids made by the Department of Transportation which offer expired on December 21, 1985. The deadline has already been exceeded.

The offer was solicited. The offer was received. The offer was studied. And nothing happened. Nothing happened. December 31 went by, and Congress could not act.

So Norfolk Southern said, well, we will give you another 3 months. We will give you another 3 months at least to see if there is any action on the floor of the Senate—3 months. We will extend the original offer.

Now we have until March 31. Will they extend it again? Who knows? But I would not count on it, Mr. President. I would not count on it.

If I were a member of the board of directors of Norfolk Southern attempting to plan for the future of my railroad, I would not extend forever this offer. Some say there is some uneasiness on the part of some of the directors of Norfolk Southern. I would not know.

But, Mr. President, I do know this: There are those throughout this country who occasionally raise the question of whether the Federal Government can accomplish anything. We cannot even sell a railroad. Here is a process that has been going on 5 years. We cannot even sell a railroad. Is there any reason to question the prevailing sentiment in this country that the Government just does not function very well?

Mr. President, to put the question before us in perspective, there are three possibilities that are before us—three possibilities which I would like to describe today.

One possibility is to do nothing. One possibility is to sell Conrail so that it will become a stand alone railroad, and not affiliated with any other railroad—just out there owned by stockholders standing on its own feet. That was the so-called Morgan Stanley proposal—a stand alone Conrail.

The third possibility is the bill that is before us which is the sale to a very successful, very healthy railroad, and to affiliate Conrail with Norfolk Southern.

Those are the three possibilities: Do nothing, leave it as it is, create a stand alone railroad just out there doing its own thing, not affiliated with anybody else, or create a consolidation of Conrail and Norfolk Southern—three possibilities.

Mr. President, there are some people—I know the junior Senator from Ohio is one—who believe we should do nothing. They believe that Conrail should not be privately owned. They believe that the private sector should not be running the railroad, and that this should be a Government-owned, Government-run operation. Why do with the private sector what can be done in the public sector? So they oppose any sale. They oppose the Norfolk Southern sale, they oppose the Morgan Stanley sale, and they want the Government to continue operating Conrail.

Mr. President, I do not believe that is the majority position in the U.S. Senate. I know that it was not the majority position of those who testified before the Senate Commerce Committee. Witness after witness, people who were in favor of the Norfolk Southern sale, people in favor of the Morgan Stanley arrangement, experts, railroad people, financial people, one after another came before the Commerce Committee, and they were asked the question: Between the three possibilities, Norfolk Southern, Morgan Stanley, and doing nothing, which is the worst of the three? And their answer was the worst of the three is to do nothing. Sell it to Morgan Stanley, create a free-standing railroad, but do not leave it as it is. Do not leave it in the Government's hands. And we received that advice time and time again from witnesses throughout the spectrum of opinion on this matter.

Mr. President, if that is the choice we are going to make to do nothing, flying in the face of the advice of all the witnesses, there are a couple of ways of doing nothing. One is to defeat the bill. We can do that. We can defeat the bill; vote it down.

The other method, of course, is not even to get to the bill. Let us kill it. Let us filibuster it, filibuster the motion to proceed, filibuster the bill itself, post-cloture filibuster, and all of these have been threatened. One is now being carried out. Filibuster the bill. That accomplishes the first of the three alternatives because delay, infinite delay, unending delay, delay for the next month or two, delay until we get into a tax bill or into the budget process, into Gramm-Rudman, delay means opting for the status quo, opting for Government ownership over private ownership, Government management over the private management. That is the decision we will be facing tomorrow when we vote on cloture. It is a decision on delay. It is a decision on the status quo. I would submit that a vote against cloture tomorrow is a vote against both the Morgan Stanley and the Norfolk Southern proposal.

So, Mr. President, that is the first option, to do nothing. Government ownership.

The second is the Morgan Stanley proposal, what I would characterize as the fast buck, stand-alone scheme.

Mr. President, in order to understand the Morgan Stanley proposal, in order to judge the viability of a stand-alone Conrail, I would like very briefly to recount the recent history of Northeast freight rail transportation.

Remember, the question is the viability of a stand-alone Conrail, stand-alone Northeast rail transportation company, not affiliated with Norfolk Southern, standing alone.

What has been the history of railroads over the past 20 years? The history has been this: Between 1967 and 1973, eight Northeast railroads, including the Penn Central, went under, went bankrupt. Eight stand-alone Northeast railroads, including Penn Central, went bankrupt.

Why did they go bankrupt? Because rail tonnage in the Northeast quadrant of our country has steadily declined over the last 20 years.

Between 1966 and now, freight rail tonnage in the Northeast quadrant of our country has declined at an annual rate of 3.6 percent.

In 1985, Conrail's tonnage declined 5.5 percent. A steady decline in business in rail transportation in the Northeast part of our country created the bankruptcy of eight railroads, created the bankruptcy of the Penn Central. I ask the Senate what are the prospects for a stand-alone Conrail in the future?

It was this decline that created Conrail in the first place. It was this failure of stand-alone rail transportation in the Northeast part of our country that got the Federal Government into this act in the first place. Mr. President, if you want to get Uncle Sam back in the railroad business again, if you want to get a second Conrail created a few years down the line, sell it to Morgan Stanley. Tell yourselves that this is $200 million more cash for the Treasury. Big deal. We have done the Government a favor. Right? We have taken Conrail off of our hands for 2 or 3 years before it goes under again.

The existence of Conrail in the first place was created by the conditions that still exist, conditions which inevitably lead to bankruptcy of stand-alone railroads.

What does Morgan Stanley intend to do with the railroad that it acquires? It intends to sell it. It intends to make a buck. It has put together a group of some 41 investors, some private, some educational, fine instutions. My alma mater is one of the underwriting group. I wish it well. I contribute to it every year. But I do not understand, Mr. President, why the people of the United States should be contributing to it.

What Morgan Stanley intends to do is to form an underwriting group, take the stock and hold it for a very limited time and sell it. To whom? Who knows? Who knows who will own the stock? Anybody, Carl Icahn, for all we know, will end up owning the stock.

You know, something very interesting was said yesterday by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, Senator SPECTER. He made the argument that the assets of Conrail are worth more than the purchase price, meaning because the purchase price was established by competitive bidding, meaning that the assets of Conrail, liquidated assets of Conrail, are worth more than Conrail as a going railroad.

Mr. President, what does that say? What does that say? Throw something like that out to the public to create a railroad where the assets are worth more than the railroad as a going entity? It is the open invitation to the corporate raider. That is what it is. It is what the corporate raider, what the Carl Icahns of this world, look for, a Conrail, an attraction. Sugar for the ants.

That is what we are putting out there.

But what do they intend to do, these underwriters, these managers? They intend to bleed Conrail of cash. That is their plan. The plan of Morgan Stanley, the submitted plan of Morgan Stanley—this is not conjecture; this is their program publicly stated—is to bleed Conrail of cash.

How so? They propose to take at least $230 million of Conrail cash to settle past labor concessions that have been made by Conrail employees.

Norfolk Southern has proposed to settle the past labor disputes also with Norfolk Southern cash, not with Conrail cash. The Morgan Stanley proposal is to take it right out of Conrail, $230 million plus cash out. That is part of the deal.

Secondly, they propose to make an offering to buy from the Conrail employees all or part, whatever the employees want to sell, of the 15 percent of Conrail stock that is held in an employee stock option plan, an ESOP. They propose to buy that, to offer to buy that 15 percent, for cash.

Whose cash? Not Morgan Stanley's. Not Princeton University's. Not CSX, or the other members of this investor group, not their cash. Conrail's cash. $230 million for past labor concessions, and an additional amount up to whatever it takes to buy 15 percent of the stock in the ESOP.

Further, they propose to pay out annual dividends of approximately $118 million.

Mr. President, you start with a rail transportation system in the Northwest that has a history of failure and bankruptcy. You put it out there as a stand-alone railroad. Then you start bleeding it for cash—bleeding it. That is the Morgan Stanley proposal: Let us bleed Conrail.

However they want to finance it, where are they going to get all this cash that is going to go flowing out from Conrail? Where will this hundreds of millions of dollars of cash come from? Well, they have proposals to raise it.

First, they say that they are going to increase shipper rates by 5 percent, approximately 5 percent, per year. We have heard expressions of concern about shippers on the floor of the Senate. Well, shipper rates would be increased by 5 percent per year.

Second, they propose to eliminate 1,500 jobs per year through 1989—1,500 Conrail jobs out through 1989.

Third, they propose to downsize the system. The whole program of Conrail since it was created has been to downsize the system. We have thrown such bouquets in the direction of Conrail management, "Oh, thank you for the wonderful job you have done." They have had a fire sale. They have been selling off.

We worry about railroads losing their service, shippers losing their service, laying off employees. Conrail has made this into an art form. But Morgan Stanley says not enough of an art form; why, they still have 14,000 miles of track. Too much, says Morgan Stanley. Let us get it down from 14,000 to 8,000, to 9,000 miles.

After we do that—after we pay out all this cash in dividends, after we pay out all this Conrail cash for settling of employee claims, after we pay out all this Conrail cash to buy up ESOP stock, after we shrink the system yet more, after we increase shipper rates yet more—what is the remaining responsibility of Morgan Stanley and the investor group? Well, their remaining responsibility for the health of the railroad, Mr. President, was very aptly, concisely stated by Mr. Thomas Saunders, a partner in Morgan Stanley and Company, who testified before the Senate Commerce committee. Here is what Mr. Tom Saunders of Morgan Stanley testified about the remaining responsibility of Morgan Stanley and the investor group for the health of this railroad:

When we do the first sale to the public, we will leave town.

Mr. President, my analysis is this: The issue before the Senate is not whether a year and a half of study is too little; not whether the Department of Justice has hired too few consultants; not whether $200 million more cash would flow to the Treasury from one transaction to another. The question before the Senate is the health of rail transportation in the United States.

The Senator from South Dakota and others expressed concern about their parts of the country and what is going to be done about diversion and will there be loses and will people lose jobs and will shippers be inconvenienced. I cannot conceive anything worse for shippers, not only in the Northeastern part of this country but all over the country, than to take a stand-alone railroad, put it in a situation where eight other railroads have gone bankrupt, proceed to bleed it of cash, and then, in the immortal words of Mr. Saunders, "leave town." It is a recipe for disaster.

Mr. President, if we do nothing, if we keep Conrail, if we do nothing by a decision to delay this and debate it forever until time runs out for Norfolk Southern as it will eventually if we decide to do nothing, we have created a permanent drain on the Treasury of the United States. We have already been subsidizing this railroad. Between 1977 and 1984, the Federal Government has spent $3.4 billion to subsidize Conrail's operations and capital investments. It has also paid $606 million to Conrail employees whose jobs are eliminated. It has been a history of subsidy to keep it afloat and we could continue to do that.

Or instead, we can take the third option. We can combine Conrail with a strong, viable, profitable, well-managed railroad, Norfolk Southern. We can combine what otherwise, in a stand-alone fashion, is weakness with strength. We can allow the two systems to complement each other. And we can also provide competition, as was done in the divestiture agreements in order to provide for shipper choice in the Northeastern part of this country.

Mr. President, the criteria before us do not include, in my opinion, how many consultants we hire, how many hearings we hold, how long this agonizing inquiring and studying period should be continued. There is only one criterion. The one criterion is the future of rail transportation throughout the United States, but particularly in the Northeastern quadrant. And there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that that future is eminently well served by the passage of the bill before us.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter dated January 21, 1986, from President Reagan relating to the pending matter in which he states that the bill deserves favorable action now.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 21, 1986.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. LEADER: The first bill that the Senate will take up this session is S. 638, which authorizes the sale of the Federal Government's 85 percent stock interest in the Consolidated Rail Corporation (Conrail) to the Norfolk Southern Corporation. Now is the time to sell Conrail, to the bidder that has offered the best deal for shippers, consumers, rail labor, and all those who depend upon continued service from a financially strong Conrail. I urge your support for this bill when it comes to the Senate floor.

In 1981, the Congress directed the Secretary of Transportation to return Conrail to the private sector. The Norfolk Southern offer to purchase Conrail will guarantee the financial strength of the railroad, maintain Conrail's service in the Northeast, and maximize the financial return to the government. Norfolk Southern has agreed to a stringent set of divestiture requirements as a condition of the purchase. Through these divestitures regional railroads will be strengthened, major markets and rail gateways will be opened, and there will be the first competitive east-west long-haul alternative in twenty years.

In addition to these transportation benefits, successful completion of the sale to Norfolk Southern will bring the government a minimum of $1.2 billion in cash at closing. This payment will help us reduce the Federal deficit in fiscal year 1986. Sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corporation also will get the government out of the railroad business, fulfilling the specific privatization mandate of the Congress. The terms of the sale include, however, public interest covenants, which will protect Conrail's financial strength and service during the post-sale period.

The Senate Commerce Committee, under the leadership of Senators Danforth and Hollings, held extensive hearings on the sale to Norfolk Southern and reported S. 638 with strong bipartisan support. This bill deserves favorable action now.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Did my colleague from Ohio wish me to yield for a moment?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes, Mr. President, if he would be good enough to do so, I would appreciate it.

Mr. DIXON. I ask leave to do that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise not to respond in chief to the arguments of my distinguished colleague from Missouri. There is one slight comment I would like to make with respect to his reporting facts. He indicated that my position is that Conrail should not be sold. My position is not that it should not be sold but that if and when it is to be sold, we want to be certain that the conditions are right and appropriate. We want to be certain that there is continued competition.

We want to be certain that the Government gets the maximum dollar obtainable and not the $1.2 billion that is provided for herein, maybe not even the $1.4 billion that Morgan Stanley has offered, and also the questionable bid of First Boston Corp. and Allen Co. of $1.6 billion.

My feeling is that the Secretary of Transportation should again take sealed, closed bids. I unappropriately used the word "again" because sealed, closed bids have not been taken previously.

My point is again that she should take bids but this time they should be sealed, they should be closed, they all should be opened at the same time and in advance terms and conditions should be spelled out in order that the interests of all parties concerned can be protected. That includes labor, that includes those who use the services of the railroad, that includes the people who really have the major financial interests in the railroad and that is the taxpayers of this country. And so I would be willing to explore and very well may come forth with an amendment directing the Secretary to do just that.

It is premature for us to try to move forward with the $1.2 billion offer that is before us, particularly when there is a $1.4 billion offer that is sitting out there. It is premature to do so before the Justice Department has been able to respond as to all of the questions that are still pending and are not to be addressed until phase 2 of the Justice Department investigation is completed.

But I did want to clarify that fact for the Senator from Missouri. Having said that, I will not talk further at this point but yield the floor to my distinguished colleague from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, may I say before I make my remarks that I am so often impressed by the fact that many fine speeches are made on the floor of the Senate, regrettably, when there are so few of us here to hear the remarks. While I disagree generally with the statements made by my distinguished friend and colleague and neighbor from across the Mississippi River, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH], I have been present throughout his remarks and observed that they were made extemporaneously based upon his knowledge of the circumstances as he interprets them as the distinguished chairman of that committee.

I was very much impressed by the very fine manner in which he made that very excellent speech expressing his point of view. While I thoroughly disagreed with many of those points. I want my friend and colleague to know that I was singly impressed with the very fine way in which he has presented his case.

Mr. President, I am on the floor today because a motion to proceed to S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act is before the Senate. As the Senate considers whether or not to move forward on this bill, I think it is worth taking some time to consider a few of the issues it raises.

First, there are strong reasons for arguing against acting on S. 638 at this time because the bill is not yet ready to be acted on and we do not yet have the kind of information that will enable us to make an intelligent decision on the legislation. Further, since the investor group led by Morgan Stanley has increased its offer to $1.4 billion, $200 million more than the Norfolk Southern has bid for the Government's 85 percent interest in Conrail, it can be argued that it is a mistake to take up legislation that does not provide the Treasury with that kind of return. In fact, the difference between the Morgan Stanley bid and the Norfolk Southern bid is far more than $200 million when the Morgan Stanley stock warrants and the tax consequences of the two offers are considered.

If there were no antitrust concerns and the two offers provided similar or identical returns to the Government, it might make sense to take up the Conrail sale legislation now and let the Senate choose between the two offers. But there are major antitrust concerns and the Norfolk Southern bid is financially inferior to the Morgan Stanley proposal.

Morgan Stanley has, as I stated before, raised its offer to $1.4 billion. We are now facing a budget deficit this year that could exceed $220 billion. On March 1, under the terms of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction statute, there will be cuts in numerous Federal programs that will total $11.7 billion. By April, we will be taking up a budget that will attempt to reduce this year's appalling deficit to $144 billion next year. This means that we will be attempting to reduce the deficit by over $60 billion, and perhaps over $70 billion, in a single year. S. 638, in this context does seem to be a fatally flawed legislative vehicle. It costs the Government at least $200 million—actually much more than that—and raises the most serious kind of antitrust problems.

The Morgan Stanley proposal, it seems to me, represents a much better basis for Senate action on the Conrail sale matter. It maximizes the Government's return from the sale and avoids any competitive problems.

The higher Morgan Stanley bid conclusively demonstrates that the Department of Transportation's bidding process was misguided. That process clearly did not produce a bid of the value of the Morgan Stanley proposal. The Department's sale recommendation, therefore, does not represent a proper basis for the Senate's action on this issue.

S. 638 as it now stands leaves major antitrust issues unresolved and provides the Federal Government with a woefully inadequate return for the billions of dollars it has invested in Conrail. It proposes that the Government sell its interest in Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp. I have the greatest respect for that railroad. I know its reputation, and I share the view that it is one of the best-run railroads in the United States. However, the Norfolk Southern bid is financially inferior to the Morgan Stanley proposal and it raises extremely serious antitrust concerns that do not arise under the Morgan Stanley offer. The antitrust consequences of a Norfolk Southern purchase of Conrail could be devastating, and are worth discussing in some detail.

Mine is not an isolated view. It is shared by railroads within the Conrail region, by railroads that connect with Conrail, by thousands of shippers, by railroad labor, by 24 State attorneys general, by a number of States in the Northeast and Midwest, by the great majority of America's newspapers and other media that have examined this issue, by the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the staff of the U.S. Railway Association, and by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The antitrust concerns raised by this proposal are made even more serious because Conrail is Government-owned. You would think the Government would take special care that the transfer of its property to the private sector was handled in accordance with the antitrust laws. That should be the Government's responsibility. Yet, S. 638 "deems" the transaction approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, treating this transaction in a different fashion from every other merger of profitable railroads in our history. Further, the Justice Department admits it is applying different standards in the Conrail-Norfolk Southern case than it is in another major railroad merger now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission—the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger. Finally, the Justice Department is now considering—at this time, as we are considering this issue—the third proposed Norfolk Southern divestiture plan, a plan no other interested party has had a chance to review, analyze or test through the adversary proceedings normally available in these cases.

These serious procedural inadequacies create the appearance of a conflict of interest for the Government. The United States owns Conrail, but instead of bending over backward to see that the antitrust law that applies to evey other railroad merger is honored in this case, S. 638 applies special standards for Conrail, and the Department of Transportation, together with the Department of Justice, conducts its review in a manner that denies the interested parties any semblance of due process.

In the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific case, the railroads filed numerous telephone book-sized volumes detailing the merger transaction, the proposed operating plan, and other considerations. Other parties had the right to appear before the Interstate Commerce Commission, to submit their own information, and to cross-examine Santa Fe-Southern Pacific witnesses on issues raised by the transaction.

I think this is a fair procedure, Mr. President, and one that should be followed in the Norfolk Southern-Conrail case. What is more, it is possible to give interested parties their "day in court" and to thoroughly review all antitrust concerns without taking an undue amount of time. The Santa Fe-Southern Pacific case was filed on March 23, 1984. The Interstate Commerce Commission, under the law, has up to 31 months to make its decision. As I understand it, however, the ICC will actually make its decision in the first half of this year. That is within 1 year or 15 months of the time it was filed.

I do not believe that is an inordinate amount of time for a transaction of that scope and complexity, and I am convinced it is essential to provide the kind of fairness and equity that has been so sadly lacking in the way the proposed sale of Conrail has been handled to date.

It is worth remembering that the Department of Justice has found that the size of the competitive problems in the Norfolk Southern-Conrail case is larger than the problems raised by the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the Justice Department would do what it is doing in the Santa Fe case before the Interstate Commerce Commission—oppose the merger. However, that is not what the Justice Department is doing. Applying different standards than in the Santa Fe case, Justice now says that the latest Norfolk Southern divestiture plan "appears on its face to address the concerns" Justice had with the previous two divestiture proposals.

The Justice Department, however, was unwilling to make a final judgement on the issue, and instead planned on referring the issue to a consultant. However, the Department seems to be having a considerable amount of trouble in picking a consultant—it has not yet done so—so it is not at all clear if and when a consultant's report and a final Department of Justice recommendation will ever become available.

Mr. President, there are strong reasons for arguing for delaying consideration of S. 638 until the consultant's report is available and until all interested parties have had a chance to review it. There were too many problems with the previous divestiture proposals to warrant going forward on the basis of a preliminary recommendation on the third divestiture proposal. If the Senate needs to act now, it should act on the basis of the Morgan Stanley proposal, which would make the antitrust issues academic.

The first Norfolk Southern divestiture proposal was the only one submitted early enough to be given any kind of complete review. The result of that review was that the Norfolk Southern proposed divestiture plan was found to be hopelessly inadequate to resolve the competitive problems.

Agreement between Norfolk Southern, on the one hand, and Guilford and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, on the other, on the first package of divestitures was reached on February 25th of last year, only 2 days before the Senate Commerce Committee hearings on the Norfolk Southern proposal. By August of 1985, the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a report prepared on behalf of the House Energy Commerce Committee, concluded that the divestitures would not work. The ICC staff found that:

> Guilford has overestimated the operating efficiencies it will achieve. . . . Consequently, its net revenues from operations will be substantially less than it projects . . . after a very marginal first year, Guilford will be unable to service its debt. . . in the long run it does not appear that Guilford will be a financially viable carrier.

R.L. Banks, the Department of Justice's consultant, reached similar conclusions. In its preliminary report, it concluded that the viability of Guilford and the P&LE and their ability to be effective competitors was questionable.

Last September 25, Norfolk Southern released its second divestiture proposal. There was little opportunity for interested parties to review this plan, and the public was given very little information about it. The result, however, was the same. The divestiture proposal was found to be inadequate. Douglas Ginsburg, the Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, stated that:

> It does not appear that the proposed divestiture will establish a rail carrier * * * capable of providing long-term, viable competitive service * * *. From our standpoint, we must be satisfied that divestiture will create not just a railroad that will be viable * * * but one that will be an effective competitor in the problem markets.

The third divestiture plan, Mr. President, was released last November, As in the case with the second proposal, interested parties have had little or no information on which to base their analysis of the proposal, and no opportunity to be heard on the plan. Justice stated that the third plan "on its face" appeared to meet the department's concerns. However, the Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust also stated that he planned on having a consultant undertake the "very detailed study of the plan that will be required before I can conclusively advise the Attorney General whether the proposed divestiture addresses the competitive concerns raised by this transaction."

Given the history of the first two divestiture proposals, the extremely serious nature of the competitive issues involved, and the fact that S. 638 does nothing to remedy the antitrust problems, only the Morgan Stanley proposal provides the basis for Senate action

now. Full consideration of S. 638 as it is currently written would only be appropriate when the Justice Department is ready to give the Department of Transportation and the Congress its formal recommendation, and when the Congress has heard from the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Railway Association on the latest divestiture proposal, at least informally. Congress greatly benefited from the Commission staff's earlier effort, and I think they should be given the opportunity to review this plan as well.

If there was a consensus among all the interested parties that the third proposal solved all the competitive problems, it might be appropriate for the Senate to begin debate on the sale of Conrail as recommended in S. 638, but that is not the case. Many of the parties interested in the first two divestiture proposals believes that the third proposal shares the same basic problems.

Each is dependent on the same divestiture carriers—Guilford and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, and both of those railroads are small and very weak financially. P&LE is virtually insolvent, and exists at the mercy of its creditors. Between 1982 and 1984, the company lost $24 million from its rail operations and $47.7 million overall. Interstate Commerce Commission staff analysis showed that, in 1984, P&LE had a working capital deficit of more than $65 million, failed to pay principal or interest on its borrowings, and was unable to meet its fixed charges. By every measure of profitability, liquidity, efficiency, and productivity, P&LE is scarcely surviving at all. Implementation of this third divestiture plan is probably well beyond P&LE's means.

Guilford is not much better off. Notwithstanding its claims of a financial turnaround, the railroads that now form Guilford reported a net loss from 1982 to 1984 of nearly $30 million, even after employee wage holddowns, and Government subsidies. In 1984, the first full year of Guilford's merged operation, its net railway operating income declined, its fixed charge coverage declined, and its operating ratio worsened.

Further, this plan, like the others, seems to fail to meet the most basic of the Justice Department's requirements: Plan No. 3 fails to provide for competitive rail service in 15 of the 30 counties Justice identified. And even in the 15 counties where service is provided, in only 8 is it provided directly. In the others, the plan relies solely on trackage rights, reciprocal switching, and haulage agreements.

Such arrangements present problems of their own. They are permissive. They offer no assurance that any service will ever be provided in the cities they cover. The agreements governing these indirect service arrangements last for only 5 years. Further, they involve costly, time-consuming, multicarrier operations that can result in competitively inferior service.

It is doubtful, therefore, that either Guilford or the P&LE will be able to compete successfully against the faster, more efficient, and more direct Conrail-Norfolk Southern trains.

With respect to Guilford, a few examples make the point. Guilford claims it will attract 78 percent of its new business from intermodal traffic, while admitting that its service will be slower and its rates higher than Conrail's. While Guilford is granted theoretical access to midwestern auto plant and utilities, it is not given access to the traffic moving into those facilities. Its competitors have such access and can provide the single carrier service that Norfolk Southern says shippers prefer and that it claims as one of the principal benefits of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger. Further, up to 70 percent of Guilford's total revenues from shippers served through trackage rights and switching will go to Conrail-Norfolk Southern for trackage and switching charges.

Norfolk Southern's own description of P&LE's proposed service demonstrates its inadequacy. Norfolk Southern stated "all of the lines over which trackage rights have been obtained are secondary lines, but they are suitable for the type of operation intended by P&LE."

I understand the Senate leadership has received a letter signed by 22 State attorneys general, including the distinguished attorney general from Illinois, Neil Hartigan. That letter points out:

> There is no pressing national need, however, to justify restructuring our Nation's rail system and immunizing the largest railroad merger in the United States from the usual and customary process less than 1 month after a complex divestiture plan is proposed and before that plan can be evaluated by the affected States and the independent consultant retained for that purpose by the Department of Justice.

The letter urges the Senate—

> To defer floor consideration until after the Department of Justice's independent consultant has completed its study of the antitrust implications of the sale and Norfolk Southern's latest divestiture proposal, and until interested States and other parties have had an opportunity to study the latest proposal and testify with respect to the proposal and the report of the Department's independent consultant.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the attorneys general's letter be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

(See amendment No. 1.)

Mr DIXON. Mr. President, this is by no means a complete description of the problems that have been uncovered with respect to the third divestiture plan, Mr. President, but it does demonstrate the need to carefully analyze the new divestiture proposal before acting on S. 638's recommendation to sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Railroad.

As many of my colleagues know, Conrail was formed in 1976 from the remains of seven bankrupt eastern railroads. Congress recognized at the time that the new railroad being formed—Conrail—was anticompetitive and violative of the antitrust laws. However, Congress felt it had no choice. Preliminary review of plans to create two or three railroads out of what was to become Conrail were shown to be too expensive, and attempts to sell parts or all of the trackage to other railroads were either spurned or fell through. Because Conrail is somewhat anticompetitive in structure, however, does not mean we should return the railroad to the private sector in a way that makes that problem even worse.

Let me state again that I support returning Conrail to the private sector. I want to do that in fiscal 1986. However, as I stated before, S. 638 is fatally flawed, both because of the problems it recommendations raise, and because of the fact that the bill does nothing to mitigate those problems.

I do not see how Congress can hope to adequately consider the very serious antitrust questions involved before we have the information on this latest divestiture proposal and before interested parties have had a chance to analyze it or comment on it. The sale of Conrail deserves to be handled in as fair and equitable a way as the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific transaction is being handled. It is not getting that kind of consideration now.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I hope my colleagues will consider making the Morgan Stanley proposal the basis for Senate consideration of the Conrail sale issue if it is felt necessary to go forward with sale legislation at this time.

The Morgan Stanley proposal offers the Senate an opportunity to avoid any possible competitive concerns—keeping Conrail independent ensures the maintenance of the current level of competition. It also provides the Government with a far superior return on its investment than the Norfolk Southern proposal. Using the Morgan Stanley proposal, instead of the unwise and inadequate S. 638 proposal, would demonstrate that the Senate is concerned about the antitrust issues, and that it is concerned about the sales price. Using the Morgan Stanley proposal as the basis for our consideration would save the Senate time and ensure enactment of sale legislation early this year.

December 2, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.
Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD,
Minority Leader,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS DOLE AND BYRD: Pending before the Senate is S. 638, a bill which would authorize the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern and thus create the nation's largest railroad with 32,000 track miles extending through 23 states. The proposed legislation would immunize the merger from the antitrust laws and would eliminate the usual and customary review of the merger by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts.

We urge you to defer floor consideration of this legislation until after the Department of Justice's independent consultant has completed its study of the antitrust implications of the sale and Norfolk Southern's latest divestiture proposal, and until interested States and other parties have had an opportunity to study the latest proposal and testify with respect to the proposal and the report of the Department's independent consultant.

On October 17, 1985, sixteen State Attorneys General submitted Joint Comments to the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law opposing the Norfolk Southern proposal on antitrust grounds.[1] The proposed sale clearly will have a profound impact on our national rail system, and on shippers, receivers and consumers throughout the country.

The Department of Justice repeatedly has found that the merger would violate both the Clayton Antitrust Act and the Interstate Commerce Act. A determination of whether the latest (November 19) in a series of three proposed divestiture plans ameliorates these anticompetitive consequences can only be determined after careful study and review by the affected states and the Department's independent consultant. Even the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division has declined to give its unequivocal approval of the sale until after its independent consultant has completed its own study of Norfolk Southern's third divestiture plan.

We support the goal of the Administration and the Congress that Conrail be returned to the private sector. There is no pressing national need, however, to justify restructuring our nation's rail system and immunizing the largest railroad merger in the United States from the usual and customary process less than one month after a complex divestiture plan is proposed and before that plan can be evaluated by the affected states and the independent consultant retained for that purpose by the Department of Justice.

Thank you for your consideration of these views.

Very truly yours,

NEIL F. HARTIGAN,
Attorney General of Illinois,
(Twenty-three State attorneys general cosigning).

[1] The Joint Comments were submitted on behalf of the following Attorneys General: Charles M. Oberly (Delaware), Neil F. Hartigan (Illinois), Thomas J. Miller (Iowa), Robert T. Stephan (Kansas), David L. Armstrong (Kentucky), William J. Guste, Jr. (Louisiana), Stephen H. Sachs (Maryland), Hubert H. Humphrey, III (Minnesota), Robert M. Spire (Nebraska), Stephen E. Merrill (New Hampshire), Nicholas Spaeth (North Dakota), Anthony J. Celebrezze, Jr. (Ohio), LeRoy S. Zimmerman (Pennsylvania), Arlene Violet (Rhode Island), Charlie Brown (West Virginia) and Bronson C. LaFollette (Wisconsin). A copy of the Joint Comments filed with the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law is enclosed. Subsequent to the House Subcommittee hearing, Francis X. Bellotti, Attorney General of the Massachusetts, submitted to the Subcommittee has written Comment in Opposition to the Proposed Sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. A copy of Attorney General Bellotti's Comment is also enclosed.

Mr. DIXON. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. LAUTENBERG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, tomorrow the Senate will decide whether to shut off debate and move to the consideration of S. 638, the Conrail sale amendments. S. 638 contains the amendments to existing law to implement the Secretary of Transportation's plan to sell the extensive Conrail System to Norfolk Southern.

I do not fault the Secretary's procedure. the Secretary and the Department of Transportation worked very hard to come to the conclusion they did. But I do disagree with the conclusion. I favor returning Conrail to the private sector. I do not think the Government ought to be in any business that it absolutely does not have to be in.

Conrail is a profitable, vibrant and competitive freight rail carrier. Conrail made $440 million last year and, according to the U.S. Rail Association, will remain profitable over the next 5 years or more. A profitable and competitive company belongs in the private sector. The issue before the Senate is under what terms this railroad will be returned to the private sector.

Mr. President, in 1981, Congress passed the Northeast Rail Services Act which empowered the Secretary of Transportation to engage an investment adviser and seek a buyer for Conrail. The act provided Conrail with operating benefits not enjoyed by other railroads. Conrail could abandon unprofitable lines and reduce its employment more quickly than other railroads. Conrail did not have to pay State and local taxes. With these advantages, if Conrail still could not turn a profit, then it would be sold in pieces.

Conrail, under the leadership of Stanley Crane, fooled a lot of people. It took advantage of the Northeast Rail Services Act and the deregulatory provisions of the Staggers Act to become a leader in the industry for innovative service. It shed its status as a ward of the State.

Mr. President, Conrail no longer needs the exemptions from standard railroad operating procedures it has had since 1981. It should operate like any other railroad. Conrail no longer needs to be carried on the Federal Government's books. In fact, Conrail is now in a position to pay back some of the investment made in it over the years.

So, Mr. President, we should return Conrail to the private sector. But the question is how should we do it.

My colleagues should carefully consider the proposition we have before us. We are considering the fate of rail freight service in the Northeast and Midwest, not for the next 5 years, but for decades. If we make a mistake, there will be no turning back. This administration is not going to subsidize rail service of any kind if they can avoid it. The same administration that recommends the death of Amtrak and rail passenger service in the Nation, once rid of Conrail, will not rescue rail freight service, no matter what the economic impact.

Mr. President, the Senate has before it a request by the Secretary of Transportation to ratify a merger of two of the Nation's major railroads. The merger we are asked to ratify will result in the creation of the Nation's largest railroad and reduce the number of major carriers in the Eastern United States from three to two.

The Senate and the Congress is put in an unusual position by this proposition. The Interstate Commerce Commission is usually the forum for settling issues of this kind. The Commission is expected to have the personnel, expertise, and procedures to decide mergers and their impact on other carriers and shippers. But in 1981, the Congress, in a budget reconciliation measure, decided that Conrail was a special case and that Congress would decide its fate. And, so we have before us a merger proposal.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Transportation chose this merger route as a means of returning Conrail to the private sector. There were other interested buyers. There was the option of offering the Government's holdings to the public.

I acknowledge that she worked very hard, very diligently, and we had a lot of communications on this side. I respect her decisionmaking, but not the decision. She chose the merger route.

I thought about this a long time before I decided to take the stand that I have.

The Senate Commerce Committee, with only one member from the Conrail region, substantially approved the Secretary's plan and reported it to the Senate. Now the full Senate has to decide if this merger is in the public interest and whether the sale to Norfolk Southern is the best we can do as a means of privatizing Conrail once and for all.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. I believe the proposal is flawed in three fundamental respects.

First, the Senate is asked to approve a merger without benefit of the information as to its competitive impact. This information would be available to the Interstate Commerce Commission if it were deciding the matter. The Senate also is asked to insulate this merger from the antitrust laws. Once the Senate and the Congress has acted, no further inquiry or legal challenge will be in order. I do not believe that we should ratify a merger of this size and complexity without a full understanding of how competing carriers and communities will fare.

Mr. President, proponents of this sale will say that the Justice Department has given its blessing to this merger and has conducted an inquiry comparable to an ICC proceeding. We are asked to ratify the work of two agencies of the executive branch which in this instance is subsituting for the work of an independent agency. It is important to note why the Congress in 1981 decided to exempt this transaction from ICC approval. The Congress in 1981 thought they would be selling a loser and wanted the ability to do it quickly. In addition, the Congress in 1981 did not comtemplate that the sale of Conrail would come in the form of a wholesale restructuring of eastern railroads. Indeed, the Conrail of 1981 is not the Conrail of today. We are not selling a hopeless loser; we are returning to the private sector a healthy, profitable railroad.

Mr. President, the sale to Norfolk Southern will lead to the loss of competition and jobs. Norfolk Southern is a solid, well-run railroad. Its decisions to streamline its operations and facilities will be based, I am sure, on the same sound business practices that earned it its reputation. No vaguely worded so-called public interest covenant will inhibit it from running a sound business. And it should not. I ran a big company. We never did a merger with someone in the same business where we did not try to eliminate redundancy and reduce overhead. This merger, by its very nature, will lead to the consolidation of facilities.

The sale to Norfolk Southern will exacerbate the lack of competition faced by shippers in New Jersey. New Jersey is a captive State; shippers who use rail, use Conrail. Shippers have options outside the State, but if eastern railroads are reduced from three to two, those options will be eliminated or reduced. That will mean higher rates for New Jersey shippers.

Mr. President, the Justice Department's inquiry into this merger and its divestiture proposal did absolutely nothing for the State of New Jersey. If you were captive before the Justice Department began its work, you were captive when they finished.

The second major flaw in this proposal is the impact it will have on the port of New York and New Jersey. Conrail is the only major railroad serving this port, one of the largest and most significant in the world. Competition up and down the Atlantic coast for import/export traffic which moves overland by rail is intense.

Norfolk Southern's focus in on Southern ports, particularly Norfolk. There is certainly nothing wrong with a Southeastern railroad enhancing the competitive position of Southern ports. But, what will be the impact on the competition among ports if Norfolk Southern is the major carrier in both the North and the South? The concern for potential diversion of traffic to Southern ports has caused the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, of which I am a former commissioner, to abstain from associating itself with the endorsement of the Norfolk Southern sale by the departments of transportation of New York State and New Jersey.

The third major flaw in this proposal is the return to the taxpayers offered by Norfolk Southern. I have never considered the price offered for Conrail as important as maintaining reliable freight service for shippers and communities. But that is not to say that the price should not be examined closely to insure that the $7 billion investment made by the taxpayers is compensated to the maximum extent possible.

Mr. President, Norfolk Southern has offered $1.2 billion for Conrail. Its offer is identical to offers made by nonrailroad interests, such as Marriott and Alleghany. It is $200 million below the latest offer by the investor group assembled by Morgan Stanley. Is the Norfolk Southern offer adequate? The answer to that question lies in the answer to another. Namely, does not a railroad, when buying another railroad, realize advantages not enjoyed by a nonrailroad investor or group of investors? Is not Conrail simply worth more to Norfolk Southern than to Marriott or Alleghany? The synergy of combining Conrail and Norfolk Southern, opening markets to Norfolk Southern now only available to a competitor, should have yielded a higher offer at the outset of the bidding. The fact that Norfolk Southern only matched Marriott and Alleghany's bid indicates that the price was set by the seller and not the buyer.

Mr. President, I have a particular concern regarding the covenant affecting the Philadelphia corporate headquarters of Conrail. Last February, I held a meeting with Norfolk Southern, shippers, labor, and others affected by this sale. I asked Norfolk Southern to broaden and strengthen the covenant regarding maintaining its headquarters, and the employees therein, in Philadelphia. They agreed to consider such a strengthened provision. Yet the legislation before us today has not changed one iota from the covenant as it appeared last February. It appears that the opponents of Norfolk Southern are right: The only way to insure that Conrail's employees, many of them my constituents, remain in Philadelphia, is to keep Conrail as Conrail in Philadelphia.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this merger and the procedures under which we are considering it. We simply do not have a full understanding of the competitive impact of this sale. We are selling Conrail as if it were a loser and there were some crying need to get this basket case off the Federal dole. That is not an intended pun. That is not the case and the Senate should not be stampeded into taking an action we will regret for years to come.

Therefore, Mr. President, I will oppose S. 638, the Conrail sale legislation as presently drafted. If cloture is invoked, I will support amendments which might change some of its more objectionable features. In addition, I am considering offering an amendment which will offer some legal recourse to my State and region should the port diversion and competitive imbalance I foresee come to pass.

Mr. President, a public offering of the Government's holdings in Conrail is possible. Competing public offerings underscore the willingness of the public marketplace to facilitate the return of Conrail to private hands. While I have not embraced any particular public offering, I will consider supporting one, if offered, as an expression of my conviction that there is a better, more competitive and more financially sound means of selling Conrail than the Secretary's plan.

The public offering is one route that should be considered. There are others, such as having Conrail repay some of its debt to the Federal Government during a period in which a sound definitive privatization plan can be worked out. The bottom line is that Secretary Dole should take this matter back to the drawing board and bring to Congress a plan the Northeast and the Nation can live with.

Conrail is a vital link in the economy of New Jersey. New Jersey has over 1,200 miles of Conrail track and over 2,000 Conrail employees. Since the creation of Conrail, New Jersey has been totally dependent on it for rail freight service. As a captive State with no major competing service to Conrail, we have a lot at stake.

Mr. President, I have surveyed shippers, labor, shortline railroads, and locally elected officials in my State. There is great trepidation concerning this merger. Labor in New Jersey fears the loss of jobs; shippers fear the loss of competition; the ports of New York, New Jersey, and Philadelphia fear the diversion of cargo to Southern ports; and communities fear the loss of the only railroad they have. I am aware of a number of concessions negotiated between Norfolk Southern and the New Jersey Department of Transportation, but there is no written, enforceable agreement between the State of New Jersey and Norfolk Southern at this point.

Mr. President, it will be said that we should sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern now, because failure to do so will postpone the day of decision. I am all for making a decision, but I would especially like to make the right decision. For those of us in States which will have to live with the consequences of this decision, this is not a question of philosophy or ideology. It is a cold hard matter of economics and the calculus of transportation in our region. We should choose, but choose wisely. I cannot choose Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TOBACCO REFERENDUM

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this has been cleared on both sides.

I send a bill to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration and action thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2013) to delay the referendum with respect to the 1986 through 1988 crops of flue-cured tobacco and to delay the proclamation of national marketing quotas for the 1986 through 1988 crops of burley tobacco.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, there is a motion pending by the Senator from Ohio, and I have no objection to the Senator from North Carolina proceeding. I just want to be certain that the position with respect to my pending motion will not be affected in any way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that consideration of the bill under current circumstances, by unanimous consent, would not affect the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And upon completion of the action with respect to the unanimous consent request of the Senator from North Carolina, the Senate will be in the same position as it was prior to his request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio will recur on disposition of the matter of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Chair.

I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will be good enough to advise as to whether it is a fact, which I believe it to be, that the only purpose of this legislation is to delay for 30 days the balloting and 45 days certain notices. Is that correct?

Mr. HELMS. That is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And there is no other substantive change being made in the legislation?

Mr. HELMS. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but for the record I say that this has been cleared on this side of the aisle. Mr. FORD has been contacted. He supports the action we are about to take.

I ask unanimous consent that following the determination of the pending consent matter, Mr. FORD's name be added as a cosponsor of the measure.

Mr. HELMS. Senator FORD is a cosponsor. He is a principal cosponsor of the bill.

Mr. BYRD. I just want to be sure that is shown, and I state it for the record.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this legislation allows the Secretary of Agriculture to delay for up to 45 days the producer referendum for the 1986 through 1988 crops of flue-cured tobacco. The mail referendum is currently scheduled for January 27-30, 1986, and ballots will be mailed to eligible voters on Friday, January 24. This delay is a simple administrative, technical matter, but it cannot be accomplished "administratively," and requires legislation.

Also included in this legislation is a 30-day delay in the announcement of the 1986 burley tobacco national marketing quota, from February 1, 1986 to not later than March 1, 1986.

This legislation is necessary because of the temporary delay in final passage of the budget reconciliation conference report. The conferees dealing with the tobacco program reform and cigarette tax measures have reached agreement and signed the conference report. Hopefully, Congress will settle the other objectionable issues and pass the reconciliation bill very soon.

The reason for delaying the flue-cured referendum is that if and when the reconciliation bill is enacted—including the tobacco program reforms—the Secretary of Agriculture will be required to determine a new quota, and the quota announced prior to that time will be null and void. Thus, a "second" referendum would probably have to be held. We think that holding two referendums would be unnecsary, costly, and further confusing to the farmers and the general public.

The same reasons for delaying the flue-cured referendum also apply to the announcement of the burley quota. Current law requires a referendum to be held every third year within 30 days after the Secretary announces quotas for the next 3 years. The burley quota is scheduled to be announced on February 1, so that "30-day time clock" would begin then. With the pending legislation, we would delay the announcement until March 1.

The bottom line, Mr. President, is that this legislation simply delays two items in current law because of pending legislation. It does nothing else. It saves the Government money and reduces confusion for the farmers. There is no reason anyone should oppose its adoption.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Winston-Salem Journal of January 19, 1986, supporting the delay in the flue-cured tobacco referendum, by printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUT OFF REFERENDUM

Wise farmers won't buy a pig in a poke. The same wisdom dictates that flue-cured tobacco growers know the kind of federal program they will have before they vote on it.

At this point, they do not know and the referendum is scheduled for Jan. 27-30. Congress created the uncertainty by adjourning for Christmas without completing action on tobacco legislation. Clearing up the confusion should be a first order of business when the solons reconvene on Tuesday.

The first step should be to put off the balloting. Even if agreement on tobacco program revisions could be reached within a week, there wouldn't be sufficient time to inform farmers on details of how this year's crop will be affected. A postponement of at least 30 days certainly seems called for.

Next, Congress should get down to business on the tobacco bill. Farmers need to know what to expect in the way of quotas, price supports, assessment fees and the like. As long as they are in the dark, they are handicapped in arranging finances and other crop plans.

That is not to say action should be rushed and ill-considered. It could hardly be hasty, since key provisions of the legislation have been discussed for months on end. Still, the issues involved are serious, with major implications for tobacco farmers in the years ahead, and should be thoroughly understood.

The central point of the proposals, largely drafted by Sen. Jesse A. Helms, R-N.C. in his role as Senate Agriculture Committee chairman, is participation by manufacturers. That represents a sharp change from the way the program has worked in the past. Helms prevailed over Rep. Charles G. Rose III, D-N.C., in a long, time-consuming wrangle. Rose wanted to finance the tobacco program with a portion of cigarette tax revenues. He contended Helms' plan made too many concessions to manufacturers.

Under its terms, manufacturers would buy at a substantial discount surplus leaf stocks over a period of eight years. In return for sharing the cost of the program, manufacturers would have a voice in setting production quotas and price supports. Growers would have less say-so, and would end up even more at the mercy of the market.

The prospect may not be attractive, but it may be better than any alternative so far suggested. The burdensome surplus has raised the assessment fee, imposed to relieve taxpayers of financing the program, to intolerable levels. Last year it was 25 cents per pound; without program changes, it could be around 50 cents this year.

Obviously, setting the fee should be deferred until legislation is passed. The delay has been recommended by the board of directors of the Flue-Cured Tobacco Cooperative Stabilization Corp., which also urged that the referendum be put off. To do so would help farmers see clearly what they are voting on, and could spare the expense of a second vote if a new tobacco program called for it.

For guidance in starting the crop, Stabilization officials suggested farmers plan on an average support price of around $1.44 per pound. As changes in the law are contemplated, the figure should be close to the final amount. Last month, an effective cut of 4.7 percent in the production quota was announced by Agriculture Secretary John R. Block.

The year began with one ray of hope in the gloomy tobacco outlook. Stabilization, which handles leaf acquired under price supports, had 66 million pounds less on hand than at the beginning of 1985. At that, its warehouses held 746 million pounds of surplus tobacco.

"That is the trend we want to see," said John H. Cyrus, tobacco chief for the State Department of Agriculture. "But the thing we hope will bail us out is for Congress to pass the law calling for the buy-out manufacturers."

Until the decision is made, farmers can't wisely vote on the program. Putting off the referendum should be a first order of business when Congress meets on Tuesday.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, during consideration of this proposal to delay the announcement of the 1986 burley referendum, I think it is important to clarify an issue raised by the U.S. Department of Agriculture with respect to establishment of the 1986 price support level for burley.

In the last session of this Congress, a 1-year price support reduction measure for burley was included in a bill to extend then-current dairy legislation. This legislation was passed and signed by the President and, as a result, burley tobacco markets were able to open in a timely fashion. The reason for the temporary price support reduction was simple: a major revision of the method for determining future levels of price support was included in the budget reconciliation package, but this legislation had no chance of being enacted before the 1985 burley markets opened. It was never our intention that the 1985 price support level would be a benchmark for all future levels of price support if our basic legislation was never enacted. To the contrary, the amendment offered by me and my distinguished colleague from Kentucky, Senator FORD, sought to solve a temporary problem with a temporary solution.

Mr. FORD. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. McCONNELL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. FORD. I thank my friend for yielding. Mr. President, it appears that the USDA is seriously misinterpreting the intent of our burley price support amendment of last November. Our legislation was offered so as to provide farmers an opportunity to market their 1985 crop in an orderly and timely fashion, since reconciliation did not appear to be moving fast enough to take care of the problem. It was never our intention to penalize farmers for the Congress' inability to act and to base future price supports on the $1.488 price support level which was included in the temporary 1985 crop legislation. This would be extremely unfair to growers in my State and neighboring States. It is my clear understanding that if the Tobacco Reform Act of 1985 is not enacted in some form, the $1.78 level of price support should be the benchmark for all future burley price support determinations beginning with the 1986 crop. I hope that the Department will take another look at this issue in light of the fact that the announcement date will be extended upon passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 2013) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 2013

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 317(d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1314c(d)) is amended by inserting after the third sentence the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing sentence or section 312(c) of this Act, the referendum with respect to national marketing quotas for Flue-cured tobacco for the 1986 through 1988 marketing years may be conducted not later than the earlier of (1) thirty days after any proclamation of the national marketing quota for Flue-cured tobacco for the 1986 marketing year made after the date of enactment of this sentence, or (2) March 15, 1986.".

SEC. 2. Section 319(a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1314e(a)) is amended by inserting after the second sentence of the third paragraph the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing sentence, the proclamation of national marketing quotas for Burley tobacco for the 1986 through 1988 marketing years may be made not later than March 1, 1986.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The Senate continued with the consideration of the motion to proceed to consider the bill (S. 638).

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, I signed favorably the report recommending the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. Since the report of that committee, I have fundamentally changed my mind on this subject, and wish to discuss it with my colleagues here in the Senate before tomorrow's vote on cloture on the motion to take up the proposition.

Although I have changed my mind on the merits of the issue, I do intend to vote in favor of cloture tomorrow. I believe firmly that not every subject which comes before this body ought to be the subject of a filibuster, much less a filibuster on the motion to take up a bill. Orderly procedure requires that that kind of opposition be limited to only the most vitally important and most major of national issues.

While I now disagree with both the majority leader and the chairman of my own committee on the appropriate disposition of this subject, I do think it is the right of the majority leader to bring it up and have it discussed on its merits, and for the Senate to deal with the issue on its merits. This is by no means an assurance that I would vote for cloture on the bill itself, however it simply means that the subject which should be discussed is the proposal itself, not whether or not we should be discussing that proposal.

On the merits of the proposal itself we clearly have three possible courses of action. The chairman of the committee has discussed them eloquently, though he has ended up with a different set of priorities than have I.

One course of action, and in some respects the simplest, is to leave Conrail under the ownership of the Federal Government, to continue the course of action which has occupied the last several years. I do not believe the Federal Government is the appropriate owner of a railroad system. I am convinced that if the Federal Government owns it over a period of years, it is less likely to be successful than it would be in the private sector.

I am afraid that at some point or another we will have the spectre of a strike essentially against the Federal Government, nominally, since it is a corporation owned by the Federal Government, and that we will run into many of the classic problems faced by the Federal Government when it is engaged in a major private business in competition with other private enterprises.

We, of course, have before us in this bill two other alternatives for the sale of Conrail. One is to Norfolk Southern and one to a consortium headed by Morgan Stanley. The chairman of the committee thinks the former of those two alternatives is preferable. I now come to the conclusion that the latter of those two alternatives is preferable.

Assuming that we are to go ahead with some sale, Mr. President, it seems to me that there are a number of goals which we should attempt to attain to the maximum extent possible.

The first, of course, is that Conrail, when it goes back into the private sector, do so under circumstances under which it will be a success. That success can be measured in two fashions. First, of course, it should be a success in providing needed rail services to the many millions of people and the many thousands of businesses which will be dependent upon those services. Second, that success should be measured by whether or not Conrail can operate in the black, at a profit, while replacing capital equipment and continuing to provide services to shippers and consumers throughout its service area.

Our second goal, of course, is a broader goal than the first. That is that rail services at reasonable rates be provided not only to the people in the immediate service area of Conrail, but to all of the people of the United States who will be served by it, directly or indirectly. That, in turn, implies competition, implies choice among competing rail services on the part of as many people as possible.

The third goal of any such sale is to maximize the return to the Government of the United States. The taxpayers of the United States have already spent many billions of dollars on saving what was formerly the Penn Central, transforming it into Conrail, making it spectacularly successful.

Unfortunately, neither of the proposed sales meets all of those goals with equal facility. Even though I am now in favor of the Morgan Stanley sale, it is appropriate and just to say that Conrail, itself, is likely to be financially stronger as a division of or under the ownership and control of Norfolk Southern than it is as an independent railroad.

I hope that any relative weakness under Morgan Stanley is not too great. If we simply look at the financial security and the low possibility of an attempt to return to Federal Government ownership, or even to a subsidy on the part of the Federal Government, it may well be that the Norfolk Southern purchase proposal is the best.

On the other hand, it is clear, beyond the ability to debate the question seriously, that competition will be hurt by that sale, by the consolidation of two major eastern American railroads into one. I no longer regard as adequate the modest divestitures which are being required as part of the sale. Many people both in the Northeastern part of the United States and outside of that area, including the States of the present Presiding Officer and my own, will be affected by a lessening of competition that will result from a sale to Norfolk Southern as against any proposed sale which will keep Conrail independent.

Finally, of course, with the new offer from Morgan Stanley, the returns, both direct and indirect, to the Treasury of the United States, seem to argue in favor of the Morgan Stanley sale.

Both the immediate cash price and the tax benefits or absence of tax benefits to potential purchasers indicate that by a measure of several hundred million dollars, the Treasury of the United States would be better off in the immediate future if the Morgan Stanley offer is accepted.

These considerations, as I say, are not all on one side of the equation by any means. Reasonable Members of this body may disagree as to the weight of authority on one side or another. It is my feeling, however, that the advantages of a somewhat higher price and somewhat greater tax benefits for the people of the United States, and the perhaps more important advantages of the continuation of competition, not only between rail and other forms of transportation but among railroad companies themselves, outweigh the slightly or somewhat greater financial security for a Conrail which is a division or subsidiary of Norfolk Southern.

It is certainly my fervent hope, since there are not too many major rail systems in the United States at the present time, that we can retain at least the degree of competition among railroads that we have at the present time. Further consolidation, in this case and in the case of presently privately owned railroads, is not the appropriate solution.

I do feel, as I said at the beginning of these remarks, Mr. President, that it is appropriate for this body to discuss these issues, but it seems to me also more than appropriate that we follow a course of action different from that recommended by the Commerce Committee several months ago.

As a consequence, I intend at the present time, at least, to vote in favor of cloture on the motion to take up the bill, but in favor of alternative methods of dealing with this problem when we are discussing the bill as a whole. It may well be, Mr. President, that the best solution at the present time would be to re-refer this bill to the Commerce Committee to consider the rather different offer which Morgan Stanley has now made and to allow the Judiciary Committee somewhat more time to consider the serious antitrust questions which have been raised so eloquently by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

That could be done, it seems to me, in return for an agreement that the bill would come to the floor at a time certain in 1 month to 6 weeks without any filibuster on a motion to take up the proposal.

I have made that suggestion to some Members on both sides of the debate. It has not yet been accepted. Whether I will make such a motion on a debatable basis with a vote to follow awaits some further consultations with other Members interested in this proposal but troubled by the proposal of the Commerce Committee itself.

In any event, Mr. President, I do want to announce formally that I am not in favor of the sale of Norfolk Southern, that I do believe in full and free debate on this issue, and that I do believe there is now an alternative which is measurably preferable to the Norfolk Southern sale.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985.

As a longtime member of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, I am all too familiar with the history of Conrail. Since 1973 when the Regional Rail Reorganization Act established the framework for Conrail, Congress has exercised a stewardship responsibility over the structure and ownership of the railroad. Twelve years and $7 billion later, we finally have an opportunity, through S. 638, to ensure the future strength and viability of rail service in the Northeast and Midwest, to return rail service to nongovernmental ownership, and to do so without fear of ever having to use taxpayer dollars to bail out the Conrail system again.

During the course of the Commerce Committee deliberations on the Conrail sale, the attractiveness of the Norfolk Southern proposal became increasingly more apparent. Norfolk Southern's offer to purchase Conrail reflects more than a century's dedication to the business of providing reliable and efficient rail service. Unlike many other rail holding companies, Norfolk Southern has not invested substantial sums outside the transportation field. Norfolk Southern and the areas served by the railroad have benefited from this commitment. In the 2-year period between 1982 and 1984, Norfolk Southern located over 330 industries on its lines. These industries have made capital investments in excess of $4.2 billion and provided employment for over 17,000 workers. The statistics for the first three quarters of 1985 are equally impressive.

In addition to its expertise in the field of railroading, Norfolk Southern brings to Conrail the opportunity to open its rail operations to new markets and thereby strengthen a declining industrial base which has contributed to Conrail's severe downsizing. Between 1977 and 1984, Conrail has abandoned 3,754 miles of track and eliminated 43,932 jobs. Conrail's continued practice of downsizing raises serious doubts about the long-term viability of a stand-alone Conrail.

Today we have the opportunity to consider legislation which would ensure the long-term viability of rail service in the Northeast. In the interest of the 37,911 Conrail employees, the shippers who rely on the remaining 15,468 miles of track, and the American taxpayers, we have an obligation to consider S. 638. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to support the motion to proceed on the consideration of S. 638.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I rise to comment on the motion to proceed to Calendar Order No. 215, S. 638, the Conrail sale legislation. Mr. President, since the Commerce Committee—on which I serve—took up this legislation last year, I have been concerned about both the merits of the legislation and the process involved in the sale.

Mr. President, I will say, forthrightly, that I am opposed to S. 638 in its present form and support the Morgan Stanley alternative. My preference is to reserve the bulk of my comments for when the Senate turns to this bill on the merits, but I will comment briefly at this point.

When the Commerce Committee voted in April to report S. 638, I thought that our hearings had failed to produce information sufficient to justify approval of the Secretary of Transportation's decision. At that time I detailed my objections to the committee's bill in minority views to the Commerce Committee's report.

In sum, I did not believe that the administration and Norfolk Southern had met the burden it should—to prove with reasonable certainty that at least the same, if not an improved level of service, efficiency, and competition would result from a combination of Conrail and Norfolk Southern. From the standpoint of West Virginia, I thought there was sufficient evidence to doubt that any improvement in these areas would result, and a substantial likelihood that the combination of Conrail and Norfolk Southern would give damaging marketpower to one carrier in important West Virginia coal markets.

From the standpoint of the whole Nation, I thought that the serious concerns about competition and the disruptive effects of a Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination on shippers, bulk commodity producers—coal and grain—and other railroads should have caused the Commerce Committee and the Senate to find a more acceptable alternative. We now have available to us an alternative—the Morgan Stanley proposal—which would build upon the outstanding financial basis Conrail has attained in the last 5 years and return it to the private sector without the anticompetitive and disruptive impact foreseen in a combination with Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, fundamentally, the Norfolk Southern bid for Conrail has changed very little since the Commerce Committee reported its bill. Indeed, where many had raised doubts, those doubts were substantiated by independent analysis and to some extent by the Justice Department. Where questions remained unanswered and documents had not been provided, many remain outstanding. Where concerns about the initial competitive analysis of the Justice Department have been raised, these remain uncorrected and unaddressed.

Despite the many twists and turns the Norfolk Southern proposal has taken over the last 9 months, despite the numerous revisions required to meet even the incomplete but negative assessment of competition from the Justice Department, despite the mountain of paper that has been generated, S. 638 remains a fundamentally flawed proposal.

Mr. President, one thing has changed fundamentally since the Commerce Committee reported its bill late last April. Morgan Stanley & Co., representing over 40 sophisticated, intelligent, and expert investors, has come forward with not only a bid to match Norfolk Southern's, but a bid that exceeds Norfolk Southern's cash offer by $200 million. Furthermore, not only would the Morgan Stanley bid significantly exceed the financial return to the Government in terms of cash and tax aspects of the sale, but they would also keep the railroad independent, match every covenant established by the Secretary of Transportation, and offer labor a superior financial deal.

Mr. President, as we consider the motion to proceed to the Norfolk Southern proposal, I will say to the Senate I think there are compelling reasons why the American people would be better served by returning the bill to the Commerce Committee. But at the same time, I think in the long run, the Nation will be well served by returning Conrail to the private sector. To meet that second obligation, it makes sense to sell the railroad at a time when the railroad is in peak condition and when its future is bright, and at a time when the Government is in desperate need of the revenue.

Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that we should reject the Norfolk Southern bid for Conrail. To meet the congressional mandate to sell the railroad and the congressional desire to decide the issue, I think we should sell Conrail to the Morgan Stanley group. But in order to reach that conclusion, I do not intend to delay things. I think we should fully and fairly debate the options and make a judgment.

I am confident, Mr. President, that the Congress will eventually exercise common sense and good judgment and reject the inferior financial bid of Norfolk Southern, together with its several anticompetitive flaws. I am equally confident that the Congress will decide to sell Conrail to the Morgan Stanley investor group, as the financially superior and fully competitive deal on the table.

Mr. President, at this time, I have not made a final decision on how I will vote on the motion to close debate on the motion to proceed to this bill. Based on my desire to sell the railroad, I will vote to proceed if I believe, at the time of the vote, the leadership of the Senate and the floor managers will allow adequate time on the merits of the proposal to consider all views and to deal in a straightforward way with several necessary amendments. But if I sense a rush to push the bill through the Senate, I will vote no and recommend to my colleagues that they send it back to the Commerce Committee for further consideration.

Mr. President, I am hopeful that we can resolve this issue this year and sell Conrail through the public offering proposal of the Morgan Stanley investor group. For now, however, I will yield the floor.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, the past year's discussion of the sale of the Consolidated Rail Corp. [Conrail] has revolved around a number of issues, and I believe my colleagues are familiar with the fundamental questions involved in the sale of this rail network. However, one facet of the proposal under consideration today, which I believe has not received adequate attention, is the impact of this transaction on States, such as Nebraska, which are not directly served by Conrail. I would like to take the opportunity to state that Midwesterners would feel the effects of a Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination, and that these effects would be negative. Indeed, many from the Midwest, my home State of Nebraska included, fear the effects of this legislation—private citizens, private corporations, and elected officials alike. The most detailed objections in my State have come from the Nebraska Department of Roads.

On June 17, 1985 the Nebraska Department of Roads announced its strong opposition to the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Co. At the same time, it endorsed the alternative of a stand-alone Conrail such as that proposed by Morgan Stanley & Co.

The Department of Roads reached this decision based upon its consideration of five goals to be achieved by selling Conrail: To promote rail competition, to maintain local rail service, to promote financial stability of the railroad industry, to minimize employment loss, and to minimize government expenditure—I share these goals.

What changes have occurred since June 17 to alleviate concerns about Norfolk Southern's proposal to purchase Conrail? Very little. In fact subsequently findings have only strengthened the case against a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger. What changes have taken place since June to increase the attractiveness of the Morgan Stanley bid? Plenty, foremost of which was announced on January 16, 1986. On that date, the Morgan Stanley investor group increased its bid to purchase the Government's interest in Conrail by $200 million—bringing the total offering to $1.4 billion.

The following is a brief summary of the analysis conducted by the Nebraska Department of Roads, and a synthesis of subsequent events and studies that have led me to stand by their findings in opposing the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern, and in supporting the stand-alone Morgan Stanley proposal.

The first goal articulated by the Department of Roads was to promote rail competition. The Department concluded that a sale to Norfolk Southern would be anticompetitive and have a negative effect on rail service well beyond the combined service areas of the proposed merger.

What has occurred since June to shed further light on this antitrust issue? On October 17, 1985 the attorney general of Nebraska, together with 15 of his fellow attorneys general joined to officially oppose a sale to Norfolk Southern, based primarily on the anticompetitive aspects of such a merger.

The attorneys general pointed out that the antitrust analysis of the administration was flawed from the beginning. Typically, before a railroad merger such as that proposed by S. 638 would be approved, it would be analyzed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all sides would have ample opportunity to be heard. Unfortunately, S. 638 explicitly excludes such a thorough study.

Rather than the ICC, the Justice Department conducted the study on the antitrust aspects of the proposal. The Nebraska Department of Roads concluded that this study was "incomplete, and not consistent either with its analysis of other rail mergers, nor with its standard merger guidelines. Certainly, the implications upon competition in the Midwest have not been evaluated by any agency." To this day, there has still been no Federal evaluation of anticompetitive implications on the Midwest. However, State after State have conducted evaluations of their own and concluded that the effects would be substantial.

Even without vigorous scrutiny, the Justice Department concluded that a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger would violate both the Clayton and Interstate Commerce Acts without proper divestitures.

Three times, Norfolk Southern attempted to satisfy the Justice Department by proposing divestiture plans. While the third attempt received tentative approval, any final Justice Department opinion awaits further study by independent consultants, and in the meantime details of the plan have not yet been made public.

In addition to the flaws of the Justice Department analysis and problems inherent in the divestiture plan, this proposed mega-merger is inconsistent with the Staggers Act. As the aforementioned 16 attorneys general stated, "A sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would constitute a radical and unnecessary departure from the long-term approach established by Congress to replace regulation with competition in the railroad industry." I have been and remain a supporter of business deregulation where feasible. However, it is clear to me that deregulation will only work when regulations are replaced by viable competition.

The second principal goal of the Nebraska Department of Roads was to maintain adequate local service. Last June, Nebraska officials declared that "the attempt to build a NS/Conrail giant will force smaller regional railroads to react to the loss of revenue and traffic by curtailing service, deferring maintenance and abandoning line. Therein lies a serious adverse impact of the NS/Conrail proposal on local rail service."

Norfolk Southern indicated that it expects to realize revenue gain from traffic diversions of $233.9 million annually. The majority of these diversions will come from Midwest carriers like C&NW, IGC, Soo-Milwaukee and Grand Trunk.

What has transpired since June to alleviate concerns about rail traffic diversions? Of the four aforementioned railroads, Norfolk Southern has been successful in negotiating agreements with only the Soo/Milwaukee. The potential impact on the remaining three railroads remains potentially damaging to the Midwest's economic base.

Many, including the Nebraska Department of Roads, are also concerned with minimizing employment loss. In June the Department announced its preference for a stand-alone Conrail to a sale to Norfolk Southern because a stand-alone would cause virtually no loss of employment.

In July, Morgan Stanley signed labor agreements with the Railway Labor Executives Association [RLEA] and the Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks [BRAC], and have since been endorsed by other labor organizations. With the additional $200 million offered by Morgan Stanley on January 16, 1986, labor stands to be in an even better position than when they originally endorsed a public offering.

In its analysis, the Nebraska Department of Roads was particularly concerned with the financial stability of the railroad industry, and carefully scrutinized the viability of an independent Conrail versus a Conrail merger with Norfolk Southern. The Department concluded that Conrail was a well-functioning, competitive railroad with excellent earnings, and had a promising future as a stand-alone operation. In addition, the Department questioned the premise of the U.S. Department of Transportation that another railroad's "deep pockets" were needed to ensure the long-term financial security of Conrail.

Conrail's earnings have continued to improve. Conrail recently announced its 1985 earnings at $440 million. Because Conrail paid industry-scale wages only for the second half of 1984, an "apples to apples" comparison between 1984 and 1985 would make 1985 a record profit year. In addition, the Morgan Stanley investor group's recent bid increase speaks well to the issue of Conrail's viability.

Nebraska's concerns with financial stability go beyond concern for the stability of Conrail and extend to a concern with the economic stability of the entire railroad industry. The Department of Roads pointed out in June that "a NS/Conrail merger will cause greater financial burdens for many railroads, particularly regional carriers in the Midwest. The economic stability will be severely threatened because of the major traffic diversions." Although even last June Norfolk Southern was attempting to alleviate some of the anticompetitive problems by offering a divestiture plan, the Department of Roads pointed out that "divestiture of unwanted lines to carriers with limited resources could very well overextend these carriers causing further problems in the Midwest and Northeastern States." After three divestiture proposals, the possibility that those railroads receiving divested lines will be overextended remains as likely and controversial as ever.

I, like many fellow Nebraskans, am concerned with minimizing public and governmental costs. Investment by the taxpayers of this country has been considerable. Over $7.5 billion was spent buying, rehabilitating, and consolidating rail systems, upgrading and purchasing rolling stock, and managing the process.

In addition to greater tax revenues that will be forthcoming from a publicly owned Conrail than from a Norfolk Southern/Conrail merger, the additional $200 million offered by Morgan Stanley is hardly insignificant. Admittedly, $200 million in additional revenues pales in comparison with the Federal deficit, yet it would certainly be foolish to ignore any additional revenues at this critical time.

For all these reasons, I urge my colleagues to oppose a Norfolk Southern/Conrail merger, and to support the Morgan Stanley alternative for a stand-alone Conrail.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

SCIENCE INDICATORS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 99

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to you a report of the National Science Board entitled Science Indicators/The 1985 Report. This report is the seventh in a continuing series in which important aspects of the status of American science and engineering are examined.

The importance of scientific and engineering research to the well-being of our Nation is widely recognized. Science and engineering play a vital role in maintaining our Nation's defense and increasing its economic productivity.

I commend the report to the attention of the Congress and those in the scientific endeavor.

REPORT OF THE NATION'S PROGRESS IN AERONAUTICS AND SPACE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 100

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

The enclosed report of the Nation's progress in aeronautics and space during calendar year 1984, a record of high achievement, is transmitted to you in accordance with Section 206 of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2476).

Many departments and agencies of the Federal Government contributed substantially to this outstanding record, but the major participants are the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) and the Department of Defense (DOD) as set forth in the 1958 Act.

Department of Defense efforts in aeronautics and space in 1984 were broad and far-reaching and included programs in military satellite communications crucial for deterring and containing hostilities, a variety of programs in aeronautics to modernize and advance defense helicopters and Vertical/Short Takeoff and Landing Aircraft (V/STOL), and, of course, support at various military facilities for launching space vehicles, both civilian and military, and tracking their operations. Also, DOD consolidated research and technology on defense against ballistic missiles under the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization to provide programs and guidance for future decisions with respect to such defenses.

NASA activities in 1984 began to reflect our new commitment to encouraging private U.S. enterprise in space pursuant to Executive Order 12465 and our National Policy on the Commercial Use of Space. NASA activities also in 1984 continued to reflect the legislative mandate of the 1958 Act: to pursue activities for peaceful purposes for the benefit of all mankind, to provide widest dissemination of information resulting from such activities, and to undertake our national reach into space in cooperation with other nations and groups of nations. Our continuing commitment to this mandate was given special emphasis in 1984 when I announced to you and to the Nation on January 25 a plan of action to establish a permanently manned Space Station in the 1990's. I invited other countries to participate in this endeavor which, I believe, will spotlight the incredible potential of space waiting to be used for the betterment of mankind.

My 1984 goal to build a Space Station is a logical extension of U.S. voyages and operations, both national and international, made possible by the Space Shuttle, the vehicle of our current Space Transportation System. We used both transportation systems to place into orbit a broad array of applications satellites in 1984. Among these were satellites to observe Earth and search out its resources, assess and monitor food production, and keep watch for natural disasters so that human lives and property could be protected against them in a timely fashion.

A highlight in 1984 was our demonstration of the ability to manufacture more perfect products in the gravity-free space environment and offer those products for sale and use on Earth.

Another major highlight of U.S. air and space operations in 1984 was the dramatic demonstration of the ability of our astronauts to recover, repair, and redeploy malfunctioning spacecraft. This capability promises substantial savings in both time and money.

Our reach into air and space in 1984 brought us a rich bounty of information essential for developing new technologies for human advancement on Earth and for ensuring the Nation's continued primacy in air and space research. In our reach for the stars, knowledge continues to be both the key and the quest. As this report reveals, it is a grand search in which we all share, one that enriches and advances our Nation and all peoples everywhere.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 101

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to submit to the Congress the sixth Science and Technology Report, as required under the National Science and Technology Policy, Organization, and Priorities Act of 1976, as amended. This is also the first biennial report, covering the years 1983 and 1984.

Continued strong support for our Nation's science and technology has been and will continue to be a policy of this Administration. The goals of this support are enhanced national security, improved quality of life, and increased industrial competitiveness. Today, more than ever before, we must use our technological resources aggressively in order to retain international leadership.

This report highlights recent achievements in federally supported science and technology. It also presents areas of major emphasis for Federal action as we move forward in the coming years. Our challenge for the future is to draw upon our unique strength in basic science and accelerate the development of technology and products that will benefit our society.

RONALD REAGAN.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, with an amendment:

H.R. 2417. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the program of assistance for health maintenance organizations (Rept. No. 99-229).

By Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute:

S. 1762. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the program of assistance for health maintenance organizations (Rept. No. 99-229).

By Mr. ROTH, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

Special Report entitled "Federal Government's Security Clearance Programs", prepared by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations (Rept. No. 99-230).

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, I submit a report of its Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations entitled, "Federal Government's Security Clearance Programs."

The Investigations Subcommittee, under the very able leadership of the ranking minority member, Senator SAM NUNN, examined the ability of the Federal Government to effectively insure the integrity of those individuals who have access to classified information. The investigation focused on several instances where individuals holding high Government security clearances had sold some of this country's most highly guarded secrets to agents of hostile intelligence services.

In its findings, conclusions, and recommendations for corrective action, the subcommittee report urges the executive branch to substantially reduce the number of individuals who hold security clearances. The report finds that, under current manpower restrictions, the Government simply cannot adequately guarantee the integrity and trustworthiness of the more than 4.6 million Americans who today hold security clearances.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, we all hope and pray that the recent summit conference in Geneva has laid the foundation for improved relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

But, no matter how beneficial these talks prove to be in the long term, the more immediate threat of Soviet espionage will remain serious. As hearings by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations demonstrated last spring, it is increasingly apparent that the Soviet Union and its surrogates have embarked on a massive espionage venture in this country with which they plan to obtain as much of our classified information as they can.

In a report entitled, "Federal Government Security Clearance Investigations," made public today, the Investigations Subcommittee summarizes the 4 days of hearings held last April 16-18 and 25 and puts forward findings, conclusions, and recommendations for corrective action.

Filed by Senator WILLIAM V. ROTH, JR., the chairman of the subcommittee, the report recounts information contained in the 1341-page hearing volume containing the testimony of 22 witnesses, 26 exhibits, and 18 written statements submitted for the hearing record.

Copies of the 21-page report are available in room 193 of the Russell Senate Office Building.

As the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, I directed the 12-month investigation by the minority staff that led to the hearings. With the cooperation and concurrence of Chairman ROTH and his staff, the investigation probed into virtually every aspect of the Government's personnel security programs, policies and practices.

The hearings that followed constituted one of the most comprehensive examinations in recent years of the effectiveness of the Government's efforts to test the integrity of its employees and to combat espionage.

One of the immediate results of the investigation and hearings has been a renewed interest in and concern about personnel security programs. In calling attention to shortcomings in the security clearance system, the subcommittee has demonstrated to Congress, the executive branch, the press, and the public the need for reform.

Already, certain of the subcommittee's findings, first put forward by Chairman ROTH and myself last June, have been endorsed by key policymakers in the executive branch. For example, Chairman ROTH and I called for fewer security clearances and improved and more frequent background checks. Accordingly, a report issued on November 21, 1985, by the Pentagon's Security Review Commission made these two proposals its top recommendations for corrective action.

Several other recommendations by Chairman ROTH and myself have also been embraced by the Security Review Commission.

Similarly, the Investigation Subcommittee report filed today reiterates the importance of reducing the number of clearances while making more thorough—and more frequent—those clearance inquiries which are necessary. In example after example, the subcommittee's hearings showed that the security clearance system is not working well because too many people have clearances based on scanty and outdated background information.

The pressure to grant clearances with insufficient and untimely inquiry stems from the fact that more than 4 million persons have some form of security clearance and Government does not have the resources to look into the backgrounds of so many people. In one of the major recommendations of the subcommittee's report, we call upon President Reagan to issue an Executive order directing that Government agencies and defense contractors substantially cut the number of security clearances within 2 years with a goal of a 50-percent reduction.

The reduction in cleared personnel should be accompanied by a significant decrease in classified documents. Government classifiers should stamp secret and top secret only on those documents which deserve it. The overclassification of information remains a serious problem within the Government.

In what I consider to be a timely insight, the subcommittee report warns that unless the White House moves to improve personnel security methods throughout Government the Congress will undertake the task. My view is that it would be far preferable if the executive branch, under the guidance of the President's National Security Adviser, set out to reform the counter-espionage system. But if the needed reforms are not initiated by the White House, Congress will be forced to do it—and a major overhaul of something as complex as the security clearance system is not the sort of task the Congress is suited for. Instead, the White House should face this challenge in cooperation with Congress.

The National Security Council has the authority and the responsibility to get the process of reform moving forward. But the NSC has been reluctant to carry out this responsibility. That reluctance should be discarded. The Nation's secrets should be guarded more effectively and the Congress is impatient with further delay.

Noting that "a system that must certify to the reliability of everyone ends up certifying to the reliability of no one," the subcommittee report also points out that the security problems caused by Soviet-inspired spying could be eased if Government investigated fewer clearance applicants—but did a better job of it and on a continuing basis. Reinvestigations, which are conducted rarely on previously cleared personnel, should be done at 2- and 4-year intervals, the report says.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all of the report's 22 findings, conclusions, and recommendations be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FINDINGS, CONCLUSIONS, AND RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The government's personnel security program should be devoted to accurately detecting potential security risks as well as efficiently clearing large numbers of personnel.

2. The number of personnel holding clearances for access to highly sensitive information must be reduced. Our current system cannot adequately insure the continued integrity and reliability of the 4.3 million Americans who today hold security clearances. Furthermore, hearing testimony strongly suggested that many of those 4.3 million have no actual need for a security clearance. Clearance requests have reached unmanageable numbers, resulting in diluted investigative resources and background investigations of diminished quality. The President should issue an executive order directing that government agencies and contractors substantially cut the number of security clearances within 2 years with a goal of a 50% reduction. As an added incentive, those agencies and contractors who make the largest cuts should be given priority on remaining clearance requests.

3. Complementing the reduction in clearances, there must also be a significant effort to insure that information is classified only where truly necessary to maintain the national security. Although the Subcommittee's investigation did not focus in detail on the problem of overclassification, the 1984 report of the Information Security Oversight Office, released shortly after the Subcommittee's hearings, confirmed that "overclassification" of information remains a problem within the government.

4. The National Security Council should promptly complete its review of the personnel security programs. Although the National Security Council has been charged with initiating needed reforms in personnel security, this had not been accomplished at the time of the hearings. Given the critical importance of these reforms to our national security, the National Security Council should act promptly and without further delay, to carry out this responsibility. Absent such action, Congress will be forced to consider enacting legislation to replace, revise, and consolidate the dated executive orders which now govern the government's security clearance programs.

5. An executive body should be established with personnel security oversight responsibilities for the entire government similar to those which the Information Security Oversight Office now holds for the classification of information. This organization should specify and enforce uniform government-wide standards for security investigations and adjudications for both personnel and facility clearances. Standard requirements for formal training for both investigators and adjudicators should be established.

6. Congress must also focus on problems dealing with classified information in the legislative branch. For the most part, there are no established standards or procedures. Personal offices and Committee practices vary widely in terms of their handling of clearances and classified material. There are few, if any, checks in this system. We believe an overall review of security procedures in the legislative branch should be conducted by the Rules Committee in consultation with the Intelligence Committee with a goal of recommending improvements where needed. We commend the Senate Intelligence Committee's efforts in this area and recommend the review of their practices and procedures as a model for such improvements. Senators Roth and Nunn have addressed this issue through preliminary letters to the Senate leadership.

7. A more thorough quality background investigation should be conducted on those individuals with Secret clearances who have access to highly sensitive information. Hearing testimony established, without dispute, that the national agency check, currently used as the basis for most Secret clearances, is woefully inadequate as a background investigation. Some effort should be made to review and perhaps restructure the massive Secret clearance category with a view of prioritizing those clearances actually affecting the most critical and sensitive information.

8. There should be regular periodic reinvestigations of personnel with Secret and Top Secret clearances. Timely reinvestigation should be considered as important and be accorded as much priority as the initial background investigation. Cleared employees, at both government and contractor levels, should be required to complete periodic updated personnel security questionnaires. Some responsibility for updates should be shifted where possible to the users' security departments.

9. More realistic sanctions, such as debarment, suspension, and the imposition of monetary fines, should be meted out to employers of cleared personnel, including defense contractors, if they knowingly or through negligence violate personnel security regulations. Greater emphasis should be placed on the use of these sanctions in an effort to increase the accountability of contractors for security violations.

10. Legislation should be enacted which would allow security clearance investigative agencies such as the Defense Investigative Service and the Office of Personnel Management to obtain needed background information from criminal justice agencies at the state and local level as well as private corporations. Currently, they are often refused needed information due to interpretations of a variety of laws, including state privacy acts, the federal privacy act, and the Fair Credit Reporting Act. S. 1347, introduced in the Senate by Senators Nunn and Roth on June 25, 1985, is designed to correct this problem.

11. An interagency group should be formed to develop a more effective means for conducting personnel security investigations regarding immigrant aliens and recently natualized citizens who apply for security clearances. U.S. agencies which assist in clearance investigations abroad should recognize the critical importance of this task to national security and prioritize their efforts accordingly.

12. Responsible government agencies should increase efforts in the area of personnel security research to develop appropriate investigative strategies and procedures and to identify, where possible, areas of personnel vulnerability. Hearing testimony indicated that, at least in the Defense Department, there has been no significant dedication of resources for furthering study in this area, despite its growing importance to our national security.

13. Congress should consider the need for legislation clearly specifying that the Merit Systems Protection Board is authorized to review employment, as opposed to security, decisions. The Board, whose expertise does not encompass questions of national security, should not be engaged in the denial or reinstatement of security clearances.

14. The government should determine the feasibility of utilizing available technology for the encoding of classified documents to prevent their unauthorized duplication and removal. If feasible, this technology should be implemented as soon as possible on, at the least, a prioritized basis determined by the sensitivity and vulnerability of the material involved.

15. Continuing security awareness programs on behalf of federal agencies and industrial contractors should be given the highest priority. These programs should emphasize the harsh realities and grave personal consequences of espionage in an attempt to dispel popular misconceptions of espionage as an often glamorous and intriguing adventure.

16. Within the Department of Defense, all industrial clearance adjudication, including Special Access Programs (SAP) or Sensitive Compartmented Information (SCI) procurements, should be consolidated. According to hearing testimony, the present division of adjudication authority generates inconsistency, unpredictability and duplication of effort within the Department of Defense clearance system.

17. Under current rules, contractors who reduce security costs have a competitive advantage in the bidding process. Current Federal Acquisition Regulations should be reviewed to determine whether they can be modified to segregate security costs from those overhead rate determinations used for the award of contracts. Testimony suggested that the current inclusion of security costs in overhead gives contractors a "disincentive" to strengthen and improve security programs.

18. Defense Investigative Service (DIS) and Office of Personnel Management (OPM) investigators are not currently authorized to use the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) data bank. Law enforcement agencies routinely use that data bank to quickly obtain updated criminal record information. The Attorney General should proceed with arrangements for both the Defense Investigative Service and Office of Personnel Management to be granted access to the National Crime Information Center by the Board of Governors. Use of the Center would greatly facilitate access to state criminal records which are often otherwise unavailable for use in clearance investigations.

19. Government agencies and contractors should emphasize and strictly adhere to the "need to know" standard in submitting clearance requests. Greater responsibility should be delegated to the employers of cleared personnel, including contractors, to "prescreen" individuals submitted for clearances. In order to strengthen their incentive to eliminate unnecessary clearances, the costs of investigations conducted by the Defense Investigative Service should be charged to the appropriate DOD service or agency, similar to the system now employed by the Office of Personnel Management. Contractors should be charged for the cost of any DIS investigations requested beyond established quotas for those requests. Under current rules, costs of Defense Investigative Service investigations are covered by the DIS budget, rather than by those agencies requesting the investigations.

20. The requirements for cleared personnel and facilities vary in response to federal budget priorities. To meet uneven demand, the Office of Personnel Management and the Department of State have instituted plans of contracting with experienced outside investigators who can be called upon during surge periods, thus delivering adequate investigative products without unnecessarily expanding the permanent federal work force. All agencies responsible for conducting personnel security investigations should examine the feasibility of, and consider, following this procedure during surge periods.

21. Currently, only three professional employees in the Department of Defense are responsible for policy operations for what amounts to the largest personnel security program in the free world. More realistic staffing would help eliminate the need to periodically create oversight committees to propose reforms of the program. The office in DOD dealing with personnel security policy should be given enhanced status and adequately staffed and funded so that it can effectively oversee the DOD personnel security program.

22. In keeping with these recommendations, the Subcommittee commends the work of the Department of Defense Industrial Security Review Committee as set forth in its December 1984 report. The Committee's analysis of the Defense Industrial Security Program was extremely helpful to the Subcommittee in identifying and examining major shortcomings within the program. The Subcommittee recommends that the Department of Defense review and implement where feasible the Committee's recommendations for improvement of the Industrial Security Program, with particular emphasis on those portions dealing with the enhancement of personnel security investigative standards; the reduction of industrial clearances; increased and improved security requirements for industrial contractors—including strict monitoring of afterhours access; and revision of the industrial security inspection system.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 2004. A bill to require the President to submit to the Congress an annual report on the management of the executive branch of the Government; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

GOVERNMENT MANAGEMENT REPORT ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing today the Government Management Report Act of 1986, a measure which would provide for the President of the United States to submit an annual report, with his budget, on the major activities undertaken and planned to improve the management of the executive branch of Government.

I believe this legislation is necessary to ensure that the Congress is fully and currently informed about administration plans and activities designed to ensure that our Federal programs are managed effectively and that every taxpayer's dollar is put to its maximum and appropriate use. This report would also serve as the basis for a closer partnership between the legislative and executive branches on efforts to strengthen Government management.

President Reagan has placed increased emphasis on management issues. In September 1982 he established the Cabinet Council on Management and Administration, the first Cabinet-level White House group devoted specifically to management issues. He also established Reform '88, a comprehensive program to improve, consolidate, and streamline the Government's management systems. After 3 years, according to the Office of Management and Budget, this program has already resulted in substantial progress in increasing the efficiency of Federal operations, while building the management systems for the future.

The Congress has also taken an active interest in management reform in recent years through legislation such as the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980, the Debt Collection Act of 1982, and the Federal Managers' Financial Integrity Act—all of which were reported by the Governmental Affairs Committee which I chair.

The Office of Management and Budget said in its February 1985 management report:

> The Federal system works best when there is a cooperative Executive-Legislative effort to address national concerns in a balanced way. Jointly agreed upon action has proven to be the strongest and most effective means of implementing change. The need for such joint action applies to management reform, as well as to other activities of the Federal Government.

It is in the interest of furthering the partnership on management reform that I offer this legislation today.

The report required by this bill would not be another document to be quietly forwarded to Congress and end up collecting dust in some committee staffer's in-box. Rather, I see this report as the basis for annual hearings before the Government Affairs Committee on the state of Government management and what is being done to ensure that our Government has the leadership, the systems, and the organization to meet the challenging times ahead.

For many years, we have relied on the President's budget as our fiscal blueprint. That document has served as the starting point for our budget deliberations. Each year the Budget and Appropriations Committees hold hearings based on this report. The President also submits his economic report and the Joint Economic Committee holds overview hearings. We have now come to a time when Government management has become sufficiently important that it is ready to take its place alongside the budget and the economy as subjects meriting the same systematic and thorough attention.

In 1984, the Congress mandated in the Deficit Reduction Act a report by the President on how he had responded to recommendations made by outside organizations, including the Grace Commission, to improve Government management. The report issued last February by OMB not only addressed the legislative requirement, but also informed the Congress of other improvement efforts being undertaken. For the first time we had a full picture of the President's management program.

OMB plans to continue reporting annually on management at the time the budget is issued, but we have no assurance beyond the Agency's promise that this report will be issued in future years, and we have no voice in deciding what the report will contain. The Deficit Reduction Act required only a single report. My bill would ensure that we have such a report every year. Moreover, it outlines the specific subjects on which OMB would report, including the provision of a summary of major management improvement initiatives and a discussion for each initiative of its purposes, the progress and problems in implementation, the impact on Agency operations in terms of additional costs incurred, cost savings already achieved and projected, resulting improvements in Federal program efficiency or productivity, and resulting improvements in service delivery.

This bill strikes a balance between keeping the reporting requirements as simple and flexible as possible and assuring that the information provided will be useful to Congress in effectively overseeing executive branch management improvement activities. It also assures that the President's report will cover all management activities and present, insofar as possible, a balanced summary of both the problems and accomplishments in management.

Three years ago, OMB instituted a management review process, parallel to the budget process, wherein OMB officials meet annually with the management staff of each of the 20 or so largest Federal agencies to discuss an agenda of management reforms for the coming year. Following these meetings, the agencies submit management improvement plans for OMB review and approval. These plans then are the blueprints for Agency action the following year. OMB also tracks progress using an automated system throughout the year.

The annual hearings triggered by the report required by my bill would not set up so systemmatic a process, but it would give Congress an opportunity, similar to that exercised by OMB with executive agencies, to ensure that appropriate actions are being taken to see that we have the Government management that the Nation expects and deserves.

I urge your support for this legislation and swift enactment by the Congress.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2004

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Government Management Report Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. (a)(1) Chapter 11 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1115. Annual management report

"(a) With each budget of the United States Government submitted under section 1105 of this title, the President shall submit to the Congress a report on the management of the executive branch of the Government with respect to the most recently completed fiscal year, the current fiscal year, and the fiscal year for which the budget is submitted. Each such report shall include—

"(1) an overview of the general management improvement goals of the President for the executive branch of the Government during such fiscal years;

"(2) a summary of the management problems and issues for the executive branch of the Government, and the major management improvement initiatives and accomplishments for the executive branch of the Government, involving—

"(A) program delivery systems;

"(B) human resources management;

"(C) productivity;

"(D) information resources management;

"(E) financial management;

"(F) procurement and grants management;

"(G) property management; and

"(H) any other relevant subject areas; and

"(3) for each initiative summarized in paragraph (2), a description, where feasible and appropriate, of—

"(A) the purpose of the initiative;

"(B) the progress and problems in the implementation of the initiative; and

"(C) the impact of the initiative on agency operations, including—

"(i) any additional costs which have been incurred as a result of the implementation of the initiative;

"(ii) any cost savings which have been achieved or which are projected as a result of the implementation of the initiative;

"(iii) any improvements in Federal program efficiency or productivity which have resulted from the implementation of the initiative; and

"(iv) any improvements in the delivery of services which have resulted from the implementation of the initiative;

"(4) proposals for legislative or other action to improve the management or organization of the executive branch of the Government, including proposals to remove statutory impediments to the improvement of the management of the executive branch of the Government; and

"(5) a summary of each significant new management policy for the executive branch of the Government which has been adopted or which is planned for the current fiscal year or the fiscal year for which the budget is submitted, and a discussion of the reasons for such policy.".

(2) The analysis for Chapter 11 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"§ 1115. Annual management report.".

(b) Section 719 of such title is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsections (g) through (i) as subsections (h) through (j), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after subsection (f) the following new subsection:

"(g) Within 90 days after the President has submitted a report under section 1115 of this title, the Comptroller General shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a statement analyzing such report. The statement shall include—

"(1) an evaluation of the items contained in such report which the Comptroller General considers to be of particular interest to the Congress;

"(2) a specification of any questions or issues raised by such report which the Comptroller General considers to require further clarification;

"(3) an analysis of the extent to which such report complies with the requirements of section 1115 of this chapter; and

"(4) recommendations, if any, for improvement of the management or organization of the executive branch of the Government, including modification or repeal of statutory impediments to efficient and effective management.".●

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 2005. A bill to amend the Inspector General Act of 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, in 1978 the Committee on Governmental Affairs, which I chair, secured the enactment of legislation establishing independent offices of inspector general in many of the larger Federal departments and agencies. In 1982, on the basis of hearings before the committee, I proposed and the Senate adopted an amendment to the Defense authorization bill which established a statutory inspector general for the Defense Department. Most recently, the Congress incorporated under the Inspector General Act of 1978 the State Department inspector general as part of administrative provisions in the Foreign Relations Authorization Act enacted in August 1985.

Eleven Cabinet departments and six major agencies now have statutory inspectors general. The IG's have overall responsibility for coordination and leadership of internal auditing and investigative activities in these agencies and are required to report periodically to their agency heads and the Congress concerning significant problems, abuses or deficiencies and the progress of corrective action. The statutes creating these offices contain a number of specific provisions designed to insure that inspectors general have the independence and authority necessary to carryout their responsibilities.

Although the establishment of statutory offices of inspector general was initially opposed by every department and agency affected, the usefulness of these offices is now widely recognized. President Carter described them as "Perhaps the most important new tools in the fight against fraud * * *". President Reagan has called them "Our first line of defense in attacking fraud, waste, and abuse."

One of President Reagan's first initiatives in the management area was to establish a President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency to coordinate IG activities and strengthen their capabilities. According to the President's fiscal year 1986 management report, IG efforts since March 1981 have resulted in:

Nearly 67,000 allegations of fraud, waste, and abuse;

Over $46 billion put to better uses, including $26 billion in questioned costs upheld as a result of audits conducted by the Defense Contract Audit Agency and commitments by agencies to recover funds, call loans, and cancel guarantees, totaling $6 billion;

More than 10,000 successful prosecutions, including over 2,000 in the last 6 months of 1984 alone; and Almost 9,400 administrative sanctions or agency actions against Federal employees, contractors, and grantees.

The success of the statutory inspectors general has been possible because of several fundamental improvements mandated by the legislation creating their offices. Under the IG statutes, responsibility for internal audits and investigations was placed in a single central unit in each agency headed by an inspector general. Before, uncoordinated audit and investigative units were often scattered throughout an agency. There are specific statutory provisions designed to insure a high degree of independence and to provide the IG with sufficient authority to carry out his or her responsibilities. By law, the inspector general has direct access to the agency head and significant findings are required to be reported to both the agency head and the Congress.

Recently, as part of his management legislative initiatives, the President submitted proposed legislation which would standardize inspector general authorizing legislation and make other technical and administrative changes to the 1978 act. The legislation I am introducing today, the Inspector General Act Amendments of 1985, incorporates these provisions.

Given the success of the inspector general concept, however, my bill goes one step further. The existing IG legislation covers only 17 of the large departments and agencies. There are about 40 smaller entities—such as executive agencies, regulatory boards and commissions, and Government corporations, with internal audit or investigative units which have no statutory authority or independence; an even larger number have no internal audit or investigative units at all.

To strengthen internal audits and investigations in the small agencies which have such units, I have included provisions in this bill designed to extend the benefits of the inspector general concept to smaller Federal executive agencies, regulatory boards, and commissions, and Government corporations which do not have statutory IG's. The bill does not affect the Justice and Treasury Departments and the Postal Service. The need for IG's in these organizations will be addressed separately.

Strong internal audit is especially needed at smaller agencies because their operations usually are not closely watched by Congress, the press or the public. In the absence of an independent internal audit unit, there is greater risk that serious problems and deficiencies will not be reported to the agency head and no assurance such problems will become known outside the agency.

Under existing laws and procedures, agency heads are responsible for providing adequate audit coverage of the programs they administer. However, this responsibility has simply not been carried our at many—if not most—smaller agencies. A May 1984 GAO report, based on responses to a questionnaire survey of Federal entities without statutory inspectors general, concluded that:

Some agencies are not complying with OMB Circulars A-50 and A-73, which address audits of Federal operations and programs and audit followup; and with GAO's "Standards for Audit of Governmental Organizations, Programs, Activities, and Functions." Some agencies have no audit coverage; at others the internal auditor does not report to the head or deputy head of the agency; and at several agencies that have more than one audit or investigative unit, there are no procedures for coordination.

Since the GAO report is based on responses to a questionnaire, the deficiencies cited are essentially those acknowledged by the agencies responding. An in-depth review might well have disclosed even further problems and deficiencies.

For example, even though the Securities and Exchange Commission is responsible for monitoring the performance of private sector accounting firms in order to help protect investors against fraud and abuse, internal auditing deficiencies at that agency have been particularly flagrant. Until very recently, in fact, SEC did not even have a single internal auditor to review its own operations.

As long ago as 1976, the General Accounting Office criticized SEC because the agency did not have an internal audit unit; however, no action was taken to remedy the situation. In 1980, during the course of a second GAO review of SEC audit operations, an internal audit division with a small staff was established. By 1983, although the internal audit unit continued to exist on paper, its staff had been reduced to zero. The unit now has a small staff again, but only because of a specific directive in SEC's appropriation act requiring such action.

The bill I am introducing would significantly improve internal audits and investigations in small Federal agencies without requiring additional expenditures or personnel. Specifically, the bill would strengthen the independence and authority of internal audit units by:

First, requiring the head of the agency to consolidate all internal audit and investigative units into a single unit reporting directly to the agency head;

Second, providing that the head of the internal audit unit have the same powers and duties as the statutory IG's; and Third, requiring that the agency head communicate the reasons to Congress in the event the head of an internal audit unit is removed or involuntarily transferred.

The bill represents another important step in improving management and reducing fraud and abuse in Federal programs and activities, and I encourage my colleagues to give it their support.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2005

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Inspector General Act Amendments of 1986".

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (5) through (8) as paragraphs (6) through (9), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) to administer to or take from any person an oath, affirmation, or affidavit, whenever necessary in the performance of the functions assigned by this Act, which oath, affirmation, or affidavit when administered or taken by or before an investigator or such other employee of an office of Inspector General designated by the Inspector General shall have the same force and effect as if administered or taken by or before an officer having a seal;".

REPORTING ON UNRESOLVED RECOMMENDATIONS

SEC. 5. Section 5(a)(3) of the Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended to read as follows:

"(3) an identification of each significant recommendation which was described in previous semiannual reports and which has not been resolved;".

REQUIREMENTS FOR INTERNAL AUDIT UNITS IN CERTAIN AGENCIES

SEC. 6. The Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended by inserting after section 8A the following new sections:

"REQUIREMENTS FOR CERTAIN INTERNAL AUDIT UNITS

"SEC. 8B. (a) Any internal audit unit established in a Federal entity shall be responsible for the conduct of audits and investigations of the programs and operations of such entity in accordance with the requirements of this section.

"(b) On or after the effective date of the Inspector General Act Amendments of 1985, any appointment to the position of internal audit unit head of a Federal entity shall be made by the entity head of such entity in accordance with the laws and regulations governing appointments in the civil service.

"(c) Within 180 days after the effective date of the Inspector General Act Amendments of 1985, the entity head of each Federal entity in which more than one internal audit unit has been established shall consolidate such units into a single internal audit unit.

"(d)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the entity head of a Federal entity may transfer to an internal audit unit of such entity other units or components of such entity, or functions, powers, or duties of such units or components, if such entity head determines—

"(A) that such units, components, functions, powers, or duties are properly related to the functions of such internal audit unit; and

"(B) such transfer would further the purposes of this section.

"(2) An entity head may not transfer to an internal audit unit any program operating responsibilities.

"(e) Each internal audit unit head of a Federal entity shall report to and be under the general supervision of the entity head of such entity or, to the extent such authority is delegated, the officer next in rank below such entity head, but shall not report to, or be subject to supervision by, any other officer of such entity. Neither the entity head of such entity nor the officer next in rank below such entity head shall prevent or prohibit the internal audit unit head from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit or investigation, or from issuing any subpena during the course of any audit or investigation.

"(f) If an internal audit head is removed from officer or involuntarily transferred to another position or location, the entity head concerned shall promptly communicate the reasons for any such removal or involuntary transfer to both Houses of Congress.

"(g)(1) The provisions of section 4 shall apply to the internal audit head of a Federal entity in the same manner as such provisions apply to an Inspector General of an establishment.

"(2) The provisions of section 5 shall apply to the internal audit unit head of a Federal entity and the entity head of a Federal entity in the same manner as such provisions apply to an Inspector General of an establishment and the head of an establishment, respectively.

"(3) The provisions of section 6 shall apply to the internal audit unit head of a Federal entity in the same manner as such provisions apply to an Inspector General of an establishment and the head of an establishment, respectively.

"(4)(A) The provisions of section 7 shall apply to an internal audit unit head of a Federal entity in the same manner as such provisions apply to an Inspector General of an establishment.

"(B) The provisions of section 7 shall apply to any employee of a Federal entity in the same manner as such provisions apply to an employee of an establishment.

"(h) For purposes of this section and section 8C:

"(1) The term 'entity head' means the director, administrator, president, chairman, or other chief officer of a Federal entity.

"(2) The term 'Federal entity' has the same meaning as is given to the term 'agency' in section 552(e) of title 5, United States Code, except that such term shall not include—

"(A) an establishment (as defined in section 11(2) of this Act);

"(B) the Executive Office of the President;

"(C) the Department of Justice;

"(D) the Department of the Treasury;

"(E) the Central Intelligence Agency;

"(F) the United States Postal Service;

"(G) the General Accounting Office; or

"(H) any entity in the judicial or legislative branches of the Government (including the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and the Architect of the Capitol and any activities under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol).

"(3) The term 'internal audit unit' means an office, unit, or other component of a Federal entity which carries out audits or investigations for the purpose of reviewing the progams and operations of such entity, but does not include an office, unit, or other component of such entity which carries out audits or investigations as an integral part of the programs or operations of such entity.

"(4) The term 'Interagency Committee' means the Inspector General Interagency Committee established under section 8C.

"(5) The term 'internal audit unit head' means the director or other chief officer of an internal audit unit.

"INSPECTOR GENERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE

"SEC. 8C. (a) There is established the Inspector General Interagency Committee, which shall consist of five Inspectors General who are appointed under section 3 and who are designated by the President to serve on the Interagency Committee.

"(b)(1) The Interagency Committee shall conduct a study with respect to—

"(A) the extent and effectiveness of internal audit and investigative activities at Federal entities, with particular attention to Federal entities in which internal audit units have not been established; and

"(B) the most appropriate and efficient methods of assuring effective audits and investigations at Federal entities.

"(2) Within one year after the date of enactment of this section, the Interagency Committee shall prepare and transmit to the President and the Congress a report describing the findings of the study conducted under paragraph (1) and containing such recommendations as the Interagency Committee considers appropriate.

EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 7. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on January 1, 1986.

INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1

SECTION 2

This section of the proposed amendments incorporates the Office of Inspector General of the Departments of Energy and Health and Human Services into the Inspector General Act of 1978, conforming their authorities and responsibilities to those of the other Inspector General (IG) offices established by the Act. Incorporating the IG offices of the Departments of Energy and Health and Human Services into the Inspector General Act of 1978 will eliminate the statutory position of Deputy Inspector General at both departments. This section also repeals the previous statutory provisions under which the offices of Inspector General at Energy and at Health and Human Services functioned, since they would now be covered by the Inspector General Act. In addition, references to the Community Services Administration Inspector General are deleted from the Inspector General Act because that agency was abolished in 1982.

SECTION 3

This section provides that all statutory Inspectors General will be compensated at the Executive Level IV rate, regardless of the agency in which they serve. Under present laws, statutory IGs are compensated at different rates even though their duties are essentially the same. The bill also provides that the statutory Deputy Inspector General at the Synthetic Fuels Corporation will be compensated at Executive Level V.

SECTION 4

This section authorizes Office of Inspector General personnel to administer oaths when necessary in the performance of their duties. During the conduct of investigations, it is often necessary for IG personnel to take voluntary sworn statements. Most IG offices have authority to administer oaths for this purpose but a few do not. This amendment makes the authority uniform and provides it for all IG offices. It would not authorize IG personnel to subpoena testimony.

SECTION 5

This section is a technical amendment to the semi-annual reporting requirements in the Inspectors General Act of 1978. The amendment provides that the Inspector General must identify each significant recommendation which remains unresolved and has been described in previous semiannual reports.

SECTION 6

This section provides authority and responsibilities for internal audit and investigation units in Federal entities not now covered by the Inspector General Act of 1978. The 1978 Act is amended to:

Consolidate in a single internal audit unit the conduct of audits and investigations in those Federal agencies having more than one audit office;

Provide that the internal audit unit head shall be appointed by the Federal entity head in accordance with civil service laws and regulations;

Insulate the internal audit unit from program operating responsibilities;

Require that the internal audit unit head report to the Federal entity head or the officer next in rank below such entity head;

Require that, if the internal audit unit head is removed from office or involuntarily transferred, the cognizant Federal entity head will report the reasons to both Houses of Congress;

Give the internal audit unit heads of such Federal entities the same authorities and responsibilities as the existing statutory Inspectors General with regard to (1) conduct, supervision, and coordination of audits and investigations, (2) preparation and submission of semiannual reports, (3) access to records, subpoena power and related authorities, and (4) receipt and investigation of complaints or information from Federal entity employees concerning waste, mismanagement, and possible violations of law;

Defines the terms used in this section, including "Federal entity" which is the same as "agency" as defined in section 552(e) of title 5, United States Code, but excludes departments and agencies already having a statutory Inspector General, the Justice and Treasury departments, the Central Intelligence Agency, the U.S. Postal Service, and legislative and judicial branch entities; and Establishes an Inspector General Interagency Committee, consisting of five Inspectors General appointed by the President, to study and make recommendations regarding (1) the extent and effectiveness of audit and investigative activities at Federal entities and (2) the most appropriate and efficient methods of assuring effective audits and investigations at such entities.

This section makes this Act, and the amendments made by this Act, effective January 1, 1986.●

By Mr. ROTH (by request):

S. 2006. A bill to amend the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 and title 31, United States Code, to facilitate the collection of claims against Federal Government contractors; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CONTRACT DISPUTES AMENDMENTS

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing, by request, the Contract Disputes Act Amendments of 1986. This bill makes certain technical amendments to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 designed to eliminate needless litigation and expedite the claims settlement process.

The Contract Disputes Act is the basic statute governing the submission of contract claims to the Government and the resolution of disputes arising from such claims. Since its enactment in 1978, the administration has identified a number of relatively minor problems with the act which the legislation I am introducing today is designed to remedy.

This bill is one part of a series of eight bills which comprise the administration's antifraud enforcement initiative. This package, in turn, is one of several management legislative initiatives which the President outlined in a message to Congress—PM-71—on July 31, 1985.

I welcome the President's initiatives to strengthen the Government's ability to detect and prosecute fraud and this particular proposal to improve the operation of the Contract Disputes Act.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2006

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Contract Disputes Amendments of 1986".

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 6(a) of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (92 Stat. 2384; 41 U.S.C. 605(a)) is amended by inserting ", not later than 18 months after the dates on which the claims accrue," before "for a decision".

SEC. 3. Section 10(a)(3) of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (92 Stat. 2388; 41 U.S.C. 609(a)(3)) is amended by striking out "twelve months" and inserting in lieu thereof "90 days".

SEC. 4. The Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (92 Stat. 2383; 41 U.S.C. 601 et seq.) is further amended—

(1) by redesignating sections 15 and 16 as sections 16 and 17, respectively; and

(2) by inserting after section 14 the following new section 15:

"COLLECTION OF CLAIMS AGAINST CONTRACTORS; PROVISIONAL RELIEF

"SEC. 15. (a) If a contracting officer finds in a decision issued by the contracting officer under section 6(a) that a contractor owes the Government any amount under a contract or, in such a decision, requires performance under a contract, the contractor shall pay such amount to the Government or commence the required performance within the 90-day period beginning on the date the contractor receives such decision unless the contractor commences an appeal under section 7 or an action under section 10 within such period.

"(b) If a contractor fails to pay an amount owed the Government or to commence performance as required in subsection (a), the Government may file an action in an appropriate district court of the United States to recover the amount owed or to compel the required performance.

"(c)(1) Any appropriate district court of the United States may grant the Government provisional relief in the case of a decision made by a contracting officer under section 6(a) with respect to a claim of the Government against a contractor—

"(A) upon the petition of the Attorney General of the United States or a designee; and

"(B) if the court finds that there is a reasonable likelihood that the contractor will take an action which will hinder, delay, or frustrate any payment of the claim or any performance required in the contracting officer's decision with respect to the claim.

"(2) A petition for provisional relief may be filed under paragraph (1) at any time after the decision of the contracting officer referred to in such paragraph has been issued and without regard to whether the contractor referred to in such decision has commenced an appeal under section 7 or an action under section 10.

"(d) A decision of a contracting officer under section 6(a) and the procedures followed by a contracting officer in making such decision may not be reviewed by a court in an action to enforce such decision brought under subsection (b) or in an action for provisional relief brought under subsection (c).".

SEC. 5. Section 3716(c) of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of clause (1);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "or"; and

(3) by inserting at the end thereof the following new clause (3):

"(3) a claim which is subject to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (92 Stat. 2383; 41 U.S.C. 601 et seq.).".

SEC. 6. (a) The amendment made by section 2 shall take effect with respect to claims accruing on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) The amendments made by section 3 and 4 shall take effect with respect to decisions issued by contracting officers of the Federal Government under the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

CONTRACT DISPUTES ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 2 would amend 41 U.S.C. Sec. 605 to require contractors to submit all claims to a contracting officer for resolution within eighteen months of when they accrue. Currently, there is no deadline for submission and, therefore, contractors may wait years before requesting payment, thereby making adjudication of disputes much more difficult. An analogous provision applying to navy shipbuilding contracts was included in the 1985 DOD Authorization bill, P.L. 98-525, Sec. 1234, 98 Stat. 2604. (41 U.S.C. Sec. 605.)

Section 3 amends 41 U.S.C. Sec. 609 to clarify the statute of limitations for appeal of a contracting officer's decision. Currently, a contractor has 90 days to appeal the decision to a board of contract appeals, but has 12 months to appeal to the Court of Claims. This inconsistency of time periods would be eliminated by requiring either appeal to be made within 90 days. (41 U.S.C. Sec. 609.)

Section 4 adds a new section 15 to the Contract Disputes Act. Subsection (a) of new section 15 requires a contractor to pay any money which the contracting officer finds is owed the government within 90 days of the contracting officer's decision, unless an appeal is taken. Expressly providing that failure to take an appeal requires immediate payment should improve enforcement of such final judgments. Under subsection 15(b), the government would also be given the right to proceed in district court to collect such sums. Subsection 15(c) gives the government additional authority to seek injunctive relief to protect the assets of a contractor in the event that an award by the court to the government has not yet been paid pending appeal. (41 U.S.C. Sec. 605.)

Finally, subsection 15(d) makes clear that in a suit by the government to enforce such a judgment, the district court judge may not review the underlying decision of the contracting officer (since that was the decision which the contractor chose not to appeal). This amendment will clarify the law and prevent the contractor from relitigating issues in the enforcement proceeding which he failed to appeal in the underlying action on the merits.

Section 5 overturns a recent decision of the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals, DMJM/Norman Engineering Co., ASBCA No. 28154, 84-1 BCA 17,226, which held that the government must follow the procedures set forth in the Debt Collection Act before using its common law right of offset to collect amounts due. Under the accepted common law right of offset, the government has the right, as does any creditor, to offset money due it (e.g., pursuant to a prior court judgment) before paying a debt to a contractor. (No notice or due process is required for common law offset; all necessary rights were provided when the government adjudicated its underlying right to the money.)

Prior to the Norman Engineering decision, this right had been routinely used and never challenged. However, since enactment of the Debt Collection Act in 1982 and the more recent Norman Engineering decision, contractors have challenged this offset right, asserting that the government must follow the administrative offset provisions established in the Debt Collection Act, 31 U.S.C. Sec. 3716. These procedures include (1) notice of the claim and the intention to offset; (2) "an opportunity to inspect and copy the records of the agency related to the claim;" (3) an opportunity to review of the agency's decision relating to the claim; and (4) an opportunity to make a written agreement with the agency on the terms of repayment. Contractors made particular use of this theory to demand access to all records relating to the contract, in effect using it as a right of discovery. This amendment would ensure that the Debt Collection Act does not hinder government efforts to collect money due for inadequate contract performance. (31 U.S.C. Sec. 3716.)●

By Mr. ROTH (by request):

S. 2007. A bill to amend the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act to provide authority to test innovative procurement methods and procedures; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

S. 2008. A bill to improve the Federal procurement system by providing an alternative, simplified procurement method for competitively negotiating procurements of less than $5 million; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PROCUREMENT TEST ACT AND THE SIMPLIFIED COMPETITIVE ACQUISITION TECHNIQUE ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing, by request, two bills designed to simplify and improve the Federal procurement process. These bills were submitted to Congress by the Administration last year as part of the President's management legislative initiatives. (See PM-71, July 31, 1985.)

The first bill, the Simplified Competitive Acquisition Techniques Act of 1985, is designed to create a simplified, accelerated, competitive acquisition system for purchasing goods and services up to $5 million. This would shorten the time required for such purchases from 260 days to 85 days. The second bill, the Procurement Test Act of 1985, would grant the Director, Office of Management and Budget, additional authority to test innovative procurement methods and procedures, and would allow the Director to conduct the tests without regard to existing statutory restrictions.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the bills, section-by-section analysis, and other accompanying materials furnished by the administration be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2007

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Procurement Test Act of 1985."

SEC. 2. Sec. 15 of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act (41 U.S.C. 413) is amended to read as follows—

TEST OF INNOVATIVE PROCUREMENT METHODS AND PROCEDURES

(a) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget may develop innovative procurement methods and procedures to be tested by selected executive agencies. The innovative procurement methods and procedures tested under this section shall be consistent with the policies set forth in section 2. In developing any program to test innovative procurement methods and procedures under this section, the Director shall consult with the heads of executive agencies to ascertain the need for such programs. A program to test innovative procurement methods and procedures may not be carried out unless approved by the heads of the executive agencies selected to carry out such programs; such approval by the heads of the agencies shall not be unreasonably denied.

(b) Subject to the provisions of this section, the conducting of any programs to test innovative procurement methods and procedures shall not be limited by any lack of specific authority to take the action contemplated, or by any provision of law or any rule or regulation which would prohibit the conducting of the proposed testing program or any part of it.

(c) Before instituting any test program, the Director shall—

(1) develop a plan for such program which identifies, to the extent practicable—

(A) the purposes of the program;

(B) the executive agencies or components of executive agencies to carry out such program;

(C) the categories and types of products or services to be procured under such program;

(D) the procedures to be followed in conducting the program;

(E) the duration of the program;

(F) the methods to be used to analyze the results of the program;

(G) a description of any aspect of the program for which there is a lack of specific authority; and

(H) a citation to any provision of law, rule, or regulation which would prohibit the conducting of the program or any part of the program as proposed;

(2) publish the program in the Federal Register; and

(3) provide notification of the proposed program to each House of Congress at least 60 days in advance of the date any program proposed under this section is to take effect, setting forth the information required by subsection (c)(1)(A) through (H).

SEC. 3. This Act shall become effective 60 days after enactment and shall remain in effect for a period of 3 years.

PROCUREMENT TEST ACT OF 1985—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

This Act amends the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act to provide authority to test innovative procurement methods and procedures without requiring separate congressional action. Current OFPP testing authority requires congressional action to waive statutes and discourages agencies from testing innovative methods which affect politically-sensitive statutes. This Act allows the Director of OMB to conduct the tests without regard to existing statutory restrictions and provides that the tests will not be limited by any specific lack of authority.

Section 1 states that this Act may be cited as the "Procurement Test Act of 1985".

Section 2 amends Section 15 of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act to provide a new and different authority for testing innovative procurement methods and procedures.

Paragraph (a) gives authority to the Director of OMB to develop innovative procurement methods and procedures to be tested by selected executive agencies. They must be consistent with the policies and procedures set forth in Section 2 of the OFPP Act. The Director is required to consult with the heads of the executive agencies to ascertain the needs for the test programs and to obtain the approval of the heads of the agencies selected to carry out the program before the program can be tested. It further provides that the approval of the testing authority by the heads of the agencies shall not be unreasonably denied.

Paragraph (b) provides that neither lack of authority nor a restrictive provision of law, rule or regulation will prevent conducting any program to test innovative procurement methods and procedures.

Paragraph (c) sets forth the contents of the plan which the Director must develop for each test program. These include:

(A) the purposes of the program;

(B) the executive agencies or components of executive agencies to carry out such program;

(C) the categories and types of products or services to be procured under such program;

(D) the procedures to be followed in conducting the program;

(E) the duration of the program;

(F) the methods to be used to analyze the results of the program;

(G) a description of any aspect of the program for which there is a lack of specific authority; and

(H) a citation to any provision of law, rule, or regulation which would prohibit the conducting of the program or any part of the program as proposed.

The program must be published in the Federal Register, and notification must be provided to each House of the Congress at least 60 days before the date the program is to take effect. The notice must set forth the information required by the plan.

Section 3 provides that the Act will become effective 60 days after enactment. It also provides that the testing authority is granted only for a 3-year period.

S. 2008

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) It is the policy of the Congress to promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness in the procurement of goods and services by the executive branch of the Federal Government by establishing a simplified competitive acquisition technique, which may be used for acquisition, by competitive negotiation, of goods and services estimated to cost less than $5 million.

(b) The Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique should be characterized by the following features:

(1) Full and open competition;

(2) A shortened acquisition cycle;

(3) Inclusion of the time schedule for the acquisition in the request for proposals;

(4) A clear, concise statement of work or product description;

(5) Synopsis in the Commerce Business Daily with shortened notice time periods, and notices published on an expedited basis in a separate section of the Commerce Business Daily;

(6) Limitations on length of requests for proposals, number of evaluation criteria, and length of offeror's technical proposal;

(7) Evaluation based strictly on evaluation criteria stated in the solicitation and limitations on discussions with offerors;

(8) Award on the basis of most advantageous offer to the Government, as certified by the contracting officer;

(9) Contracting officer as final selecting official, with such authority, responsibility, and accountability given only to highly qualified contracting officers;

(10) Procurement audit on a post-award basis; and

(11) Opportunity for resolution of protest by the contracting officer before filing protest with the Comptroller General.

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 3. (a) Congress finds that the procurement process has become overly complex, that too many procurements are noncompetitive, and that procurement authorities and responsibilities are fragmented and eroded.

(b) The Congress finds, therefore, that economy, efficiency and effectiveness in the procurement of goods and services by the executive agencies will be improved by establishing a new, simplified competitive acquisition technique for acquisition of goods and services estimated to cost less than $5 million.

(c) The purpose of this Act is to provide the legislative authority necessary to establish a simplified competitive acquisition technique.

PROCUREMENT NOTICE

SEC. 4. (a) Section 18 of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act (41 USC 416) is amended—

(1) By amending the first sentence in subsection (a)(3) to read as follows:

"Except as provided in paragraph (4), whenever an executive agency is required by paragraph (1)(A) to furnish a notice to the Secretary of Commerce, such executive agency may not—"; and

(2) By adding new paragraphs (4) and (5) at the end of subsection (a), to read as follows:

"(4) Whenever an executive agency conducts a procurement under the provisions of the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) and the agency is required by paragraph (1)(A) to furnish a notice to the Secretary of Commerce, such executive agency may not—

"(A) Issue the solicitation earlier than 5 days after the date on which the notice is published by the Secretary of Commerce; and

"(B) Establish a deadline for the submission of all proposals in response to the notice required by paragraph 1(A) that is earlier than the date 15 days after the date the solicitation is issued.

"(5) The provisions of subsection (a)(4) shall not apply to procurements which are subject to agreement under the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 (19 USC 2511-2518)."

(b) Section 8 of the Small Business Act (15 USC 637) is amended—

(1) By amending the first sentence in subsection (e)(3) to read as follows:

"Except as provided in paragraph (4), whenever an executive agency is required by paragraph (1)(A) to furnish a notice to the Secretary of Commerce, such executive agency may not—"; and

(2) By adding new paragraphs (4) and (5) at the end of subsection (e), to read as follows:

"(4) Whenever an executive agency conducts a procurement under the provisions of the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) and the agency is required by paragraph (1)(A) to furnish a notice to the Secretary of Commerce, such executive agency may not—

"(A) issue the solicitation earlier than 5 days after the date on which the notice is published by the Secretary of Commerce; and

"(B) Establish a deadline for the submission of all proposals in response to the notice required by paragraph 1(A) that is earlier than the date 15 days after the date the solicitation is issued.

"(5) The provisions of subsection e(4) shall not apply to procurements which are subject to agreements under the Trade Agreement Act of 1979 (19 U.S.C. 2511-2518)."

PROCUREMENT PROTEST SYSTEM

SEC. 5. Title 31 of the United States Code is amended—

(a) By adding at the end of Section 2552 the following paragraph:

"Protests against procurements conducted under the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) shall be filed first with the agency contracting officer; nothing in this section shall affect the right of the interested party to file a protest with the Comptroller General or to file a protest with the General Services Board of Contract Appeals under section 111(h) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 759(h)) after the agency contracting officer has issued a decision on the protest."

(b) By amending the first sentence of Section 3556 to read as follows:

"This subchapter does not give the Comptroller General exclusive jurisdiction over protests, and nothing contained in this subchapter shall affect the right of any interested party to file a protest with the contracting agency (except that protests against procurements conducted under the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) shall be filed first with the agency contracting officer) or to file an action in a district court of the United States or the United States Claims Court."

AUTOMATED DATA PROCESSING DISPUTE RESOLUTION

SEC. 6. Section 111 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 USC 759) is amended—

(a) By adding at the end of subsection (h)(1) the following sentence:

"Protests against procurements conducted under the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) shall be filed first with the agency contracting officer; nothing in this subsection shall affect the right of the interested party to file a protest with the board under this subsection or to file a protest with the Comptroller General after the agency contracting officer has issued a decision on the protest."

(b) By amending the last sentence of subsection (h)(6)(C) to read as follows:

"In addition, nothing contained in this subsection shall affect the right of any interested party to file a protest with the contracting agency (except that protests against procurements conducted under the 'Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985' (P.L. ——) shall be filed first with the agency contracting officer) or to file an action in a district court of the United States or the United States Claims Court."

PREAWARD AUDIT

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, agencies shall not obtain a preaward audit for procurements conducted under the provisions of the "Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique Act of 1985" (P.L. ——).

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 8. This Act shall take effect 120 days after enactment.

A PROPOSAL TO IMPROVE FEDERAL ACQUISITION

IMPORTANCE OF FEDERAL ACQUISITION

Government acquisition is big business. In FY 1984, over $180 billion was spent directly by Federal agencies to purchase goods and services. Further, Government agencies and industry spent additional billions in administrative activities related to these purchases. Because of the large sums involved, the efficiency, economy, and effectiveness of the Government's acquisition system has a significant impact on the Nation's overall productivity and well-being.

BACKGROUND

The acquisition system that has evolved over the years has become increasingly complex and unwieldy. To be effective, acquisitions must be performed in a businesslike manner, with the foremost objective being the timely acquisition of needed goods and services at the lowest reasonable prices. This end result must be stressed, otherwise, the protests, disputes, delays, and unnecessary expenses now being incurred by both the Government and the business community will continue.

The Federal acquisition system has been studied often during the past two decades, and steps have been taken to improve it. Many of these improvement efforts have been successful. The system, however, remains cumbersome, with a myriad of built-in checks and balances causing undue delays without sufficient corresponding benefits. Many of the same problems have persisted for years; e.g.:

1. Acquisitions Take Too Long. The acquisition process is so complex that users of products and services sometimes do not get what they need when they need it. While the time required to process a specific acquisition varies with the procedures used and the type of product or service required, administrative lead-times of 27-to-37 weeks are not uncommon for acquisitions in the $1-$5 million range. Such long lead-times add to the uncertainty, risk, and expense of contracts.

2. Too Many Acquisitions Are Non-Competitive. Non-competitive acquisitions are usually faster (but often more expensive) than competitive actions. If a product or service is needed in less than the normal lead-time of 27-37 weeks, the acquiring agency often decides to sacrifice competition to obtain timely delivery. Over 53 percent of the FY 84 contract outlays ($96 out of $182 billion) was awarded on a non-competitive basis. While time was not the only factor contributing to this large percentage of non-competitive awards, it was a major factor.

3. Authorities and Responsibilities Are Fragmented. Over the years, the authorities and responsibilities of the Government's contracting officers have been eroded. These authorities and responsibilities have been weakened, to a large extent, by excessive or duplicative management reviews and approvals. In many organizations, the flow of acquisition authority and responsibility is not clear, and there is often a lack of accountability for results.

RECENT LEGISLATION

Competition has been, and continues to be, the keystone of the Federal acquisition process. Much new legislation has been passed in the last 2 years aimed at enhancing competition. Specific statutes enacted during 1984 alone include: (1) the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-369, July 18, 1984); (2) the Defense Procurement Reform Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-525, October 19, 1984); and (3) the Small Business and Federal Procurement Competition Enhancement Act of 1984 (Public Law 95-577, October 30, 1984). These statutes contain specific requirements for enhancing competition by mandating actions dealing with acquisition planning, competition advocates, breakout acquisition center representatives, and pre-qualification of sources. While these actions will improve competition, they will not specifically address the problems concerning long procurement lead-times and the fragmentation and erosion of the contracting officer's authorities. A new method is needed to help solve these problems.

NEW METHOD

The new contracting method proposed herein—Simplified Competitive Acquisition Technique (SCAT)—is premised on changing the basic thrust of present procurement management philosophy; i.e., away from managing the acquisition process to focusing on end results. The acquisition process is now micromanaged in many agencies and departments without concomitant beneficial results. SCAT will not replace good planning but it will help provide for an efficient, economical, and effective process with adequate management controls and safeguards resulting from the following key features: competition, responsiveness, wide applicability, and accountability. It is emphasized that the attached legislative proposal encompasses only a part of the SCAT system. To the extent that the SCAT system is not dealt with in the legislative proposal, it will be dealt with in the context of the regulatory process.

Competition. SCAT contracts will be 100 percent competitive; i.e., the SCAT method of contracting is proposed for use only where it is anticipated that two or more acceptable offers will be received.[1] If only one offer is received in response to a SCAT notice in the Commerce Business Daily (CBD), the contracting officer will be required to either synopsize again and follow the present system or document the justification for continuing under SCAT by providing a copy of the justification to the activity's competition advocate or to the agency head, in accordance with Sec. 2711, P.L. 98-369.

Responsiveness. The SCAT process is designed to shorten the acquisition cycle to 10-to-12 weeks. If longer lead-times are needed to achieve specific objectives, the normal 27-to-37-week cycle should be followed. SCAT will save time primarily by simplifying and shortening the evaluation-source selection process. The process now consumes approximately 150 days of the normal 260-day lead-time. This process is administratively controllable and, under SCAT, will be shortened to approximately 30 days.

Applicability. SCAT is not designed for all acquisitions. It is intended primarily for selected acquisitions of supplies and services costing between $25,000 and $5 million where competitive negotiations are used. These acquisitions account for some 300,000 contracting actions per year and result in annual outlays in excess of $54.5 billion.

Accountability. One of the main ways to assure that the Government's acquisition function is efficient, effective, and relatively free of fraud, waste, and abuse is to give the Government's contracting officers sufficient authority to do their job and then hold them accountable for results. This requires the highest level of professionalism and the removal of unnecessary clearance and organizational constraints that have been imposed on the contracting officers. SCAT acquisitions will be administratively simplified and competent contracting officers given the latitude to conduct the Government's contracting in a businesslike manner.

OTHER SPECIFIC FEATURES OF SCAT

Acquisition Planning. SCAT acquisitions will be conducted in accordance with a plan and schedule. The schedule for issuing the RFP and awarding the contract shall be included in the CBD notice announcing the proposed SCAT acquisition.

Clear Statements of Work and Product Descriptions. Statements of work for services and specifications for products will be clear and concise. Commercial item descriptions will be used rather than Federal specifications if the solicitation is for a commercial or commercial-type product. Statements of work and/or product descriptions will be prepared by the program office and will be carefully checked and "scrubbed." SCAT will not be used unless the work to be performed or the product to be acquired can be described in a clear and concise manner.

Increased Small Business Participation. It is anticipated that more small businesses will compete as a result of straight-forward work statements, simplified proposal formats, and substantially faster awards. Many acquisitions conducted under present procedures require the offeror to expend many staff hours in preparing complex, extensive, and costly proposals. As a result, many small business contractors do not compete because they lack the resources for preparation of such proposals and are unable to retain technical personnel during lengthy acquisition cycles. The simplified proposal format and product description and/or work statement under SCAT will help solve this problem.

CBD Announcements. The CICA presently requires 15 days advance notice in the CBD prior to issuing a solicitation and a minimum of 30 days between issuance of the solicitation and the deadline for the receipt of offers. If authorized by Congress, these intervals will be shortened for SCAT acquisitions to 5 and 15 days, respectively. All notices of proposed SCAT acquisitions and synopses of SCAT requirements will be highlighted in a new proposed section of the CBD. Oral requests for SCAT Solicitations will be honored. International trade agreement procurements will continue to grant 30 days for proposal preparation.

Limitation on Length of RFPs. RFPs will not normally exceed 20 pages. Except in very unusual circumstances, they will contain no more than 25 pages. The RFPs will be clearly written and "boilerplate clauses" will be incorporated by reference and furnished to offerors only if requested. Each RFP will contain an "Executive Summary" explaining the salient characteristics of the acquisition, including the evaluation factors. Evaluation criteria will be limited to five or fewer factors and listed in relative order of importance. Extensive subcriteria will not be used.

Limitation on Length of Offerors' Technical Proposals. Offerors' technical proposals will be limited to 15 pages, exclusive of required resumes. Each technical proposal will contain an Executive Summary (2 pages); a statement of the offeror's understanding of the problem and proposed approach for resolving it (5 pages); a management plan (4 pages); a description of past relevant experiences (3 pages); and a listing of key personnel (1 page). These page allocations may vary depending on the nature of the acquisition, but the 15-page limit will be standard.

Limitation of Length of Cost/Price Proposals. Cost/price proposals will normally be limited to the data required by the appropriate standard forms.

Evaluation of Offers. Offers will be evaluated and ranked in strict adherence to the evaluation criteria stated in the RFP. Award may be made on the basis of offers, as submitted. If there are issues that preclude award on this basis, the submitters of the top proposals (no more than three) may be scheduled for oral discussions. If a pre-award survey is required, it shall be conducted concurrently during the source selection process. Only one discussion will be conducted with each offeror. At the end of the oral discussions, which shall be started and completed within 1 week, a best and final offer (BAFO) will be solicited. The technical section of the BAFO should not exceed 4 pages. Generally, there will be no further discussion after receipt of BAFOs, except for negotiations with the offeror selected for award.

Selecting Authority. The contracting officer will be the final selecting official. The SCAT may only be used by highly qualified contracting officers. Each contracting officer using SCAT must be authorized, in writing, by his or her agency. Contracting officers will be held strictly accountable for proper performance under SCAT. This includes actions relating to the acquisition process, as well as business judgments relating to the award of the contract. When SCAT is used, authority, responsibility, and accountability will be centralized in one person—the contracting officer.

Awards. Offers will be selected for award on the basis of the evaluation criteria and in accordance with the best value to the Government concept. In all cases, the contracting officer will be required to certify that the selected offer represents the best value to the Government. Any difference between the selected offer and acceptable but lower-priced offers must be justified in writing by the contracting officer, accompanied by a certification by the program official establishing the Government's need for the technical superiority of the selected firm's proposal. Award will not be delayed pending audits. Pre-award audit will not be performed for SCAT procurements. If the contracting officer determines that an audit is required, it will be performed on a post-award basis. Current statutory requirements for obtaining certified cost and pricing data will continue.

Protest and Debriefings. Offerors will be required to file any protests under SCAT acquisitions with the contracting officer. The contracting officer will attempt to resolve all pre-award protests prior to the contract award, and all post-award protest within 10 days of receipt. If the contracting officer does not resolve protests to the offeror's satisfaction, the offeror will follow the normal bid protest procedures. All offerors requesting debriefings will be given thorough and detailed explanations as to why their offer(s) were not accepted for a SCAT award.●

S. 2009. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue regulations to require that wages and salaries of Federal employees be paid by electronic funds transfer or any other method determined by the Secretary to be in the interest of economy or effectiveness, with sufficient safeguards over the control of, and accounting for, public funds; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

ELECTRONIC FUNDS TRANSFER FEDERAL SALARY ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing, by request, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue regulations to require that wages and salaries of Federal employees be paid by electronic funds transfer. This is one of the management legislation initiatives addressed in the President's July 31, 1985, message to the Congress on management improvement.

The purpose of this bill is to improve operating efficiency, increase productivity, reduce the costs associated with the current methods, and to ensure that Federal salaries and wage payments are delivered to the recipient on time. Currently, it costs Treasury 24 cents for each issued salary and wage check, while the same payment made by electronic funds transfer methods costs 3 cents. It is expected that approximately $10.8 million annually will be saved through enactment of this bill.

According to the Treasury Department, conversion of Federal salary and wage payments to electronic funds transfer methods will eliminate lost, forged, or stolen checks and the attendant costs associated with issuance of new payments. Use of the electronic funds transfer payment method will afford employees an earlier access to their banked payments.

Treasury is aware that some Federal employees have assignments which preclude use of the electronic funds transfer payment method. The Department is also sensitive to the fact that some employees may not have bank accounts. Regulations will be prepared to address these concerns and, through regulations, the Secretary will have sufficient discretion to permit checks to continue to be used for some categories of wage and salary payment and when individual circumstances indicate the best method of payment is a check. In this regard, Treasury will work closely with affected employees and their representatives to ensure that no one is unfairly disadvantaged.

Treasury believes that this legislation will receive the support of the private sector financial community.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the bill and accompanying section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2009

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Electronic Funds Transfer Federal Salary Act".

SAFE, ECONOMICAL, EFFECTIVE PAYROLL ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 2. Section 3332 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) and substituting the following subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) in lieu thereof:

"(a) In this section, "financial organization" means a bank, savings and loan association, a credit union chartered by the United States Government or a State, or a similar institution.

"(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue regulations requiring that, where he determines it to be practicable, wages and salaries of any or all employees of an agency be paid by electronic funds transfer or any other method determined by the Secretary to be in the interest of economy or effectiveness, with sufficient safeguards over the control of, and accounting for, public funds.

"(2) Such regulations shall require covered employees to designate the financial organization to receive payments of their wages and salaries.

"(3) The head of each employing agency shall include in certifications of payments of wages and salaries information required by the Secretary about the financial organization chosen by the agency's employees.

"(4) The Secretary shall not charge financial organizations any fees in connection with payments made in accordance with this section.

"(5) Financial organizations shall not charge agency employees for handling payments made in accordance with this section.

"(6) The Secretary may, upon request by an employee who was employed by the United States Government on the effective date of this section and whose annual rate of basic pay is less than twenty thousand dollars, exempt such employee from the requirements of this section.

"(c) Payment of an amount by the United States by methods authorized pursuant to subsection (b) or (d) of this section, and accepted by a financial organization, shall constitute full acquittance of the United States for that amount.

"(d) On the written request of a person to whom payment of other than wages and salaries is to be made, the payment may be made using any method authorized by the Secretary pursuant to this section.".

SEC. 3. Section 3332 of title 31, United States Code, is further amended by redesignating subsection (f) as subsection (e) and by striking "The" in the first sentence of subsection (e) (as so redesignated) and inserting in lieu thereof "Notwithstanding subsection (b)(1) of this section, the".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. This Act shall become effective on October 1, 1986.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. This section gives the legislation the popular name the "Electronic Funds Transfer Federal Salary Act."

Section 2. Subsection (a) of § 3332, which defines "financial organization," is revised to clarify that "similar institution" is an inclusive term and not restricted to "savings and loan association."

New subsections (b), (c), and (d) of § 3332 are substituted for current provisions (b) through (e). The former subsection (b) authorized the head of an employing agency, upon an officer's or employee's request, to make allotments of pay, on the officer's or employee's behalf, to not more than three financial organizations.

New subsection (b) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue regulations requiring that, where he determines it to be practicable, wages and salaries of any or all agency employees be paid by electronic funds transfer or any other method determined by the Secretary to be economical, effective, and safe. Such employees will be asked to designate financial organizations to receive payments of their wages and salary. Ample authority for allotments of pay is now and would continue to be provided by 5 U.S.C § 5525. See also, 38 U.S.C. 701 et seq. Heads of employing agencies will be obliged to include in their certifications of employees' pay the information necessary to make payments by the method determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. New subsection (b) also retains the affirmative statement added to 31 U.S.C § 3332 by its most recent amendment, section 2814 of Public Law 98-369, that the Government shall not charge financial organizations for their handling of direct deposit payments. Subsection (b)(6) provides that the Secretary may, if a person who is employed by the United States Government on the effective date of this Act and whose annual rate of basic pay is less than twenty thousand dollars so requests, permit that person to be paid by check.

Old subsection (c) which authorized the issuance of composite checks is eliminated. (To the extent that the Secretary of the Treasury determines that composite check payments are economical, effective, and safe, this authority is retained in new subsection (b).) New subsection (c) is analogous to old subsection (d). Both provide a rule of law that the Government is acquitted of its debt to the officer or employee to whom payment is due when the statutorily authorized transfer to the financial institution is made.

New subsection (d) merely restates old subsection (e). The restatement preserves the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to determine the method of any payment when the payee's consent is obtained.

Section 3. Subsection (c) of § 3332 reserves for the Senate and the House their existing authority to issue their own regulations to implement the direct deposit program. The Secretary of the Treasury will issue the regulations for all other agencies to carry out this program.

Section 4. The Act will be effective on October 1, 1986. Additional time, if needed, will be provided for in the regulations that are authorized by the Act.●

By Mr. ROTH (by request):

S. 2010. A bill to eliminate or change statutory requirements preventing the reduction of paperwork burdens and regulatory simplification; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PAPERWORK AND REGULATORY SIMPLIFICATION ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing, by request, the Paperwork and Regulatory Simplification Act of 1985, a bill designed to modify or streamline existing laws regarding information collection and regulation. This bill was submitted to Congress by the administration last year as part of the President's management legislative initatives. (See PM-71, July 31, 1985.)

This bill is intended to eliminate or change a number of statutory provisions requiring executive branch agencies to impose information collections on the public and to issue regulations. The Office of Management and Budget advises that these provisions are now either obsolete or no longer serve useful purposes. This bill is Governmentwide in scope in that statutory provisions administrated by a number of departments and agencies are being processed for change or elimination. The bill represents the administration's first attempt to seek such changes on a Governmentwide basis. According to OMB, the provisions contained in the bill will, if enacted, result in improvement in overall Government efficiency and will eliminate unnecessary burdens on the public. As the administration continues its activities under the Paperwork Reduction Act, it expects to identify statutory requirements that impose unnecesary burdens on the public, and will bring these to the attention of the Congress.

Examples of existing statutory provisions affected by this legislation include a decennial census of drainage, the establishment of a standard barrel of apples, restrictions on for-profit organization receiving Federal grants or contracts, and a requirement that wholesale liquor dealers post a sign outside their business premises.

I request unanimous consent that the bill and accompanying section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(o) Section 1881(b)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395rr(b)(1)) is amended by striking out the last sentence.

(p)(1) Section 1882(b)(1)(A) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ss(b)(1)(A)) is amended by inserting ", except that a policy may provide benefits solely to supplement the benefits provided under part B" before the semicolon.

(2) Section 1882(c)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ss(C)(1)) is amended by inserting ", except that the policy (or policies issued in conjunction with one another) may provide benefits solely to supplement the benefits provided under part A or solely to supplement the benefits provided under part B" before the semicolon.

(q) Section 402(a)(1) of the Social Security Amendments of 1967 (42 U.S.C. 1395b-1(a)(1)) is amended in the first sentence by striking out the word "nonprofit".

(r) Section 1910(c)(2) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1396i(c)(2)) is amended in the first sentence by striking out "a hearing by the Secretary to the same extent as is provided in section 205(b)" and inserting instead "a hearing on the record before an official designated by the Secretary at which the entity is entitled to be represented by counsel".

(t)(1) Section 313 of the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act (42 U.S.C. 5713) is amended in the first sentence by striking out "nonprofit private agency" and inserting instead "private entity".

(2) Section 314 of that Act (42 U.S.C. 5714) is amended in the first sentence and in the caption by striking out "nonprofit private agencies" and inserting instead "private entities".

(u) Section 2001 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1397) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (4),

(2) by striking out the comma at the end of clause (5) and inserting instead "; and", and

(3) by adding after and below clause (5) the following new clause: "(6) alleviating poverty,".

(v)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, upon application under this title by an Indian tribe the Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereafter in this title "the Secretary") shall consolidate the grants made by that Department directly to an Indian tribe under title XX of the Social Security Act, and under the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Act of 1981.

(2) Any consolidated grant for any Indian tribe shall not be less than the sum of the separate grants which that tribe would otherwise be entitled to receive for such fiscal year.

(3) The funds received under a consolidated grant shall be expended for the programs and purposes authorized under any or all of the grants which are being consolidated, in accordance with all conditions and requirements which would be applicable to grants for those programs and purposes in the absence of the consolidation, but each Indian tribe shall determine the proportion of the funds granted to be allocated to each such program and purpose.

(4)(A) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, an Indian tribe shall be entitled (i) to submit a single application for a consolidated grant in accordance with this title for any fiscal year, and (ii) to submit a single pre-expenditure report and a single post-expenditure report with respect to each such consolidated grant received for any fiscal year, in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

(B) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, an Indian tribe which elects to expend none of its consolidated grant funds for any individual program authorized under any one of the grants being consolidated shall not be required, as a condition of receiving a consolidated grant under this title, to comply with the conditions or to make the reports or assurances applicable to that program.

(C) Nothing in this title shall preclude the Secretary from providing adequate procedures for accounting, auditing, evaluating, and reviewing any programs or activities receiving funding under any consolidated grants.

(5) The provisions of this subsection shall be effective with respect to fiscal year 1986 and succeeding fiscal years.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

SEC. 105. (a) Section 5(g)(2) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1334(g)(2)) is repealed.

(b) Section 403(b) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments of 1978 (43 U.S.C. 1843(b)) is repealed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION

SEC. 106. (a) Section 114(a) of title 23, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The construction of any highways or portions of highways located on a Federal-aid system shall be undertaken by the respective State highway departments or under their direct supervision. The construction work and labor in each State shall be performed in accordance with the laws of the State and applicable Federal laws. Except as provided in Section 117 of this title, the Secretary shall establish procedures for the inspection and approval of such construction. The State highway department shall not erect any information signs other than official traffic control devices conforming with standards approved by the Secretary on any project where actual construction is in progress and visible to highway users.".

(b) Section 121(c) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking the words "following inspections".

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

SEC. 107. (a) Sections 6034(a) and (b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6034(a) and (b)) are amended to read as follows:

"(a) General rule. Every trust described in section 4947(a)(2) shall file an annual return, stating specifically the items of gross income, receipts, and disbursements, and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the internal revenue laws as the Secretary may by forms or regulations prescribe, and shall keep such records, render under oath such statements, make such other returns, and comply with such rules and regulations as the Secretary may from time to time prescribe.

"(b) Exception. This section shall not apply to any section 4947(a)(2) trust to which all transfers in trust were made before May 27, 1969, if all of the net income for the taxable year, determined under the applicable principles of the law of trusts, is required to be distributed currently to the beneficiaries.".

(b) Section 6043(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Corporations

"When required by the Secretary, every corporation shall make a return regarding its distributions in liquidation, stating the name and address of, the number and class of shares owned by, and the amount paid to, each shareholder, or, if the distribution is in property other than money, the fair market value (as of the date the distribution is made) of the property distributed to each shareholder.".

(c) Section 5008(c)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5008(c)(1)) is amended by striking the words "withdrawn from bonded premises on payment or determination of tax" and inserting the words "on which tax has been determined or paid".

(d) Section 5175(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5175(c)) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Cancellation or credit of export bonds—

"Upon the exportation of distilled spirits withdrawn without payment of tax, the bonds given under subsection (a) shall be cancelled or credited and the bonds liable under subsection (b) credited. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe regulations governing the requirements of such evidence, records, or certification, indicating exportation as shall be deemed necessary.".

(e) Section 5181(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5181(c)(3)) is amended by revising the second sentence to read:

"For purposes of sections 5212 and 5232 and subsection (e)(2) of this section, the premises of an eligible distilled spirits plant shall be treated as bonded premises.".

(f) Section 5207(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5207(c)) is amended by striking the words "shall be kept on the premises where the operations covered by the record are carried on and".

(g)(1) Section 5222(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5222(b)) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Receipt

"Under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, fermented materials to be used in the production of distilled spirits may be received on the bonded premises of a distilled spirits plant authorized to produce distilled spirits as follows:

"(1) from the premises of a bonded wine cellar authorized to remove such material by section 5362(c)(6);

"(2) conveyed without payment of tax from brewery premises;

"(3) cider exempt from tax under the provisions of section 5042(a)(1).".

(2) Section 5053 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5053 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

(g) Removal for use as distilling material

"Under such conditions and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, beer may be removed from the brewery without payment of tax to any distilled spirits plant for use as distilling material.".

(h) Section 5232(b)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5232(b)(1)) is amended by striking the words "only if of 185 degrees or more of proof".

(i)(1) Section 5115 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5115) is repealed.

(2) Subsections (a) and (c) of section 5681 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5681(a) and (c)) are amended by striking the words "section 5115(a) or".

(j)(1) Section 5044 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5044) is amended by—

(a) striking the word "unmerchantable" in the catchline of such section; and

(b) striking the words "as unmerchantable" and the words "produced in the United States and" in subsection (a).

(2) Section 5361 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5361) is amended by striking the word "unmerchantable".

(k) The Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by adding where appropriate the following new section:

"Sec. 5364. Imported bulk wine

"Wines imported or brought into the United States in bulk containers may, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, be withdrawn from customs custody and transferred in such bulk containers to the premises of a bonded wine cellar without payment of the internal revenue taxes imposed on such wine. The proprietor of the bonded wine cellar to which such wines are transferred shall become liable for the taxes on the wines withdrawn from customs custody under this section upon release of the wines from customs custody, and the importer, or the person bringing such wines into the United States shall thereupon be relieved of the liability for such tax.".

(l) Section 5362(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5362(c)) is amended by—

(1) striking the word "and" at the end of paragraph (8);

(2) striking the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(10) without payment of tax for destruction.".

"(m) Section 5053 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5053) is amended by adding the following:

"(g) Removal of beer to customs bonded warehouses

"Subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, beer may be removed without payment of tax for transfer to any customs bonded warehouse for removal as provided in paragraph (h).

"(h) Removal of beer from customs bonded warehouses for use of foreign embassies, legations, etc.

"(1) In general

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, beer entered into customs bonded warehouses under paragraph (g) may, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, be withdrawn from such warehouses for consumption in the United States by and for the official or family use of such foreign governments, organizations, and individuals who are entitled to withdraw imported beer from such warehouses free of tax. Beer transferred to customs bonded warehouses under paragraph (g) shall be entered, stored, and accounted for in such warehouses under such regulations and bonds as the Secretary may prescribe, and may be withdrawn therefrom by individuals free of tax under the same conditions and procedures as imported beer.

"(2) Withdrawal for domestic use

Beer entered into customs bonded warehouses under paragraph (g) for purposes of removal under paragraph (1) may be withdrawn therefrom for domestic use. Beer so withdrawn shall be treated as American goods exported and returned.

"(3) Sale or unauthorized use prohibited

Beer withdrawn from customs bonded warehouses or otherwise brought into the United States free of tax for the official or family use of foreign governments, organizations, or individuals authorized to obtain beer free of tax shall not be sold and shall not be disposed of or possessed for any use other than an authorized use. The provisions of paragraph (a)(3) of section 5054 are hereby extended and made applicable to any persons selling, disposing of, or possessing any beer in violation of the preceding sentence, and to the beer involved in any such violation.

"(i) Removals for destruction

Beer may be removed from the brewery without payment of tax for destruction, subject to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe.".

(n) Section 5055 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5055) is amended by striking the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"On the exportation of beer, brewed or produced in the United States, the brewer thereof shall be allowed a drawback equal in amount to the tax paid on such beer. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe regulations governing the payment or crediting of drawback on beer eligible for drawback under this section, including the requirements of such notices, bonds, bills of lading, and such other evidence indicating payment of tax and exportation as shall be deemed necessary.".

(o) Section 5056(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5056) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"In determining the amount of tax due on beer removed in any one day, the quantity of beer returned to any brewery of the brewer shall be allowed, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, as an offset against or deduction from the total quantity of beer removed from that brewery on the day of such return.".

(p) The Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by adding where appropriate the following new section:

"Section 5418. Imported Bulk Beer

"Beer imported or brought into the United States in bulk containers may, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, be withdrawn from customs custody and transferred in such bulk containers to the premises of a brewery without payment of the internal revenue taxes imposed on such beer. The proprietor of a brewery to which such beer is transferred shall become liable for the taxes on the beer withdrawn from customs custody under this section upon release of the beer from customs custody, and the importer, or the person bringing such beer into the United States shall thereupon be relieved of the liability for such tax.".

(q) Section 5401(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 5401(b)) is amended deleting the third and fourth sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Whenever required to do so by the Secretary, the brewer shall execute a new bond or continuation certificate, in the penal sum prescribed in pursuance of this section, and conditioned as above provided, which bond or continuation certificate shall be in lieu of any former bond or bonds, or former continuation certificate or certificates, of such brewer in respect to all liabilities accruing after its approval.".

(r) Section 5146 of the Revised Statutes (12 U.S.C. 72) is amended by deleting the first sentence and inserting instead the following:

"Every director must, during his whole term of service, be a citizen of the United States, and a majority of the directors must, throughout their terms, reside in the State, Territory, or District in which the association is located, or within one hundred miles of the location of the main office of the association, except that in the case of an association which is a subsidiary or affiliate of a foreign bank, the Comptroller of the Currency may, in his discretion, waive the requirement of citizenship in the case of not more than a minority of the total number of directors.".

(s) The Act of May 1, 1886 (12 U.S.C. 30, 31 and 32) is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2(a) of such Act (12 U.S.C. 30(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "All debts, liabilities, rights, provisions, and powers of the association under its old name shall devolve upon and inure to the association under its new name.".

(2) Section 2 of such Act (12 U.S.C. 30) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Nothing in this section shall release any association under its old name or at its old location from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which such association is or may become a party or interested.".

(3) Sections 3 and 4 of Act (12 U.S.C. 31 and 32) are repealed.

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 108. Section 207(c)(1) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 488 (c)(1)), is amended to read as follows: "(1) real property if the estimated appraised fair market value is less than $1,000,000; or"

INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

SEC. 109. Headnote 3 to Subpart A of part 8 of schedule 7 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is repealed.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

SEC. 110. Section 15(c) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1874(c)), is amended to read as follows:

"(c) No part of any funds appropriated or otherwise made available for expenditure by the Foundation under authority of this Act shall be used to make payments under any scholarship or fellowship awarded to any individual under section 10, unless such individual has provided the Foundation (in the case of applications made on or after October 1, 1962) with a full statement regarding any crimes of which he has ever been convicted (other than crimes committed before attaining sixteen years of age and minor traffic violations for which a fine of $100 or less was imposed) and regarding any criminal charges punishable by confinement of thirty days or more which may be pending against him at the time of his application for such scholarship of fellowship."

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED BILL TO ELIMINATE OR CHANGE STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS PREVENTING THE REDUCTION OF PAPERWORK BURDENS AND REGULATORY SIMPLIFICATION

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Sec. 101. (a) Repeals the requirement for decennial census of drainage. The data were originally collected in the 1920's. Many drainage districts no longer exist. The Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service has administrative data that are as good, or better, than the data that can be gathered through a survey program.

(b) Repeals sections 1, 4 and 6 of the Act of August 3, 1912, relating to the standard barrel for apples. These sections are obsolete and no longer used. The packaging terms of the item covered by these sections are today covered by the weights and measures laws that have been enacted by the legislature of each State.

(c) Repeals sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Act of March 4, 1915, relating to the standard barrel for fruits, vegetables and other dry commodities. These sections are obsolete and no longer used. The packaging in modern day terms of the items covered by this statute is today covered by the weights and measures laws that have been enacted by the legislature of each State.

(d) Repeals sections 1 through 6 of the Act of August 23, 1916 relating to the standard large and small barrels for lime. These sections are obsolete and no longer used. The packaging in modern day terms of the items covered by this statute is today covered by the weights and measure laws that have been enacted by the legislature of each State.

(e) Repeals a condition required when disposing Federal property overseas. Such sales must contain conditions prohibiting importation of the property into the United States unless the Secretary of Agriculture or Commerce determines that the importation would relieve U.S. shortages or be beneficial to the U.S. economy. The number of applications to Agriculture and Commerce under this provision have been small and since 1980 less than $100 million worth of property has been denied import authorization. This repeal would eliminate unnecessary regulatory and paperwork burdens on businesses dealing in surplus merchandise.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Sec. 102. (a) Repeals the requirement for data collection on the financing of elementary and secondary education and the periodic publishing of profiles showing the degree to which States have achieved equalization of resources for elementary and secondary education among their school districts and among themselves. There is no consensus within the education finance community as to what definitions and measures should be used to determine disparities in expenditures and disparities from wealth neutrality, as the law requires. Until these issues are resolved, meaningful data collection and reporting are not possible.

(b) Repeals the Secretary of Education's review authority, and related responsibilities including functions of the Federal Data Acquisition Council, covering data collection activities which are education-related. Enactment of the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980 established a central review and approval mechanism, within the Office of Management and Budget, for all federally-imposed paperwork, including education-related data collections. The reviews conducted by Education under this authority duplicate the OMB review process and often lead to unnecessary delay. This would only affect Department of Education involvement in education-related activities of other departments and agencies since Education would still have responsibilities under the Paperwork Reduction Act to review and coordinate its own data collection activities.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Sec. 103. (a) Authorizes the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) to reduce unnecessary or burdensome regulatory requirements with respect to hydroelectric power projects having an installed capacity of 15 megawatts or less. This expands upon current FERC authority to waive licensing requirements of the Federal Power Act for (1) hydroelectric projects of 5 megawatts installed capacity or less at existing dams or impoundments; and (2) hydroelectric projects of 15 megawatts or less of installed capacity in water conduits on non-Federal lands that are used for irrigation and industrial purposes.

(b) Eliminates the requirement to gather information quarterly on domestic reserves and production; imports; and inventories of crude oil, residual fuel oil, refined petroleum products, natural gas, and coal; and report on energy company finances. The Department is able to collect this information when necessary pursuant to other authority. Reporting of information on a quarterly basis is needlessly detailed and excessively burdensome.

(c) Eliminates a required system for tracking and reporting every transaction, sale, exchange or shipment involving exports of coal or oil. Continuation of the requirement is unjustifiable because sufficiently detailed data on the export of oil and coal currently are collected by the Department of Commerce and made available to the Energy Information Administration.

(d) Eliminates the requirement to collect detailed information on cost of service provided by electric utilities to various consuming classes.

(e) Eliminates the requirements to perform biennial and quadrennial reviews of practices of electric utilities under automatic adjustment clauses.

(f) Eliminates the requirement for annual reports by officers of electric utilities regarding their holding of directorships in related corporations. Interlocking directorships are separately regulated by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission so this additional reporting serves no useful purpose.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Sec. 104. (a) Repeals provisions barring for-profit organizations from receiving technical assistance and demonstration and service grants under the Child Abuse and Prevention and Treatment Act and the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act. The amendments would allow the Department to select the best qualified service providers irrespective of the for-profit or nonprofit status of applicants.

(b) Allows for-profit organizations to be eligible for Child Welfare Services grants. This change will promote wider competition, especially for operational programs for which effective methods are fairly well known.

(c) Repeals provisions of the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act barring for-profit organizations from submitting grant applications on a competitive basis with other, nonprofit organizations.

(d) Eliminates mandatory certification by the Food and Drug Administration of each batch of antibiotics upon demand by a manufacturer. Modern manufacturing practices make this requirement unnecessary.

(e) Repeals the prohibition on shipment in interstate commerce of any milk, cream, or skimmed milk which has any added fat or oil, other than milk fat. This statute was declared unconstitutional in 1972 and is no longer enforceable.

(f) Eliminates a reporting requirement to collect analytic data from medical schools with regard to health professions.

(g) Allows for-profit organizations to be eligible for health statistics and health services research grants. This change will promote wider competition, especially for operational programs for which effective methods are fairly well known.

(h) Replaces the requirement that States conduct an annual independent audit of their Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant expenditures with a requirement for an audit not less than once every two State fiscal years.

(i) Eliminates the present requirement that the Secretary determines the form and content of State prepared annual reports for the Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant Program.

(j) Eliminates the present requirement that the Secretary determines the form and content of State prepared annual reports for the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Service Block Grant Program.

(k) Allows for-profit organizations to receive financial assistance from States to provide, plan, or coordinate services under the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Services and Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grants on a competitive basis with other nonprofit organizations.

(l) Allows for-profit organizations to submit grant applications for veneral disease research, training and health prevention programs and adolescent family life grants on a competitive basis with nonprofit organizations.

(m) Eliminates the capital planning requirement under Medicare for hospitals, nursing homes, and home health agencies. The change would decrease the administrative burden and the costs of facility operations.

(n) Eliminates a Medicare requirement that health maintenance organization (HMO) cost reports be independently certified. HMOs are the only providers now burdened with this requirement, the cost of which is reimbursed by the Federal government.

(o) Eliminates the minimum utilization rate requirement for facilities furnishing end stage renal disease services under Medicare. Repeal of this section would eliminate some excessive travel for treatment.

(p) Allows States to retain Medigap certification if they allow marketing of Medicare Part A only and Medicare Part B only policies. The change would provide the senior citizen with the choice of the most suitable type of Medicare supplemental insurance, while affording increased regulatory protection.

(q) Repeals exclusion of for-profit organizations in the area of health programs established under the Social Security Act.

(r) Modifies the type of hearing required before the Secretary and cancel a provider's participation in Medicaid. In place of a formal hearing before an administrative law judge the provider would be entitled to an opportunity for an informal hearing on the record.

(s) Allows for-profit organizations to be eligible for grants and contracts under the Native Americans Programs. Increasingly, for-profit organizations combine good business practices with capable services to various groups.

(t) Allows for-profit organizations to be eligible for grants and contracts under the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act. This change will promote wider competition, especially for operational programs for which effective methods are fairly well known.

(u) Amends the Social Services Block Grant Program to include the alleviation of poverty. The proposal would permit greater coordination of social and community services at State and local levels.

(v) Amends the Social Services Block Grant Program to permit Indian tribes to consolidate non-health block grant funds of the Department of Health and Human Services. This amendment is patterned after a similar authority now available to the U.S. territories which has reduced administrative costs and allowed improved targeting of services.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Sec. 105. (a) Eliminates the requirement that the Department enforce maximum rates of oil and gas production on the outer continental shelf. Companies, rather than the Federal Government, would determine the most economic rates of production except insofar as production is required to ensure conservation of the resource.

(b) Eliminates the requirement that all offshore oil and gas equipment be marked with identification. Frequently, these markings have not been used to verify ownership when damage has occurred because of the difficulty in reaching the equipment often located in deep waters well below the surface.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION

Sec. 106 (a) and (b). Requires the Secretary to establish procedures for inspecting and approving construction but would not require a Federal inspection of each project. Title 23 U.S.C. now requires that the Secretary inspect each highway construction project. These amendments would thereby eliminate an unnecessary requirement. Current law also provides that informational signs erected on any project where actual construction is in progress and visible to highway users must conform with standards developed by the Secretary. These amendments would permit the Secretary to approve standards developed by other parties as well as those developed by the Department of Transportation.

Sec. 107. (a) Allows section 4947(a) trusts to file single information returns.

(b) Eliminates the requirement that corporations must file an information return within 30 days after adopting a plan of dissolution or liquidation. The plan of dissolution or liquidation still would be required to be maintained. Taxpayers would be relieved of filing a form with no useful tax administration purpose.

(c) Permits processing of Puerto Rican spirits at a U.S. distilled spirits plant. Refund, credit or abatement of tax for spirits returned to a distilled spirits plant is currently restricted to those spirits which have been withdrawn from a domestic distilled spirits plant. Because of this, spirits brought into the U.S. from Puerto Rico must be returned to customs custody or to Puerto Rico for destruction, denaturation, redistillation, reconditioning or rebottling.

(d) Gives the Secretary authority to prescribe regulations concerning proof of exportation as may be deemed necessary. Under such authority, regulations allowing the retention at the exporter's place of business, of evidence of exportation, could be prescribed.

(e) Permits small alcohol fuel plants to receive spirits withdrawn from customs custody. Medium and large alcohol fuel plants are currently authorized to receive spirits withdrawn from customs custody, but small plants cannot do so since they have no bonded premises.

(f) Eliminates the requirement that accounting records be maintained on the premises of distilled spirits plants. Such plants equipped with automatic data processing equipment frequently locate their accounting offices in places other than the plant premises. This change would end the necessity of maintaining two sets of records.

(g) Permits transfer of distilling material for the production of distilled spirits to noncontiguous breweries.

(h) Removes the limit on redistillation and denaturation of imports to spirits of 185 degrees proof or more.

(i) Removes the requirements for a sign outside business premises of a lawful wholesale liquor dealer. The requirement is obsolete and unnecessary.

(j) Removes the restriction that wine be both unmerchantable and produced in the United States for return to bond. Bonded winery proprietors would be allowed to return wine to bond for any reason.

(k) Allows bulk imported wine to be brought from customs custody without payment of tax to a bonded wine cellar. Technological advances in the shipping of wine in pressurized containers now make it possible to ship wines in bulk rather than bottled and cased. This section would facilitate the movement of such bulk imported wine through Customs port facilities directly to bonded wine cellars for storage and subsequent bottling, labeling and removal.

(m) Allows domestically produced beer to be removed from a brewery, without payment of tax, for storage pending removal by personnel of foreign government or international organizations. This extends the same treatment to domestically produced beer as currently exists for domestically produced spirits and wine and imported distilled spirits, wine and beer. Also provides statutory authority to allow by regulation the removal of beer from a brewery without payment of tax for the purpose of destruction. This change would allow destruction at sanitary landfills or other convenient locations. Currently, many brewers are experiencing environmental problems with the disposal of large quantities of waste beer at breweries.

(n) Gives the Secretary the authority to credit drawback of tax on beer and the discretion to require or not to require the submission of notices, bonds, bills of lading and other evidence indicating payment of tax and exportation. Under such authority, regulations allowing the retention at the brewery premises of evidence of tax payment and exportation may be prescribed.

(o) Eliminates the requirement that beer must be returned to the same brewery from which it was removed to permit a tax offset without the filing and payment of a claim. This would eliminate the filing and payment of claims by a brewer for beer returned to another brewery.

(p) Permits bulk importation of beer for bottling in the United States. Technological advances in the shipping of beer in pressurized containers now makes it possible to ship the beer in bulk rather than in bottles, cans or barrels. This section would facilitate the movement of bulk imported beer through customs port facilities directly to breweries for storage and subsequent bottling, labeling and removal.

(q) Eliminates the requirement for four year bond renewal by brewers and gives the Secretary discretion as to when a new bond shall be required.

(r) Eliminates entirely the current prior residency rule for national bank directors and reduces from two-thirds to a majority the number of directors that must comply with the residency requirement during tenure in office. The primary purpose of the residency requirement is to assure management familiarity with local capacities and credit needs. By reducing to a majority the number of resident directors, the amendment would maintain a balance between local knowledge and participation and the widest possible range for selection of qualified directors.

(s) Combines three related statutory requirements applying to national banks for clarity. These deal with change of name or location, related rights and liabilities and suits.

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 108. Changes the threshold for required antitrust advice form the Attorney General on government disposal of real property from $1 million acquisition cost to $1 million fair market value of the property. Acquisition cost has little bearing on current value of property.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

Sec. 109. Repeals the requirement that the President annually determine if substantial changes in the consumption of wiskbrooms and other brooms made from broom corn has substantially changed from the previous year and if so he must change the permissible quantity of such imports. This requirement serves as the basis for Executive Order No. 11377 which requires the International Trade Commission to collect annual data on broom consumption. This requirement is now obsolete because this industry is now very minor and the surveys are primarily used for marketing purposes by the broom industry.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Sec. 110. Eliminates (1) the requirement that each applicant for a National Science Foundation fellowship or scholarship submit a signed loyalty oath or affirmation, and (2) an obsolete provision relating to organizations registered under the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950. This provision also raises to $100 the exemption threshold below which minor traffic violations are not required to be included in a statement of crimes for which an applicant has been convicted.●

S. 2011. A bill entitled the "Drug Enforcement Administration Excepted Service Act of 1986"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION EXCEPTED SERVICE ACT OF 1986

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing, by request of the administration, a bill which would place all Drug Enforcement Administration personnel into excepted service status. This bill involves a serious and growing problem: drug trafficking. Therefore, although I am not prepared at this time to announce my support for this legislation, I believe it deserves serious consideration by the Senate, and it should be referred to the appropriate committee.

The impetus for this bill is the decision by the Attorney General to give the DEA and the Federal Bureau of Investigation concurrent jurisdiction in the area of narcotics trafficking. Having chaired a number of hearings on drug trafficking and abuse for the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, I believe that no stone should go unturned in the fight against illicit drugs. If subsequent hearings indicate that passage and implementation of this bill would assist law enforcement authorities in this fight, I am certain that many Senators would support it.

The bill, entitled the "Drug Enforcement Administration Excepted Service Act of 1986," would, by placing all DEA personnel into the excepted service, allow the reassignment of employees between the DEA and the FBI, which would facilitate cooperation between these two agencies. Current civil service rules prohibit the reassignment of an employee in the excepted service to a position in the competitive service, except for a short-term detail. Since the FBI already has all of its personnel in the excepted service, this bill would make the DEA and FBI personnel systems compatible and would allow these reassignments.

This legislation may also enable DEA to improve and expedite its recruitment of new personnel. In addition, it would extend the "whistle blower" provisions of the Civil Service Reform Act to DEA employees and protect them from any prohibited personnel practices as a result of any covered complaint which they might file.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being on objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2011

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Drug Enforcement Administration Excepted Service Act of 1986."

SEC. 2. Title II of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, (Public Law 91-513) is amended by adding the following new section:

"EXCEPTED SERVICE

SEC. 710. All positions in the Drug Enforcement Administration are excepted from the competitive service, and the incumbents of such positions occupy positions in the excepted service."

SEC. 3. Section 2303 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"PROHIBITED PERSONNEL PRACTICES IN THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION AND THE DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION

"(a) Any employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Drug Enforcement Administration who has authority to take, direct others to take, recommend, or approve any personnel action shall not, with respect to such authority, take or fail to take a personnel action with respect to any employee of the Bureau or the Administration as a reprisal for the disclosure of information by the employee to the Attorney General (or an employee designated by the Attorney General for such purpose) which the employee or applicant reasonably believes evidences—

"(1) a violation of any law, rule, or regulation, or

"(2) mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or a substantial and specific danger to public health or safety.

"For the purpose of this subsection 'personnel action' means any action described in clauses (i) through (x) of section 2302(a)(2)(A) of this title with respect to an employee in, or applicant for, a position in the Bureau or the Administration (other than a position of a confidential, policy-determining, policy-making, or policy-advocating character).

"(b) The Attorney General shall prescribe regulations to ensure that such a personnel action shall not be taken against an employee of the Bureau or the Administration as a reprisal for any disclosure of information described in subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) The President shall provide for the enforcement of this section in a manner consistent with the provisions of section 1206 of this title."

CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 4. Section 2302(a)(2)(C)(ii) of Title 5, United States Code is amended by inserting "the Drug Enforcement Administration," immediately after "the Federal Bureau of Investigation,"

SEC. 5. Section 4701(a)(1)(B) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting "the Drug Enforcement Administration," immediately after "the Federal Bureau of Investigation,"

SEC. 6. Section 7103 of title 5, United States Code is amended

(a) by deleting "or" at the end of (F) in paragraph (3) of subsection (a);

(b) by inserting "or" immediately after the semi-colon in (G) of paragraph (3) of subsection (a); and

(c) by adding after (G) in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) the following:

"(H) the Drug Enforcement Administration."

SEC. 7. Section 3132(a)(2)(E)(iii) of Title 5, United States Code, is amended to read "any position in the Drug Enforcement Administration;"

SEC. 8. Section 4701(b) of title 5, United States Code, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. Section 201 of Public Law 94-503 is hereby repealed.●

S. 2014. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to strengthen the protections available to Federal employees against prohibited personnel practices, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am introducing today, along with Senators GRASSLEY, PRYOR, GORE, SARBANES, and BURDICK, the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1986. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Congresswoman SCHROEDER and Congressman HORTON.

This act is urgently needed to restore the faith of conscientious Federal employees in the fairness and integrity of our Federal service. It will do so by strengthening the statutory protections for Federal whistleblowers—those in the Government who "blow-the-whistle" on mismanagement, fraud, and abuse, and are sometimes subjected to reprisal for doing so. It is outrageous that Federal employees should have to risk their financial security and professional careers in order to do that which is right and which we in Congress encourage them to do—blowing the whistle on fraud and mismanagement. Our system should not only protect this kind of activity but reward it. All too frequently, our system does neither. All too frequently, whistleblowers have to struggle through skepticism, hostility, and even harassment to get their message heard, and in the process may even be driven out of the very Government they are trying to improve.

It is alarming but true that the number of people in the Federal Government who feel they can safely come forward with allegations of waste or mismanagement is declining. According to a study by the Merit Systems Protection Board, in 1980, 20 percent of employees who perceived agency problems did not report them because of fear of reprisal. In 1983, that figure was 37 percent. The number of Federal employees who think that blowing the whistle will result in any positive action is also declining. In 1980, 53 percent of the potential whistleblowers didn't act because they didn't think anything would be done. In 1983, it was 61 percent.

These statistics should be a matter of grave concern not only because reprisals against whistleblowers are illegal, unfair, and unethical, but also because such reprisals directly counter our ongoing efforts to reduce unnecessary Government spending. It doesn't make sense to struggle with deficit reduction with one hand, while on the other hand ignoring or discouraging—or sometimes even punishing—those individuals who are trying to help us cut wasteful spending. The bill we are introducing today will go a long way toward rectifying this situation.

Congress recognized its responsibility to whistleblowers in 1978 by passing the Civil Service Reform Act [CSRA], the most comprehensive reform of the Federal work force since the establishment of the Civil Service Commission in 1883. Among other things, CSRA created the Merit Systems Protection Board [MSPB] to handle hearings and appeals involving Federal employees. The Special Counsel of the MSPB was established to investigate prohibited personnel practices and other activities prohibited by civil service law, and to protect Federal employees from reprisals for disclosures of problems within an agency or for the exercise of appeal rights. The Office of Special Counsel [OSC] was also established to serve as a conduit for reviewing and referring to agencies allegations of waste, fraud, and abuse.

The OSC got off to a shaky start in 1978 for a number of reasons, including funding and administrative problems, the unaggressive attitude of some of the Special Counsels, and frequent staff turnover, including the position of Special Counsel itself. For several years, there were extremely lengthy delays in responding to and processing Federal employees' complaints.

Since 1982, the position of Special Counsel has been held by William O'Connor, who has resolved some of the most serious administrative problems, in particular the inordinate delays in the processing of Federal employees' cases. But the serious substantive problems remain. The OSC is still far from fulfilling its role of protecting Federal employees from prohibited personnel practices. Many Federal employees, and whistleblowers in particular, feel they were better off before Congress' well-intentioned reform of 1978. Prior to CSRA, Federal employees could go to Federal court and sue the perpetrator of any alleged reprisal for damages based on constitutional tort action. After CSRA, the courts ruled that Congress' intent was for the OSC to be the sole avenue of relief for employees alleging prohibited personnel practices. As a result, many civil servants feel their right to individually bring a constitutional tort action in Federal court, which private citizens enjoy, was exchanged for their assignment to an unresponsive or ineffectual advocate in the OSC, which can bring cases only before an administrative body, the MSPB.

Under the current law, the procedures governing the OSC are as follows:

Current Federal employees or applicants for Federal employment who allege they are the victims of a prohibited personnel practices can come to the OSC for assistance. For a number of personnel actions, there is no judicial remedy, and the OSC is the only administrative remedy available. The OSC investigates the employee's claim to the extent necessary to determine whether there are reasonable grounds to believe a prohibited personnel practice has indeed occurred.

If the OSC terminates or does not pursue an employee's claim, the OSC must let the employee know in writing.

If the OSC accepts an employee's case, the OSC can seek a stay of any personnel action taken against the employee. The OSC can initially seek a stay from a member of the MSPB for 15 days, and must then seek subsequent stays if necessary.

If the OSC determines corrective action is necessary to restore a complainant to his previous position, the OSC may request the MSPB to consider the matter. After hearing the case, the MSPB may order whatever corrective action it considers appropriate. The OSC cannot appeal a MSPB decision.

In addition, if the OSC determines disciplinary action should be taken against an employee who has engaged in a prohibited personnel practice, the OSC shall bring an action before the MSPB against that employee. An employee who is the subject of such an action can appeal a MSPB decision.

The OSC can also investigate Hatch Act violations, and bring any necessary corrective or disciplinary actions before the MSPB to correct those violations. In addition, the OSC can investigate prohibited personnel practices on its own initiative, without an allegation by an individual Federal employee.

Federal employees or applicants for employment can also come to the OSC in order to make a "disclosure" of information which the employee believes shows a violation of law, gross waste of funds, abuse of authority, or a danger to public health or safety. The OSC does not have the power to investigate such allegations of agency problems, but must review them and refer them to the agency for investigation.

For those disclosures which the OSC determines to have a substantial likelihood that there is a significant agency problem, the OSC can require a report on the disclosure, signed by the agency head, within 60 days.

For other disclosures, which the OSC determines do not have a substantial likelihood of showing a significant problem, the OSC still refers the disclosure to the agency but requires a less formal report without any set time limit.

In fiscal year 1984, the OSC received 1,383 complaints alleging prohibited personnel practices. According to the General Accounting Office, only about 8 percent of these allegations survived an initial screening process and were given an in-depth investigation. For alleged whistleblower reprisal cases, the statistics are even more startling—99 pecent of these cases were closed by the office without initiating disciplinary or corrective action.

A recent GAO report on the OSC cites three reasons for the low level of response to the some 11,000 complaints to the OSC since 1979:

First, the limited role assumed by the OSC. The current Special Counsel stresses protection of the merit system itself rather than protection of individual Federal employees.

Second, difficulties of proof of retaliation against whistleblowers.

Third, few complaints have sufficient merit.

The first point is an important one. Mr. O'Connor sees his role as protecting the merit system rather than individual employees, and believes that goal can best be achieved through pursuing disciplinary action against employers guilty of prohibited practices, rather than corrective action for employees who might be victims of those practices. Mr. O'Connor has said several times that he is not in office to protect federal employees. His client is the system, he says, and it should be protected by prosecuting those who break its rules.

This distinction between protecting the system versus protecting individuals would be just an argument over semantics, except that it has had the very concrete result of really limiting the kind of help whistleblowers can get. Mr. O'Connor's emphasis on protecting the system through disciplinary measures does not necessarily benefit the human beings who comprise that system. The GAO pointed out: "Few of these complainants (whistleblowers) will ever receive the relief they seek through the Office of Special Counsel, particularly as the Special Counsel does not emphasize the pursuit of corrective action on behalf of aggrieved whistleblowers. During the 2 years prior to August 1984, the Special Counsel obtained redress for a total of but three whistleblowers—redress in the form of cancelled transfers."

GAO points out that the OSC won several disciplinary action cases before the MSPB, and was able to work out four other disciplinary action settlements with agencies. While whistleblowers might feel disciplinary action is warranted against an employer who took reprisals, such action is hardly helpful if the whistleblower himself is still out in the cold and no one is willing to help him receive corrective action.

There shouldn't be a conflict between protecting the merit system and protecting individuals in it. Surely helping victims obtain corrective action against reprisals serves merit system principles.

Mr. O'Connor's predisposition against assisting individual Federal employees is regrettably evident in other areas of his record. In a 1985 hearing, he said that in his experience most whistleblowers are "malcontents." This is hardly the attitude I would like to see in the director of the office that is supposed to be defending these people's rights.

In addition, the OSC maintains unnecessarily stringent requirements for accepting a case. GAO reports that Mr. O'Connor has said he will only accept cases in which he feels there is an 75-80 percent chance of winning. This 75-80 percent standard can be a rather difficult requirement to meet for an individual battling an agency. But apparently the OSC's standard are now even higher. The OSC's most recent annual report noted that the office will not file complaints "unless there is virtual certainty that the evidence provides sufficient facts to ensure success * * *."

It is no wonder that so few cases are pursued by the OSC if the whistleblower has to prove to the OSC that there is a "virtual certainty" of winning. That's an unreasonable requirement. It means the hardest part for a whistleblower is likely to be not winning the case before the MSPB, but proving to the OSC that the case is just worth looking into in the first place.

The second point cited by GAO—the difficulty of proving retaliation—is also a valid concern. A careful employer can make it very difficult to prove that an action taken against an employee was because of their whistleblowing.

It may also be true, as the GAO says, that many allegations of prohibited personnel practices are without merit or without adequate evidence. But is it true for 92 percent—92 percent of all allegations do not have enough merit to warrant even a detailed investigation?

GAO acknowledges that the vast majority of complainants are disappointed with OSC's actions or lack thereof. Another matter about which I am concerned is that OSC frequently provides minimally acceptable explanations to complainants of why their cases were not accepted. OSC is required by law to provide some explanation, but that explanation can be one sentence long, for example stating that the OSC believes that action taken against the complainant was carried out for "legitimate management reasons." Such an explanation is not very helpful to a complainant who needs to know why his or her case is not being pursued.

Beyond these facts, the most pressing need to improve the OSC is reflected in the statistics I cited earlier showing that fewer and fewer Federal employees believe it is worthwhile coming forward with reports of waste or abuse. Even more damning is that fact that the Special Counsel himself, Mr. O'Connor, does not believe the system works. In a July 17, 1984, Washington Post article, Mr. O'Connor was reported to say that if he were an attorney advising whistleblowers: "I'd say that unelss you're in a position to retire or are independently wealthy, don't do it. Don't put your head up, because it will get blown off."

This is not what we want. We do not want whistleblowers to fear coming forward. We want to encourage them, and must do so by assuring them we'll do our best to protect them against reprisals.

The bill we are introducing today makes three significant improvements to current law. It clarifies that the purpose of the OSC is to protect employees, especially whistleblowers. It should be made clear in statutory language that Congress believes whistleblowers deserve to have an advocate. It is to be hoped this change will settle the continuing argument over this office's mission.

The bill also gives individuals an alternative to going to the OSC. Under this bill, individuals could take their case directly to the MSPB, and if they lost there, they could go to court. Federal employees alleging prohibited personnel practices should have another option besides the OSC, in light of the OSC's negative attitude toward such employees.

In addition, this bill changes the standard of proof for whistleblower reprisal cases before the MSPB from "preponderance" of evidence to "substantial" evidence. This is needed to make it more feasible to bring cases with merit. Agencies would still have the inherent advantage with the weight of the system on their side, the resources, and the witnesses who are often reluctant to testify against the agency. Even with this change in law, it would remain relatively easy to cover up retaliation against employees, and it would remain difficult to show a causal connection between an adverse personnel action, and whistleblowing. But, by changing the standard of proof, we would at least give whistleblowers a better shot at proving their case.

The bill does the following:

Establishes that for proving a case of reprisal taken against a whistleblower, there shall be a more realistic standard of "substantial evidence," rather than the current standard of preponderance of evidence.

Clarifies the purpose of the OSC. The bill establishes that: "(A) the primary role of the Office of Special Counsel is to protect employees, especially whistleblowers; and (B) while disciplining those who commit prohibited personnel practices may be used as a tool to help accomplish this goal, the protection of individuals is the priority." The bill also requires the OSC to establish a lawyer-client relationship with employees who claim to have been subject to prohibited personnel practices.

Provides that Federal employees could take their own cases to the MSPB instead of or in addition to taking it to OSC. If they win, the MSPB must order the agency to pay reasonable attorney's fees and other costs.

Strengthens the current stay procedures. Under the bill, if the OSC believed a prohibited personnel practice had been taken against an employee, the OSC could request the MSPB to order a stay of that personnel action for 60 days. If OSC filed a petition for corrective action from the MSPB, the stay would automatically continue until the MSPB resolved the case. Under current law, the OSC can request an initial stay of only 15 days, and then must seek subsequent extensions if necessary.

Provides that Federal employees could also request the MSPB for a stay of a personnel action taken against them. The MSPB would order the stay if it determined that there was a substantial likelihood the employee would win his or her case.

Gives the OSC the power to take its cases to court if it loses before the MSPB.

Allows Federal employees to go to court if they lose before the MSPB. The court may award reasonable attorney's fees and other costs.

Requires that a letter of termination to a complaining employee about his or her case include the findings of facts ascertained during the investigation.

Expands the definition of prohibited personnel practice to include taking reprisal against an employee who assists someone else who claims to be the victim of a prohibited personnel practice, who cooperates with an agency's inspector general or the OSC, or who fails to follow orders to disobey a law.

Broadens the power of the MSPB to sanction presidential appointees, military officers, and contractor officials.

Officially separates the OSC from the Merit Systems Protection Board. In early years, there were a number of concerns about the close relationship between these two offices. The administrative functions of the two were separated in 1984. This bill would just complete that process.

Requires affirmative congressional action to continue the OSC beyond September 30, 1989, and the MSPB beyond 1991.

Authorizes $5 million for the OSC, and $20 million for the MSPB (which are roughly the current figures).

The current system of relief for victims of prohibited personnel practices is not working fairly. If we want to be fair to Federal workers, encourage them to blow the whistle on waste and fraud, and save taxpayers money, we must make the OSC more responsive and more effective. To achieve this, I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill appear immediately following the remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2014

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of representatives of the United states of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Whistleblower Protection Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) Federal employees who make disclosures described in section 2302(b)(8) of title 5, United States Code, serve the public interest by bringing about reductions in Government expenditures, fraud, waste, and abuse;

(2) protecting employees who disclose Government illegality, waste and corruption is a major step toward a more effective civil service; and

(3) in passing the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, Congress established the Office of Special Counsel to provide whistleblowers (those individuals who make disclosures described in such section 2302(b)(8)) protection from reprisal.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purpose of this Act is to strengthen and improve protection for the rights of Federal employees, to prevent reprisals, and to help eliminate wrongdoing within the Government by—

(1) mandating that victims of prohibited personnel practices, expecially whistleblowers, should be restored to their previous positions;

(2) establishing that—

(A) the primary role of the Office of Special Counsel is to protect employees, especially whistleblowers; and

(B) while disciplining those who commit prohibited personnel practices may be used as a tool to help accomplish this goal, the protection of individuals is the priority; and

(3) providing that the Office of Special Counsel establish a lawyer-client relationship with employees who claim to have been subject to prohibited personnel practices.

SEC. 3. MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD; SPECIAL COUNSEL; EMPLOYEE RIGHT OF ACTION.

(a) Chapter 12 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 12—MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD, SPECIAL COUNSEL, AND EMPLOYEE RIGHT OF ACTION

"Subchapter I—Merit Systems Protection Board

"§ 1201. Appointment of members of the Merit Systems Protection Board

"The Merit Systems Protection Board is composed of 3 members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than 2 of whom may be adherents of the same political party. The Chairman and members of the Board shall be individuals who, by demonstrated ability, background, training, or experience are especially qualified to carry out the functions of the Board. No member of the Board may hold another office or position in the Government of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law or at the direction of the President. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed. The Board shall have its principal office in the District of Columbia and may have field offices in other appropriate locations.

"§ 1202. Term of office; filling vacancies; removal

"(a) The term of office of each member of the Merit Systems Protection Board is 7 years.

"(b) A member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the end of a term of office of his predecessor serves for the remainder of that term. Any appointment to fill a vacancy is subject to the requirements of section 1201 of this title.

"(c) Any member appointed for a 7-year term may not be reappointed to any following term but may continue to serve beyond the expiration of the term until a successor is appointed and has qualified, except that such member may not continue to serve for more than 1 year after the date on which the term of the member would otherwise expire under this section.

"(d) Any member may be removed by the President only for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

"§ 1203. Chairman; Vice Chairman

"(a) The President shall from time to time, appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of the members of the Merit Systems Protection Board as the Chairman of the Board. The Chairman is the chief executive and administrative officer of the Board.

"(b) The President shall from time to time designate one of the members of the Board as Vice Chairman of the Board. During the absence or disability of the Chairman, or when the office of Chairman is vacant, the Vice Chairman shall perform the functions vested in the Chairman.

"(c) During the absence or disability of both the Chairman and Vice Chairman, or when the offices of Chairman and Vice Chairman are vacant, the remaining Board member shall perform the functions vested in the Chairman.

"§ 1204. Powers and functions of the Merit Systems Protection Board

"(a) The Merit Systems Protection Board shall—

"(1) hear or adjudicate, or provide for the hearing or adjudication, of all matters within the jurisdiction of the Board under this title, section 2023 of title 38, or any other law, rule, or regulation, and, subject to otherwise applicable provisions of law, take final action on any such matter;

(2) order any Federal agency or employee to comply with any order or decision issued by the Board under the authority granted under paragraph (1) of this subsection and enforce compliance with any such order;

"(3) conduct, from time to time, special studies relating to the civil service and to other merit systems in the executive branch, and report to the President and to the Congress as to whether the public interest in a civil service free of prohibited personnel practices is being adequately protected; and

"(4) review, as provided in subsection (e) of this section, rules and regulations of the Office of Personnel Management.

"(b)(1) Any member of the Merit Systems Protection Board, any administrative law judge appointed by the Board under section 3105 of this title, and any employee of the Board designated by the Board may—

"(A) administer oaths, examine witnesses, take depositions, and receive evidence;

"(B) issue subpoenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary or other evidence from any place in the United States or any territory or possession thereof, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, or from any installation or facility of the Government of the United States throughout the world; and

"(C) order the taking of depositions and order responses to written interrogatories.

"(2) Witnesses (whether appearing voluntarily or under subpoena) shall be paid the same fee and mileage allowances which are paid subpoenaed witnesses in the courts of the United States.

"(c) In the case of contumacy or failure to obey a subpoena issued under subsection (b)(2) of this section, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the person to whom the subpoena is addressed resides or is served may issue an order requiring such person to appear at any designated place to testify or to produce documentary or other evidence. Any failure to obey the order of the court may be punished by the court as a contempt thereof.

"(d)(1) In any proceeding under subsection (a)(1) of this section, any member of the Board may request from the Director of the Office of Personnel Management an advisory opinion concerning the interpretation of any rule, regulation, or other policy directive promulgated by the Office of Personnel Management.

"(2) In enforcing compliance with any order under subsection (a)(2) of this section, the Board may order that any employee charged with complying with such order shall not be entitled to receive payment for service as an employee during any period that the order has not been complied with. The Board shall certify to the Comptroller General of the United States that such an order has been issued, and no payment shall be made out of the Treasury of the United States for any service specified in such order.

"(3) In carrying out any study under subsection (a)(3) of this section, the Board shall make such inquiries as may be necessary and, unless otherwise prohibited by law, shall have access to personnel records or information collected by the Office and may require additional reports from other agencies as needed.

"(e)(1) At any time after the effective date of any rule or regulation issued by the Director in carrying out functions under section 1103 of this title, the Board shall review any provision of such rule or regulation—

"(A) on its own motion;

"(B) on the granting by the Board, in its sole discretion, of any petition for such review filed with the Board by any interested person, after consideration of the petition by the Board; or

"(C) on the filing of a written complaint by the Special Counsel requesting such review.

"(2) In reviewing any provision of any rule or regulation pursuant to this subsection, the Board shall declare such provision—

"(A) invalid on its face, if the Board determines that such provision would, if implemented by any agency, on its face, require or encourage any employee to violate section 2302(b) of this title; or

"(B) invalidly implemented by any agency, if the Board determines that such provision, as it has been implemented by the agency through any personnel action taken by the agency or through any policy adopted by the agency in conformity with such provision, has required or encouraged any employee to violate section 2302(b) of this title.

"§ 1205. Stays of certain personnel actions

"(a)(1) The Special Counsel may request any member of the Merit Systems Protection Board to order a stay of any personnel action for 60 calendar days if the Special Counsel determines that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the personnel action was taken, or is to be taken, as a result of a prohibited personnel practice.

"(2) Any member of the Board requested by the Special Counsel to order a stay under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall order such stay unless the member determines that, under the facts and circumstances involved, such a stay would not be appropriate.

"(3) Unless denied under paragraph (2) of this subsection, any stay under this subsection shall be granted within 3 calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) after the date of the request for the stay by the Special Counsel.

"(4)(A) If, during the pendency of any stay granted pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Special Counsel files a petition for corrective action pursuant to section 1214(b)(2) of this title seeking cancellation of the personnel actions which are the subject of the stay, the stay shall continue until the Board issues its final decision on the petition of the Special Counsel for corrective action.

"(B) If, during the pendency of any stay granted pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the employee submits an appeal to the Board under section 7701 of this title, the Board may extend the stay until the Board issues its final decision on the appeal if the Board finds that there is a substantial likelihood that the individual will prevail in the appeal, unless the extension of the stay would impose an extreme and extraordinary hardship on the agency against which the stay has been imposed.

"(b)(1) Any individual who claims to be a victim of a prohibited personnel practice may request the Merit Systems Protection Board to order a stay of any personnel action for 60 calendar days if the individual alleges that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the personnel action was taken, or is to be taken, as a result of a prohibited personnel practice.

"(2) The Board shall order a stay requested under paragraph (1) of this subsection if there is a substantial likelihood that the individual will prevail in an action for relief under section 1221 of this title, or in an appeal under section 7701 of this title unless the ordering of a stay would impose an extreme and extraordinary hardship on the agency against which the stay is sought.

"(3) Unless denial under paragraph (2) of this subsection, any stay uinder this subsection shall be granted within 3 calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) after the date of the request for the stay by the individual.

"(4) If, during the pendancy of any stay granted under this subsection—

"(A) the individual files a petition for relief under section 1221 of this title seeking cancellation of the personnel actions which are the subject of the stay,

"(B) the Special Counsel files a petition for corrective action under section 1214 of this title seeking cancellation of the personnel actions which are the subject of the stay, or

"(C) the employee submits an appeal to the Board under section 7701 of this title, the stay shall continue until the Board issues its final decision on the petition of the individual for relief, on the petition of the Special Counsel for corrective action, or on the appeal of the employee, as the case may be.

"§ 1206. Transmittal of information to Congress

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law or any rule, regulation, or policy directive, any member of the Board, or any employee of the Board designated by the Board, may transmit to the Congress on the request of any committee or subcommittee thereof, by report, testimony, or otherwise, information and views on functions, responsibilities, or other matters relating to the Board, without review, clearance, or approval by any other administrative authority.

"§ 1207. Annual report

"The Board shall submit an annual report to the President and the Congress on its activities, which shall include a description of significant actions taken by the Board to carry out its functions under this title. The report shall also review the significant actions of the Office of Personnel Management, including an analysis of whether the actions of the Office of Personnel Management are in accord with merit system principles and free from prohibited personnel practices.

"Subchapter II—Office of Special Counsel

"§ 1211. Establishment of Office of Special Counsel

"(a) There is established an Office of Special Counsel, which shall be headed by a Special Counsel. The Office shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed. The Office shall have its principal office in the District of Columbia and shall have field offices in other appropriate locations.

"(b) The Special Counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 5 years. The Special Counsel shall be an individual who, by demonstrated ability, background, training, or experience, is especially qualified to carry out the functions of the position. A Special Counsel appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the end of a term of office of his predecessor serves for the remainder of the term. The Special Counsel may be removed by the President only for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office The Special Counsel may not hold another office or position in the Government of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law or at the direction of the President.

"§ 1212. Powers and functions of Office of Special Counsel

"(a) The Office of Special Counsel shall—

"(1) represent and act as legal counsel on behalf of employees alleging prohibited personnel practices before the Merit Systems Protection Board and Federal courts;

"(2) receive and investigate allegations of prohibited personnel practices, and, where appropriate, bring petitions for stays, under section 1205 of this title, and petitions for corrective action, under section 1214 of this title, to protect individuals from being subject to prohibited personnel practices;

"(3) receive, review, and, where appropriate, forward to the Attorney General or an agency head under section 1213 of this title, disclosures of violations of any law, rule, or regulation, or mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or a substantial and specific danger to public health or safety;

"(4) investigate prohibited personnel practices and, where appropriate, bring disciplinary actions against individuals who have committed prohibited personnel practices, pursuant to section 1215 of this title;

"(5) review each rule or regulation issued by the Director in carrying out functions under section 1103 of this title and, where the Special Counsel finds that any such rule or regulation would, on its face or as implemented, encourage or require the commission of a prohibited personnel practice, file a written complaint with the Board; and

"(6) investigate and bring appropriate actions concerning allegations of violations of other laws within the jurisdiction of the Office of Special Counsel under section 1217 of this title.

"(b)(1) The Special Counsel and any employee of the Office of Special Counsel designated by the Special Counsel may administer oaths, examine witnesses, take depositions, and receive evidence.

"(2) The Special Counsel may issue subpoenas requiring the attendance of any employee, member of the uniformed services or contract employee of the Government for the purpose of interviewing such individual and may issue subpoenas requiring the production of any documents or other information from any such person from any place in the United States or any territory or possession thereof, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, or from any installation or facility of the Government of the United States throughout the world.

"(3) The Special Counsel may order the taking of depositions and order responses to written interrogatories.

"(4) In the case of contumacy or failure to obey a subpoena issued under paragraph (2) of this subsection, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the person to whom the subpoena is addressed resides or is served may issue an order requiring such person to appear at any designated place to be interviewed or to produce documents or other information. Any failure to obey the order of the court may be punished by the court as contempt thereof.

"(c) Except as provided in section 518 of title 28, relating to litigation before the Supreme Court, attorneys designated by the Special Counsel may appear for the Office of Special Counsel, and represent the Office, in any civil action brought in connection with any function carried out by the Office pursuant to this title or as otherwise authorized by law.

"(d)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Special Counsel may, as a matter of right, intervene or otherwise participate in any proceeding before the Merit Systems Protection Board, except that the Special Counsel shall comply with the rules of the Board.

"(2) The Special Counsel may intervene or otherwise participate in an action brought by an individual pursuant to section 1221 of this title or in an appeal brought by an employee pursuant to section 7701 of this title only with the consent of such individual or employee.

"(3) The Special Counsel may obtain judicial review of any final order or decision of the Merit Systems Protection Board in which the Special Counsel was a party to the United States district court for the judicial district in which the employee resides.

"(e)(1) The Special Counsel may appoint the legal, administrative, and support personnel necessary to perform the functions of the Special Counsel.

"(2) Any appointment made under this subsection shall be made in accordance with the provisions of this title, except that such appointment shall not be subject to the approval or supervision of the Office of Personnel Management or the Executive Office of the President (other than approval required under section 3324 or subchapter VIII of chapter 33 of this title).

"(f) The Special Counsel may prescribe regulations relating to the receipt and investigation of matters under the jurisdiction of the Special Counsel. Such regulations shall be published in the Federal Register.

"(g) The Special Counsel shall not issue any advisory opinion concerning any law, rule, or regulation (other than an advisory opinion concerning chapter 15, or subchapter III of chapter 73, of this title).

"§ 1213. Receipt and processing of disclosures

"(a) In any case involving—

"(1) any disclosure of information by an employee or applicant for employment which the employee or applicant reasonably believes evidences—

"(A) a violation of any law, rule, or regulation; or

"(B) mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or a substantial and specific danger to public health or safety;

if the disclosure is not specifically prohibited by law and if the information is not specifically required by Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or the conduct of foreign affairs; or

"(2) a disclosure by an employee or applicant for employment to the Special Counsel or to the Inspector General of an agency or another employee designated by the head of the agency to receive such disclosures of information which the employee or applicant reasonably believes evidences—

"(A) a violation of any law, rule, or regulation; or

"(B) mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or a substantial and specific danger to public health or safety;

the identity of the employee or applicant may not be disclosed without the consent of the employee or applicant during any investigation under this chapter unless the Special Counsel determines that the disclosure of the identity of the employee or applicant is necessary in order to carry out the functions of the Special Counsel.

"(b) Whenever the Special Counsel receives information of the type described in subsection (a) of this section, the Special Counsel shall review such information and shall, within 15 days after the date on which the Special Counsel received the information, make a determination with respect to the matters described in subsection (c)(1) of this section.

"(c)(1) If the Special Counsel determines under subsection (b) of this section that—

"(A) there is a substantial likelihood that the information referred to in such subsection discloses a violation of any law, rule, or regulation, or mismanagement, gross waste of funds, abuse of authority, or substantial and specific danger to public health or safety; and

"(B) the information was transmitted to the Special Counsel by an employee or former employee or applicant for employment in the agency which the information concerns or by any employee who obtained the information in connection with the performance of the employee's duties and responsibilities, the Special Counsel shall require the head of such agency conduct an investigation and submit a report as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) The head of an agency referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall—

"(A) conduct an investigation of the information referred to in such paragraph and any related matters transmitted by the Special Counsel to such head of an agency under such paragraph; and

"(B) within 60 days after the date on which the Special Counsel transmits such information to such head of an agency or within such longer period as such head of an agency and the Special Counsel agree to in writing, submit to the Special Counsel a written report setting out the findings of such head of an agency with respect to the investigation.

"(d) Any report required under subsection (c) of this section shall be reviewed and signed by the head of the agency and shall include—

"(1) a summary of the information with respect to which the investigation was initiated;

"(2) a description of the conduct of the investigation;

"(3) a summary of any evidence obtained from the investigation;

"(4) a listing of any violation or apparent violation of any law, rule, or regulation; and

"(5) a description of any action taken or planned as a result of the investigation, such as—

"(A) changes in agency rules, regulations, or practices;

"(B) the restoration of any aggrieved employee;

"(C) disciplinary action against any employee; and

"(D) referral to the Attorney General of any evidence of a criminal violation.

"(e)(1) Any such report shall be submitted to the Congress, to the President, and to the Special Counsel for transmittal to the complainant. Whenever the Special Counsel does not receive the report of the agency head within the time prescribed in subsection (c)(2) of this section, the Special Counsel shall transmit a copy of the information which was transmitted to the agency head to the President, and to the Congress together with a statement noting the failure of the head of the agency to file the required report.

"(2) In any case in which evidence of a criminal violation obtained by an agency in an investigation under subsection (c) of this section is referred to the Attorney General—

"(A) the report shall not be transmitted to the complainant; and

"(B) the agency shall notify the Office of Personnel Management and the Office of Management and Budget of the referral.

"(f) Upon receipt of any report of the head of an agency required under subsection (c) of this section, the Special Counsel shall review the report and determine whether—

"(1) the findings of the head of the agency appear reasonable; and

"(2) the agency's report under subsection (c)(2) of this section contains the information required under subsection (d) of this section.

"(g)(1) If the Special Counsel cannot make a determination described in subsection (c)(1)(A) or (c)(1)(B) of this section with respect to information disclosed to the Special Counsel by an individual, the Special Counsel shall return the information to such individual together with an explanation of the reasons that such determination cannot be made and a referral to any Federal Government agency which might be authorized to take some action on the basis of such information.

"(2) The Special Counsel shall not release outside the Office of the Special Counsel any information returned to an individual under paragraph (1) of this subsection or any related information obtained in connection with the disclosure of such information to the Special Counsel by such individual.

"(h) Except as specifically authorized under this section, the provisions of this section shall not be considered to authorize disclosure of any information by any agency or any person which is—

"(1) specifically prohibited from disclosure by any other provision of law; or

"(2) specifically required by Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or the conduct of foreign affairs.

"(i) In any case under subsection (a) of this section involving foreign intelligence or counterintelligence information the disclosure of which is specifically prohibited by law or by Executive order, the Special Counsel shall transmit such information to the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives and the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate.

"(j) The Special Counsel shall maintain and make available to the public a list of noncriminal matters referred to heads of agencies under subsection (c) of this section, together with reports by the heads of agencies under subsection (c)(2) of this section, in the case of matters referred to under this section. The Special Counsel shall take steps to ensure that any such public list does not contain any information the disclosure of which is prohibited by law or by Executive order requiring that information be kept secret in the interest of national defense or the conduct of foreign affairs.

"§ 1214. Investigation of prohibited personnel practices; corrective action

"(a)(1) The Special Counsel shall receive any allegation of a prohibited personnel practice and shall investigate the allegation to the extent necessary to determine whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that a prohibited personnel practice has occurred, exists, or is to be taken.

"(2) If the Special Counsel terminates any investigation under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Special Counsel shall prepare and transmit to any person on whose allegation the investigation was initiated a written statement notifying the person of the termination of the investigation, the findings of fact ascertained during the course of the investigation and the reason the Special Counsel decided to terminate the investigation.

"(3) In addition to the authority granted under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Special Counsel may, in the absence of an allegation, conduct an investigation for the purpose of determining whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that a prohibited personnel practice (or a pattern of prohibited personnel practices) has occurred, exists, or is to be taken.

"(b)(1) If, in connection with any investigation under this section or under section 1213 of this title, the Special Counsel determines that there are reasonable grounds to believe a prohibited personnel practice (or a pattern of prohibited personnel practices) has occurred, exists, or is to be taken by an agency, the Special Counsel shall promptly seek a stay of such prohibited personnel practice pursuant to section 1205 of this title.

"(2)(A) If a prohibited personnel practice is taken or has not been reversed or canceled in violation of a stay ordered under section 1205(a)(2) of this title, the Special Counsel shall petition the Merit Systems Protection Board for corrective action.

"(B) If the Special Counsel, in consultation with the individual who is alleged to be subject to the prohibited personnel practice, finds that the agency has reversed or canceled the prohibited personnel practice, the Special Counsel shall file with the Board such finding together with an indication of whether such individual agrees to the finding. Such individual may file supplementary comments with the Board.

"(3) In the case of any petition for corrective action filed against an agency under paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Board shall provide an opportunity for presentations to be made by the Special Counsel, the agency, the Office of Personnel Management, and any individual who is alleged to be subject to the prohibited personnel practice involved in such petition.

"(4) The Board shall order such corrective action as the Board considers appropriate if the Board determines that the Special Counsel has demonstrated—

"(A) by substantial evidence, in the case of a prohibited personnel practice described in section 2302(b)(8) of this title; or

"(B) by a preponderance of the evidence, in the case of any other prohibited personnel practice, that a prohibited personnel practice has been taken and continues in effect in the case of any individual or is to be taken against any individual.

"(c)(1) If, in connection with any investigation under this section, the Special Counsel determines that there is reasonable cause to believe that a criminal violation by an employee has occurred, the Special Counsel shall report the determination to the Attorney General and to the head of the agency involved, and shall submit a copy of the report to the Director of the Office of Personnel Management and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

"(2) In any case in which the Special Counsel determines that there are reasonable grounds to believe that a prohibited personnel practice has occurred, exists, or is to be taken, the Special Counsel shall proceed with any investigation or proceeding instituted under this section notwithstanding that the alleged violation has been reported to the attorney General.

"(d) If, in connection with any investigation under this section, the Special Counsel determines that there is reasonable cause to believe that any violation of any law, rule, or regulation has occurred which is not referred to in subsection (b) or (c) of this section, the violation shall be reported to the head of the agency involved. The Special Counsel shall require, within 30 days of the receipt of the report by the agency, a certification by the head of the agency which states—

"(1) that the head of the agency has personally reviewed the report; and

"(2) what action has been or is to be taken, and whan the action will be completed.

"(e) During any investigation initiated under this section, no disciplinary action shall be taken against any employee for any alleged prohibited activity under investigation or for any related activity without the approval of the Special Counsel.

"§ 1215. Disciplinary actions

"(a) The Special Counsel may file a petition for disciplinary action, pursuant to this section, against an official for—

"(1) commission of a prohibited personnel practice;

"(2) violating a law within the jurisdiction of the Special Counsel under section 1217 of this title; and

"(3) any knowing and willful refusal or failure to comply with an order of the Merit Systems Protection Board.

"(b) For purposes of this section, the term 'official' means an individual in the civil service or in the uniformed services or an individual employed, directly or indirectly, by the Government to perform work for the Government.

"(c) The Special Counsel shall prepare a written complaint against the official containing the charges and supporting facts, and present the complaint to the official and to the Merit Systems Protection Board.

"(d) Any employee against whom a complaint has been presented to the Merit Systems Protection Board under subsection (c) of this section is entitled to—

"(1) a reasonable time to answer orally and in writing and to furnish affidavits and other documentary evidence in support of the answer;

"(2) be represented by an attorney or other representative;

"(3) a hearing before the Board or an administrative law judge appointed under section 3105 of this title and designated by the Board;

"(4) have a transcript kept of any hearing under paragraph (3) of this subsection; and

"(5) a written decision and reasons therefor at the earliest practicable date, including a copy of any final order imposing disciplinary action.

"(e) Except as provided in subsection (h) of this section, a final order of the Board may impose disciplinary action consisting of removal, reduction in grade, debarment from Federal employment for a period not to exceed 5 years, suspension, reprimand, or an assessment of a civil penalty not to exceed $1,000.

"(f) There may be no administrative appeal from an order of the Board. An employee subject to a final order imposing disciplinary action under this section may obtain judicial review of the order in the United States court of appeals for the judicial circuit in which the employee resides or is employed at the time of the action.

"(g) In the case of any State or local officer or employee under chapter 15 of this title, the Board shall consider the case in accordance with the provisions of such chapter.

"(h) In the case of an official—

"(1) in the civil service who is in a confidential, policy-making, policy-determining, or policy-advocating position appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate (other than an individual in the Foreign Service of the United States), or

"(2) not in the civil service, the final order of the Board shall recommend to the appointing authority of such official what type of disciplinary action should be imposed.

"(i) Any decision of the Board pursuant to this section shall be made publicly available at issuance.

"§ 1216. Discrimination complaints

"Where a complaint is presented to the Special Counsel which alleges a prohibited personnel practice of the type described in section 2302(a)(1) of this title and such complaint has also been made to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Special Counsel shall refer such complaint to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for consideration.

"§ 1217. Other matters within the jurisdiction of Office of Special Counsel

"(a) In addition to the authority otherwise provided in this chapter, the Special Counsel shall conduct an investigation of any allegation concerning—

"(1) political activity prohibited under subchapter III of chapter 73 of this title, relating to political activities by Federal employees;

"(2) political activity prohibited under chapter 15 of this title, relating to political activities by certain State and local officers and employees;

"(3) arbitrary or capricious withholding of information prohibited under section 552 of this title, except that the Special Counsel shall make no investigation under this subsection of any withholding of foreign intelligence or counterintelligence information the disclosure of which is specifically prohibited by law or by Executive order;

"(4) activities prohibited by any civil service law, rule, or regulation, including any activity relating to political intrusion in personnel decisionmaking; and

"(5) involvement by any employee in any prohibited discrimination found by any court or appropriate administrative authority to have occurred in the course of any personnel action.

"(b)(1) If the investigation by the Special Counsel substantiates the allegation referred to in subsection (a)(1) of this section, the Special Counsel shall petition the Merit Systems Protection Board for penalties, pursuant to section 7325 of this title, for the individual engaging in political activity prohibited under subchapter III of chapter 73 of this title.

"(2) If the Special Counsel receives allegations of political activities prohibited under chapter 15 of this title, the Special Counsel shall investigate and present findings pursuant to section 1504 of this title.

"(3) If the Special Counsel receives allegations of an arbitrary or capricious withholding of information prohibited under section 552 of this title, the Special Counsel shall investigate and submit findings pursuant to section 552(a)(4)(F) of this title.

"(4) If the Special Counsel receives allegations of activities described in subsection (a)(4) of this section or involvement described in subsection (a)(5) of this section, the Special Counsel shall investigate and seek corrective action under section 1214 of this title and if appropriate, disciplinary action under section 1215 of this title as if the activities or involvement were a prohibited personnel practice.

"§ 1218. Transmittal of information to Congress

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law or any rule, regulation, or policy directive, the Special Counsel or any employee of the Special Counsel designated by the Special Counsel, may transmit to the Congress on the request of any committee or subcommittee thereof, by report, testimony, or otherwise, information and views on functions, responsibilities, or other matters relating to the Office, without review, clearance, or approval by any other administrative authority.

"§ 1219. Annual report

"The Special Counsel shall submit an annual report to the Congress on the activities of the Special Counsel, including the number, types, and disposition of allegations of prohibited personnel practices filed with it, investigations conducted by it, and actions initiated by it before the Board, as well as a description of the recommendations and reports made by it to other agencies pursuant to this section, and the actions taken by the agencies as a result of the reports or recommendations. The report required by this subsection shall include whatever recommendations for legislation or other action by Congress the Special Counsel may consider appropriate.

"Subchapter III—Employee Right of Action

"§ 1221. Individual right of action

"(a)(1) Any individual who has been adversely affected by a prohibited personnel practice may bring an action before the Merit Systems Protection Board for corrective action.

"(2) The individual shall commence an action by filing a written complaint with the Merit Systems Protection Board, and shall serve a copy of such complaint on the agency in which the prohibited personnel practice is alleged to have occurred. The complaint shall contain the specific prohibited personnel practice which is alleged to have occurred and facts to support such allegation.

"(b) At the request of the individual, the Board shall compel the agency to provide all relevant and material documents and witnesses to assist the individual in the preparation of the case.

"(c) The Board may not defer action on a complaint brought under subsection (a) of this section to await final agency action.

"(d) The Board shall order such corrective action as is necessary to eliminate the adverse effect of the prohibited personnel practice on the individual if the individual demonstrates—

"(1) by substantial evidence that a prohibited personnel practice described in section 2302(b)(8) of this title has occurred, exists or is to be taken; or

"(2) by a preponderance of the evidence that a prohibited personnel practice other than one described in section 2302(b)(8) of this title has occurred, exists, or is to be taken.

"(e) If the Merit Systems Protection Board finds that a prohibited personnel practice has occurred, the Board shall order the agency which committed the prohibited personnel practice to pay to the individual who brought the action under this section all that individual's actual costs in bringing the action, including reasonable attorney's fees.

"(f)(1) The individual may obtain judicial review of any final order or decision of the Merit Systems Protection Board in any action brought by the individual under this section or in a petition for corrective action brought by the Special Counsel pursuant to section 1214 of this title where the individual was alleged to be a victim of the prohibited personnel practice.

"(2) An individual seeking judicial review under this subsection may seek such review in the United States district court for the judicial district in which the individual resides.

"(3) The court referred to in paragraph (2) of this subsection may order the agency which committed the prohibited personnel practice to pay to the individual who brought the appeal under this subsection all of the actual costs incurred by that individual in bringing the action, including reasonable attorney's fees.

§ 1222. Individual action on agency failure to comply with order of Board

"Where the Merit Systems Protection Board orders any Federal agency to comply with an order or decision, pursuant to section 1204(a)(2) of this title, and the agency does not promptly comply, any individual who suffers harm as a result of such delay may file an action before the Merit Systems Protection Board for actual and punitive damages against such agency.

"§ 1223. Relationship between individual action and Special Counsel action

"(a) The right of an individual to bring and pursue an action before the Merit Systems Protection Board or a court of the United States under section 1205, 1221, 1222, or 7701 of this title shall not be affected by any decision of the Special Counsel not to pursue any action requested by the individual.

"(b) An individual may not bring an action under section 1221 of this title if an action involving the same facts and circumstances has previously been brought before the Merit Systems Protection Board by the Special Counsel in the case of such individual pursuant to section 1214 of this title or by such individual pursuant to section 1221 of this title and the Merit Systems Protection Board has previously decided such action on the merits.".

(b) The table of chapters at the beginning of part II of such title is amended by striking out the item relating to chapter 12, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"12. Merit Systems Protection Board Special Counsel, and Employee Right of Action ..... 1201.".

SEC. 4. REPRISALS.

Section 2302(b)(9) of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(9) take or fail to take any personnel action against any employee or applicant for employment as a reprisal—

"(A) for the exercise of any appeal, complaint, or grievance right granted by any law, rule, or regulation;

"(B) for testifying for or assisting any individual who alleges to be the victim of a prohibited personnel practice;

"(C) for cooperating with or disclosing information to the Inspector General of an agency or to the Special Counsel; or

"(D) for failing to follow orders to disobey or not enforce a law;".

SEC. 5. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS; RESTRICTION RELATING TO APPROPRIATIONS UNDER CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1978.

(a) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

(1) for each of fiscal years 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, and 1991, the sum of $20,000,000 to carry out the provisions of subchapter I of chapter 12 of title 5, United States Code; and

(2) for each of fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, the sum of $5,000,000 to carry out the provisions of subchapter II of chapter 12 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) RESTRICTION RELATING TO APPROPRIATIONS UNDER CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1978.—No funds are authorized to be appropriated to the Merit Systems Protection Board or the Office of Special Counsel pursuant to the authorization contained in section 903 of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 5509 note).

SEC. 6. TERMINATION AND TRANSFER PROVISIONS.

(a)(1) The positions of Special Counsel of the Merit Systems Protection Board is terminated.

(2) Any reference in any law, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to the Special Counsel of the Merit Systems Protection Board shall be deemed to refer to the Special Counsel referred to in section 1211 of title 5, United States Code, as added by section 3(a) of this Act.

(b) The personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available or to be made available to the Special Counsel of the Merit Systems Protection Board are, subject to section 1531 of title 31, United States Code, transferred to the Special Counsel referred to in section 1211 of title 5, United States Code (as added by section 3(a) of this Act), for appropriate allocation.

SEC. 7. EFFECTIVE DATE AND APPLICATION.

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1986.

(b) This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall apply to any allegation of a prohibited personnel practice received by the Office of the Special Counsel after September 30, 1986.●

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, earlier this Congress the Senate approved an amendment I sponsored providing enhanced legal protections for Government whistleblowers. The same language passed this body as a separate piece of legislation in the 98th Congress. Unfortunately, the protections in those bills were not acted on by the House of Representatives.

Today, however, I am joining with my colleagues Senator LEVIN and Representatives SCHROEDER and HORTON to sponsor a more comprehensive bill which offers not only increased legal options, but reforms the administrative system Federal civil servants turn to for fair and just treatment.

I have learned from my own contact with so-called whistleblowers over the past several years that their services are absolutely essential to the Government, the public, and the media, as well as those of us in Congress. Most of us wouldn't know where to begin to find $7,600 coffee pots, not to mention complex schemes of fraud and overpricing, without the aid of whistleblowers from within the system.

Unfortunately, our Government bureaucracies usually have a strange method of rewarding those who point out waste and inefficiency. Harassment, demotions, and undesired relocations are the "prizes" most often handed out.

No wonder this administration's own survey has found nearly 70 percent of observed waste or fraud is going unreported for two basic reasons; one, the belief that nothing will be done to correct the activity, and; two, the fear of reprisal.

Perhaps most disturbing though is the finding that since 1980, fear of reprisal among would-be whistleblowers has nearly doubled.

What does that mean? It means that despite assurances about protections and despite the supposed safeguarding mechanisms within the system, reality tells us there is virtually no protection for whistleblowers—and it's getting worse.

The current system of rewards and punishments in practice is evidence of a bureaucracy whose incentives produce the direct opposite of its stated goals. This legislation is an effort to help reverse what appears to be an upside down system.

Among other provisions, our bill would allow whistleblowers a legal remedy if they suffer retaliation from superiors for disclosing waste, abuse, mismanagement, or fraud. Presently, civil servants who suffer reprisal are tried entirely within the administrative system. If the system prevails, the whistleblower is at the end of his rope. However, if the whistleblower happens to succeed through the administrative route, those found guilty of retaliation do have another chance to have their case heard in the outside judicial arena. This bill would equalize the appeal rights, so that whistleblowers by themselves, or through the Office of Special Counsel, could seek protections in Federal court.

Additionally, this legislation clarifies that the special counsel is a representative for whistleblowers and reestablishes the Office of the Special Counsel as an independent agency.

Mr. President, this bill is a bipartisan vote of confidence for the many whistleblowers and would-be whistleblowers in Government service. The need for sending this message of support is irrefutable. Government efficiency would be promoted, taxpayer funds saved, and honest Federal workers rewarded. I strongly urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this important measure.●

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S.J. Res. 256. Joint resolution designating August 12, 1986, as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL NEIGHBORHOOD CRIME WATCH DAY

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I am introducing a joint resolution today which commends the efforts of the Nation's neighborhood crime watch groups and declares August 12, 1986, as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day."

During the last several years, the ranks of neighborhood crime watch organizations have grown tremendously. Citizens throughout America, who have been justifiably concerned about the Nation's crime rate, have joined together in voluntary efforts to prevent and deter criminal activity.

One grassroots organization alone, the National Association of Town Watch, has 1,500 chapters from 32 different States. The National Sheriffs Association is actively involved in neighborhood watch efforts. And in my own State of Virginia, roughly 300,000 households participate in some form of neighborhood crime watch program, all of which are operated in close cooperation with local police and sheriffs.

On August 12 of this year, many of these organizations will participate in a "national night out" being sponsored, in part, by the National Association of Town Watch. In large cities and small towns across America, participating neighborhood watch members will spend the hour between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m. local time patrolling their neighborhoods or watching from the lawns of their homes. At least a dozen jurisdictions in Virginia are expected to take part.

This annual event is designed to increase cooperation between community-based watch programs and their local law enforcement authorities. It is also aimed at generating local support for the crime watch groups and increasing their membership.

Last year, more than 10 million people in 46 different States took part in the national night out. A number of law enforcement organizations in Virginia have endorsed this activity, and have told me how highly they value the contribution of neighborhood watch groups. I fully agree, and I am hopeful that an even larger turnout will occur in Virginia and across the Nation on August 12 of this year.

The joint resolution I am introducing today commends the efforts of America's neighborhood crime watch organizations. It also declares August 12, 1986, as National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day, to coincide with the national night out being held on that same day.

Mr. President, I am greatly encouraged by the widespread participation in neighborhood crime groups. I believe it reflects a growing unwillingness on the part of law-abiding Americans to simply buckle under to the threat of crime. It is also a valuable example of the voluntary, community-based efforts that contribute so much to society in general.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 256

Whereas neighborhood crime is of continuing concern to the American people;

Whereas the fight against neighborhood crime requires people to work together in cooperation with law enforcement officials;

Whereas neighborhood crime watch organizations are effective at promoting awareness about, and the participation of volunteers in, crime prevention activities at the local level; and

Whereas citizens across America will soon take part in a "National Night Out," a unique crime prevention event which will demonstrate the importance and effectiveness of community participation in crime prevention efforts by having people spend the period from 8 to 9 o'clock postmeridian on August 12, 1986, with their neighborhoods in front of their homes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That August 12, 1986, is designated as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. CHILES (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. BYRD, Mr. TRIBLE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BOREN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOLE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HATCH, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. THURMOND):

S.J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to designate the first Friday of May each year as "National Teacher Appreciation Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL TEACHER APPRECIATION DAY

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would designate the first Friday of May each year as "National Teacher Appreciation Day." I am joined in this effort by Senators PELL, BYRD, TRIBLE, KENNEDY, HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, LAUTENBERG, DOMENICI, CHAFEE, SIMON, BOREN, HOLLINGS, BRADLEY, DODD, DOLE, BURDICK, MOYNIHAN, HATCH, RIEGLE, and THURMOND.

I am proud to be introducing this legislation in the same week that we have a teacher, Christa McAuliffe, going into space on the shuttle Challenger. Educators from all over the Nation are gathering in Florida for this launch and for briefings by NASA. This kind of joint effort to bring together the Government and classroom teachers around science, one of the most important curriculum areas, is inspiring to everyone. Her class must be excited about having lessons presented from space. My enthusiasm is heightened by the fact that experiments of students from across the Nation will be conducted in space. This is applied science at its best!

This space flight represents the kind of advances we have seen in teaching in recent years. I am happy to see surveys indicating a rise in teachers' salaries. I am also pleased to see an increase in the number of high school seniors who plan to go into teaching. This means that publicly recognizing the importance of teaching in society does affect the views of young people toward the profession and their dedication to it.

Even so, the future of the teaching profession is one of the most challenging areas we are facing as a nation. Approximately one-half of the teachers surveyed indicated that they don't plan to be teaching in 5 years. Data further show that we will need over 1 million new teachers by 1990. The demands facing these new teachers will be greater than ever before as an increasing percentage of students are from disadvantaged backgrounds or are of limited English proficiency. At every level, teachers are called upon to excel in all areas to raise motivation and standards.

To meet the demands of today's schools requires great commitment. Our teachers are rising to the challenge. They are using creative teaching techniques to bring subjects alive in the classroom; they are becoming increasingly involved in parent teacher organizations; and they are enrolling in courses to keep themselves on the cutting edge of the areas they teach. Such dedication must be acknowledged and applauded.

In order to ensure that we continue to have quality teachers in our schools, we must recognize and respect the teachers who do so much. By designating the first Friday of May each year as "National Teacher Appreciation Day," we encourage students, parents, school administrators and the entire community to recognize the invaluable contributions teachers make.●

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I am delighted to join my colleague from Florida, Senator LAWTON CHILES, in introducing a Senate joint resolution designating the first Friday of May each year as "National Teacher Appreciation Day."

As a former junior high school mathematics teacher myself, I am keenly aware of the vital work that goes on each day in our Nation's classrooms. Critical attitude, concepts, and social skills are developed. These form the basis of a lifetime of accomplishment. While we are often reminded that so-called failures are the fault of the school, I am one who believes that failing, like succeeding, depends on individual initiative or the lack thereof. I view our Nation's schools as providing opportunities and buttresses for success, supporting a productive life much as a bridge is supported by its piers and abutments. Those who accept the challenge and choose to cross the bridge will be rewarded with new challenges and a possible life of achievement.

Teachers choose to commit their lives to maintaining and improving this vital bridge. Many distinguish themselves in giving their life energy to others through the art of teaching. Teachers are indispensable in our modern lives, and it is important to our own growth that we stop and give our gratitude to those who have helped us conquer the manifold problems of ignorance.

Teachers are one of society's main supports. Our superstructures would collapse without them. We have grown accustomed to high quality graduates from our Nation's schools, colleges, and universities. We have also become too complacent about the consistent and improving quality of graduates. We have not, as a society, taken the time to thank those who work to help others become the backbone of industry, government, finance, commerce, education, and culture.

By introducing this resolution, we are thanking the millions of teachers who have done their work without asking for national acclaim. Passage of this resolution will help to begin an annual cycle of national attention and appreciation in the month of May for those who are busy preparing yet millions more students for their graduation ceremonies and a productive life to follow.

In an age where teacher evaluation has become commonplace, we hope, by means of this resolution, to turn the critical eyes of society upon ourselves to see whether we have been properly grateful to those teachers who have served us so well. We want to recognize these hidden and reliable pillars of strength for their fine work.

By creating this special day, we hope to give students and parents a new opportunity to express their gratitude to their teachers and their children's teachers who have been there to guide and lend a timely helping hand. This expression of gratitude from students and parents will be a fine finish and a deserved tribute to their friend the teacher. I believe education is incomplete without the opportunity to thank those who give us so much on a daily basis. By so doing we enhance the status of the teacher in our society, the importance of education to our society, the quality of education that we receive, and ultimately, we enhance our society itself.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, Today I rise to join my colleague, Mr. CHILES, in introducing a resolution to designate the first Friday of May as "National Teacher Appreciation Day."

Nothing is more essential to the quality of education than the quality of the teacher. Few persons outside of our own immediate families exert such an influence on our lives. Few make such a mark on our total cutlure and society as do our teachers.

To remain a first-class Nation, it is imperative that we support an educational system that encourages first-class teachers. This kind of investment in human resources is the only way that our Nation can continue to effectively compete with the rest of the world. We need to solve the problem of the trade imbalance, we need to develop a competitive business technology, we need to insure the strength of our defense. All of these are dependent on a sound and progressive educational system.

Today's commitment to recognizing these teachers can be a step toward reversing the decline of quality students interested in pursuing careers in education. The prognosis has been bleak: only 2 percent of the top quarter of college students plan to enter the teaching profession. Although education constitutes less than 2 percent of the Federal budget, it is being asked to absorb a 6.5 percent reduction for fiscal year 1986. College level professors are being lured away from the campus to higher paying careers in business. On the whole, teachers are very dedicated and committed to the values of education, but simply cannot afford to remain in a program that is not fully supported by the entire Nation.

At a time when there could not be a greater national need for qualified and specially trained minds to bring us into the 21st century, education should be a Federal priority. For this reason, I am pleased to join in this effort to bring much deserved recognition and appreciation to those who have chosen to dedicate their time and energies to the profession of teaching.●

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the other distinguished Senators in offering this joint resolution designating the first Friday of May each year as "National Teacher Appreciation Day."

All parents and grandparents of students have long known what many recent scholarly studies on excellence in education are reporting: That one of the most crucial ingredients in a quality education is a quality teacher. A good teacher can inspire in a student a love of learning, regardless of the amount of resources at hand such as books, computers, and fancy study guides.

Fortunately, the schools in my home State of West Virginia and throughout our Nation are blessed with many very inspiring and excellent teachers. It is my hope that a "National Teacher Appreciation Day" will serve not only to honor the many fine teachers of our students, but also will encourage dedicated young people to join the teaching profession.

For further information concerning these hearings, please contact Carole Blessington of the Rules Committee staff on extension 40278.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE INNOCENT VICTIMS OF ABORTION

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, on this day 13 years ago, the Supreme Court made a landmark decision that, in essence, sealed the fate of millions of unborn children. In that decision, Roe versus Wade, the Court declared that the Constitution guarantees the right to abortion.

In my readings of the Constitution, I have never found an all-encompassing right to abortion. I have always understood that it was the function of that document to protect what Jefferson called those "unalienable rights," first and foremost of which is life. I do not see how it can at the same time be construed to sanction the wholesale destruction of human life that is taking place in our society today at the rate of about 1.5 million lives per year.

Thousands of people, all across our Nation, share my concern. They are gathering today in their hometowns and cities to protest and mourn the 1973 Supreme Court decision. Many are joining at the State Capitol in Utah for a special "Memorial for Life" to express their distress at the loss of these many young lives and to share their hopes for the future.

I, too, am hopeful that we will be able to stop this destruction of life. Last January, I introduced, for the fifth consecutive Congress, a human life amendment to the Constitution. Senate Joint Resolution 19 states that:

> With respect to the right to life, the word "person" as used . . . in the 5th and 4th amendments to the Constitution . . . applies to all human beings, irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every stage of their biological development.

It goes on to specify that measures necessary to prevent the death of the mother should not be prohibited.

Congress has been enmeshed in the debate on abortion this year. At least nine votes took place in the Senate and the House of Representatives on abortion-related issues in 1985. Some significant progress was made, particularly with regard to U.S. moneys going to proabortion organizations overseas. The Supreme Court also heard two more abortion-related cases. We are waiting now for their decisions.

Beyond the familiar arguments between the right to life and the right to choose, some new twists in the abortion debate have evolved. Advances in medicine over the past few years have opened up entirely new questions. Some of these include the constitutional rights of unborn children who are viable before the beginning of the Supreme Court's all-important third trimester; the rights and proper treatment of a child who lives through the abortion procedure; and the very real possibility of fetal pain during abortion. In addition, technical advances are showing, ever more graphically, that abortionists are dealing with two human lives, that of the mother and that of the child.

The cruelest irony, however, is that while we discuss all of the ethical components of these questions, babies are dying—over 4,000 of them every day.

I commend those who are joining today in honor of the innocent victims of abortion. That the abortion topic remains at the forefront, even after 13 years, is just one more indicator for all of us that the controversy has not been resolved. Those who are horrified by this rampant taking of life will not quietly accept its reality, but will continue to raise their voices as advocates for the unborn.

I pledge that I, too, will continue working to see that the laws of our country protect our tiniest and most helpless citizens.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, today is the 68th anniversary of the proclamation of independence in the Ukraine, and I am honored to pay tribute to the Ukrainian people, whose national spirit continues to thrive today despite the hardships they have endured under the Soviet regime.

Although the Ukrainian National Republic lasted only 3 years, from 1918 to 1921, the Ukrainian spirit of freedom has remained strong. Since the Soviet takeover in 1921, the Ukrainian people have suffered insurmountable deprivation and degradation, yet they have not lost their identity, culture and religious traditions.

One of the most severe hardships endured by the Ukrainians was the 1932 famine, engineered by the Soviet Union to destroy the political and cultural life in the Ukraine. The Soviets seized and exported the bulk of the Ukrainian grain crop and went so far as to establish border patrols to prevent food from coming into the Ukraine. Seven million people died during this period. The Soviets took great measures to conceal the famine, and to this day, the Soviet Government continues to deny that the tragedy ever took place. As a result many Americans and other citizens around the world are not even aware of the famine. I am pleased that Congress approved a bill that I introduced in 1984 to create a commission to study this famine and to expand the world's knowledge of the event. Although we cannot change history, we can preserve the memory of those who died by giving this forgotten Holocaust a secure place in history.

Even today, Ukrainians are subject to persecution for espousing their belief in the principles of democracy and freedom. So, on this 68th anniversay of Ukrainian independence, let us all continue to speak out against human rights violations in the Ukraine and throughout the world and let us praise the Ukrainian people for their tireless struggle for freedom.●

NEW YORK STATE SENATOR RICHARD SCHERMERHORN—MAN OF THE YEAR

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues to the annual Lincoln Day Dinner held by the Republican Committee of Newburgh, NY. Every year at this dinner, the town of Newburgh's Republican Committee honors an outstanding Republican as their "Man of the Year," an honor which recognizes an individual for years of dedicated service both in government and in civic activities. Receiving this honor for 1986, New York State Senator Richard E. Schermerhorn has devoted his life to serve his country and his community.

Upon graduation from Albany Military Academy at the age of 18, Dick Schermerhorn enlisted in the U.S. Army and served with the infantry in the occupation forces in Japan after World War II. Soon after returning home, he received his bachelor degrees from Bryant College, and then went into the insurance business. Currently, he is president of Richard Schermerhorn Insurance, one of the largest insurance companies in the lower Hudson Valley.

As a Republican-conservative, Dick Schermerhorn was first elected to the New York State Senate in 1970. Currently, he is serving his eighth term in office. During his tenure, he has received many honors and awards from a number of uniformed service organizations for his efforts on their behalf. He also is active in many civic and fraternal organizations such as the VFW, the American Legion, the Elks Club, and the Boy Scouts of America. In 1973, Senator Schermerhorn became the first recipient of the New York State Youth Bureau Award for Distinguished Services for his efforts to "promote the welfare of youth."

As an active member of the New York State Senate, Senator Schermerhorn is Chairman of the Senate Corporations, Authorities and Commissions Committee and the Special Subcommittee on Aviation Facilities. He is a member of the Committees on Civil Service and Pensions, Conservation and Recreation, Energy, Transportation, Social Services, Government Operations, Insurance, and the Select Committee on Casino Gambling.

Mr. President, I salute the town of Newburgh Republican Committee's selection of Senator Richard E. Schermerhorn as their "Man of the Year." But more than this, I salute the Senator for the life he has chosen, a life reflecting his concern for the welfare of others. I, as well as this Congress, wish him many future years of success as a public servant.●

TRIBUTE TO WALT GRIFFIN

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to pay tribute today to a great Tennessean and a good friend, Walt Griffin, who died over the recent holidays in Clarksville.

Since 1973, Walt had served as director of the Clarksville Chamber of Commerce and executive director of the Montgomery County Industrial Board. Over the years, no one did more for Clarksville and Montgomery County than Walt Griffin. His work with the American Legion, the public service commission, the industrial board and the chamber will long be remembered.

Walt was a leading Legionnaire and one of the most civic-minded men in the State of Tennessee. The people of Clarksville will miss him as a leader, and all of us will miss him as a friend.

I ask that an editorial tribute to Walt Griffin from the December 14, 1985, Clarksville Leaf-Chronicle be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

COMMUNITY'S FRIEND

Whenever a person of note dies in this community, the newspaper tries to contact someone who was a friend, and for the past several years, that friend has always been Walt Griffin. He seemed to know everyone.

No matter what the person's occupation or age, it was Mr. Griffin who had been a pal and could describe his friend's life with both accuracy and affection.

When Mr. Griffin died Thursday, his obituary made it clear why he was so knowledgeable about this community and its people. The list of organizations he served over the years went on for several paragraphs—from the Boy Scouts to the American Legion to the Tennessee Industrial Development Council—and his honorary pallbearers alone would fill an auditorium.

"He never forgot you once he met you," said Evans Harvill, who had known "Griff" since their high school days. "In a crowd of 75, he would be able to call everyone by name, and tell a little about each one."

But this was more than just good memory. He genuinely liked people and loved to do things to please them. A few years back, Mr. Griffin wanted to pull his neighborhood together, and so he suggested a barbecue. "Well, he dug the pit himself and got some hogs, and sat up all night long keeping watch," said Mr. Harvill. "Just for the neighborhood."

While Mr. Griffin held several positions in business over the years, most people now remember him best as director of the Chamber of Commerce and executive director of the Montgomery County Industrial Board, two jobs he held simultaneously for 12 years until his death.

The responsibility was monumental, but under Mr. Griffin's leadership, the county succeeded in attracting several major new industries, including Jersey Miniere Zinc, Union Carbide, Jostens American Yearbook and Thun.

"He was fiercely loyal to Clarksville, and he was great at selling it to others," said Mr. Harvill. His knowledge and enthusiasm were important in this, but also his personality.

He was always friendly, but frank as well. "You didn't ever ask him his opinion if you didn't want an answer," said Mr. Harvill. He always followed up on his promises and seemed to have boundless energy. "I've seen him work at conventions and wear out people half his age," said Mr. Harvill.

These qualities helped him in all his civic activities, too, where he was never just a joiner, but always an active participant. "If he couldn't contribute, he wouldn't join," said Mr. Harvill. "He was the most civic-minded man I ever knew in my life."

Indeed, his civic duties took far beyond Clarksville, and in his various leadership roles in the American Legion, he was well respected nationwide

What probably endeared him most to his friends, though, was his wit and good humor. "He was one of the world's greatest bullshooters; he always had a tale about something," said Mr. Harvill. He loved to tease, and was a master of repartee.

"He was just a fun person to be around," said Mr. Harvill. "He made a heck of a good friend."

Yes, not just to the individuals who loved him best, but to the entire community.●

AFGHANISTAN

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, the political situation in Afghanistan and the terrible record of the Soviet military occupation of that country is one which should concern us all during this session of Congress. The Soviet Union has been making vague noises about disentangling itself from its war in Afghanistan and hinting that Moscow might be willing to "negotiate" a "settlement" of its military and political takeover of Afghanistan.

Mr. President, these Soviet hints regarding negotiations over their Afghanistan war are pure propaganda and we must recognize them as deliberate attempts to deceive the West, both now and in anticipation of the forthcoming summit meetings. They also hope to deflect the West from calling into question the Brezhnev doctrine. If it were in fact true that the Soviets wanted real negotiations over Afghanistan, it is clear to me that their purpose would be to try to obtain a political endorsement from the world community that the Soviet takeover in Afghanistan is legitimate and that the puppet government they have set up in Kabul is the legitimate representative of the Afghan people.

Mr. President, we in the U.S. Senate must be wary of these deceptions and guard against them. For that reason, I ask that the following statement entitled "A Negotiated Settlement to the Soviet Afghan War?", by Dr. Elie Krakowski of the Department of Defense delivered at the Heritage Foundation on January 16, 1986, which gives a penetrating analysis of Soviet aims and objectives in Afghanistan, and the reasons for Soviet noises over negotiations on that war, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The statement follows:

A NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT TO THE SOVIET AFGHAN WAR?

(Presentation by Dr. Elie D. Krakowski)

Has the Soviet position on a troop withdrawal from Afghanistan been shifting? Is Moscow about to accept what it has in the past always refused even to discuss?

Various Soviet public statements, both before and since the Geneva Summit, have been cited as implying a greater Soviet willingness to withdraw troops from Afghanistan.

The question is, Do they? If one is to rely on vague noises emitted publicly by Soviet officials there is in fact not much to go on. In the first place these public statements have not been accompanied by similar statements in private discussions with U.S. officials. Secondly, such rumours about alleged Soviet good intentions—somehow these never materialize into anything more than that—have had a habit of cropping up on various occasions.

Several examples of this tendency should serve as a useful reminder of the propensity for delusion. The New York Times, on February 1, 1980 quoted Armand Hammer as having been told by the Soviet Ambassador to Washington that "the Soviet Union planned to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan, but did not specify when." Added Armand Hammer: the Soviet Ambassador "has never lied to me." According to George Kennan (Washington Post, February 28, 1980), "The United States should not seek to increase the Soviet difficulty there, but rather to explore the hints that the Soviets may seek a way out." Or again, such flat statements as "the Soviet Union wants very much to negotiate its way out of Afghanistan" (Christian Science Monitor, 12/22/82). Dan Rather's pronouncement on CBS Evening News (January 25, 1983) that "there are indications tonight that the Soviet Union may be looking for a way to disentangle itself from Afghanistan."

Some might cite recent Soviet "frank admissions" about the cost of the war, and argue that the situation, six years after the Soviet invasion, is different. The Washington Post, for instance, made such a point recently: "Soviet officials, apparently concerned about the toll their six-year-old military involvement in Afghanistan has taken, have begun to voice complaints about rising casualties and admitted to reporters that they are 'not very happy' with the situation." (November 18, 1985) Here too, however, what is being said at the end of 1985 was already being written at the end of 1983: "As the diplomatic, military, and economic costs of its involvement have grown, Moscow has searched for a face-saving way out." (Selig Harrison, USA Today, 12/27/83).

The predilection for seeing far-reaching implications of a profound Soviet longing for a withdrawal of its troops have so far only been evident among some Western observers. Moscow has periodically encouraged such speculations in the Western press precisely because they serve Soviet purposes.

Moscow's negotiating posture has been clear from the start and has not, in fact, budged since then. It has insisted that the question of Soviet troop withdrawal is a purely bilateral issue between the Babrak Karmal regime and the Soviet Union and, therefore, of no concern to other parties. Moscow continues to assert that it was "invited" into Afghanistan and that, as a result it is up to those who so "invited" it in to request a withdrawal.

Even more central to its negotiating stance, Moscow has always demanded that cessation of outside support to the Afghan resistance precede any consideration of a Soviet troop withdrawal. The so far non-negotiable nature of that demand, its "unconditional surrender" character by now should have been obvious to all. Moscow is in fact saying that the only way it will ever withdraw is when the Afghan resistance has been eliminated. In other words, Moscow will remove its troops when there is no longer any reason for their being in Afghanistan. (There is strong reason to doubt that even then the Soviets would not withdraw willingly—the historical record speaks loudly on this score). It is significant that all the "hints" of a modification in the Soviet position do not even claim that this crucial condition is about to be modified. That is, what is being bounced around is the so-called existence of a "withdrawal plan"—not the removal of that most important Soviet pre-condition.

Furthermore, this so-called withdrawal plan—meaningless without the removal of the Soviet precondition on outside support to the resistance—has itself been tied in press accounts to another of the Communist objectives, direct talks between the puppet Babrak Karmal regime and the Government of Pakistan. According to the Washington Post (28 December 1985) the Afghan foreign minister "reportedly declared that he had details of a withdrawal plan in a folder in front of him on the conference table (reference is to the UN-sponsored "proximity" talks in Geneva) but that he would discuss them only face-to-face with Pakistani representatives—and not through the United Nations intermediary." The Soviet objective is obvious: force the outside world, in this case through obtaining Pakistani acceptance of direct talks with the puppet Babrak regime, to grant the legitimacy that that regime has been unable otherwise to achieve.

In addition, the Soviets are keenly aware that the very mention of the possibility of a deal over the heads of the Afghan resistance sends tremors through the ranks of the Mujahidin. It is that, as well as to sow confusion and doubt about each other's motives in the Pakistani Government and the Afghan resistance, that Moscow seeks to achieve through talk of timetables for withdrawal. More importantly, the Soviet Government, through such a diplomatic move, is attempting to create anxiety and distrust within the Afghan resistance and the Pakistani Government about the United States' motives and reliability.

In order to lay to rest, hopefully permanently, the recurring tendency of some in the West to attach significance to Soviet "withdrawal" "hints," it is necessary to go beyond the more narrow and immediate Soviet objectives described above.

When it is discussed, the war is usually described as a quagmire or a stalemate for the Soviets. The reality is, I believe somewhat more complex.

The general acknowledgement that fully one-third—and perhaps more—of the Afghan population has either been killed or driven into exile, apparently has not been sufficient to make clear the contradiction between a thus far successful Soviet policy of "migratory genocide" and assumptions of "stalemate."

The fundamental flaw with the view of the war as a stalemate, and hence with the derivative assumption about war weariness and an alleged Soviet desire for withdrawal, is that it misunderstands the character of the war, focusing on the short term, and excluding the Soviet perception of things. In part the reason for this can be attributed to American tendencies to project or mirror image. Americans cannot easily visualize anything but a quick war, a "knockout punch." This is particularly true in the Soviet-Afghan War, in which such manifestly unequal power is clearly in evidence. Anything short of clearcut and rapid victory, it seems, is automatically portrayed as a stalemate.

No doubt Moscow first thought that the massive rebellion it itself provoked could be squashed by its Afghan puppets with little direct Soviet involvement. No doubt in the period immediately following the Soviet invasion, Moscow may have believed that its show of force would be sufficient to destroy any opposition. The realization that it was dealing with an unusual enemy, however, came quickly. Within the first year following its invasion, Moscow settled into a long-term strategy whose basic objective has been to outlast the resistance, destroying in the process its support base. The Soviets have themselves on occasions made reference to their colonization/anti-insurgency campaigns of the nineteen twenties and thirties in what is now Soviet Central Asia as a model for their current strategy. And while, in essence, the Soviets have attempted to "empty the water out of the fishbowl," thereby ultimately killing the fish, they have also systematically—and most of the time unsuccessfully—attempted to coopt Afghans.

Ideal conditions for the pursuit of a long-term strategy of this sort would be the cessation of external support for the resistance, as well as ignorance of the conflict by the outside world.

Cessation of external support would rapidly lead to almost complete ignorance by the outside world. The various humanitarian and media organizations from various European countries and the United States would also disappear, and together with them, no doubt, whatever interest there has been in the war. Moscow would then be able, quietly and without any restrictions whatsoever, systematically to destroy any meaningful opposition to its rule. And, while the Soviets no doubt do not believe their own propaganda describing the war as an "undeclared war launched by the imperialists," they are confident that without external help the Afghan resistance will—especially at the current level of fighting—become quickly demoralized and subjugated. The soviets are also clearly conscious of the impact that cessation of aid to the Mujahidin would have on the millions of refugees now in Pakistan and Iran. In their rage and despair at being thus abandoned, the Mujahidin might well turn against the Pakistanis, thereby unwittingly furthering Soviet designs.

Current Soviet "hints" about "withdrawal" and "timetables," talks about a possible enlargement of the Kabul regime to include other political elements, the attempt to coopt Western European governments in this Soviet peace offensive, are all designed to further the above Soviet objectives. Put somewhat differently, the Soviets have used the UN-sponsored talks to lull the rest of the world into believing that the problem is solvable through negotiations alone, that if only "moderation" were exercised by outside powers, that if only we could give the Soviets "some help," the problem would be solved.

One might have expected a systematic Soviet campaign to encourage wishful thinking in the West to be accompanied, at least in the short term, by some attenuation in the level of fighting, as well as in the level of pressure placed on both the resistance and on the Pakistani Government. The opposite has been true. Soviet military actions have continued through the Afghan winter and, as the Wall Street Journal noted on January 9, 1986, there has been a marked increase in Soviet arms shipments to Afghanistan in recent weeks. Perhaps this tells us something about the amount of respect, or lack of it, Moscow has for Western public opinion.

The question which remains then, is not whether the Soviets are now in fact seriously contemplating withdrawal, but why they have chosen to make such a concerted effort at deception at this time.

One possible answer was given at the beginning of this presentation. It is simply that Moscow has made such noises periodically, especially around special events such as the recent summit, or around the time of sessions of the UN-sponsored talks. The magnitude of the current effort suggests additional explanations. One such additional elucidation is that the "peace" campaign on Afghanistan is part of a worldwide Soviet peace offensive that covers a broad range of subjects. In all of them, however, Moscow's objective is to take advantage of the willingness in the West to give the benefit of the doubt to a new Soviet leader, to portray the Soviet Union as "peace-loving," and to make the point that with some concessions by the West, better, more tranquil relations can soon be re-established.

There is a third, and in the context of Afghanistan, more important possible explanation, and that is that Moscow is responding at the diplomatic level, as well as at the military and other levels, to the changing situation on the ground. Let me explain.

The Soviets no doubt expected that with the passage of time interest in the Soviet-Afghan War would wane. They no doubt expected to continue facing a less and less effective, primitive, and primitively armed resistance that could be worn our with measured Soviet power.

The opposite has happened. Interest in, and opposition to, the war has grown in the six years since the Soviet invasion. Votes in favor of the annual United Nations resolution demanding Soviet withdrawal have encompassed larger and larger majorities, and include almost every member with the exception of Communist countries. Active participation in humanitarian efforts to relieve some of the barbaric conditions in which the Afghan people have been placed by Soviet actions, has grown significantly, and now represents many nations. The Afghan resistance, though suffering heavily, has become more effective and is now better equipped than in the past. In short, the Soviets probably feel that their dual strategy of outlasting the resistance while ensuring no more than minimal outside interest is being threatened by current trends. It is important to point out that what may thus be threatened is not necessarily the ultimate Soviet objective or subjugation, but Moscow's ability to move toward that objective with a relatively limited military commitment, and with no more than minimal external attention to both the conflict and Soviet methods in waging it. Furthermore, such Soviet ability to move toward the objective of subjugation in the fashion outlined will become significantly threatened only with the continuation of current trends toward a better equipped, more effective, resistance, and with greater worldwide interest. Then, the choice before them would become one between withdrawal and escalation. The situation would become one in which the Soviets would, as I have stated it elsewhere, have to escalate in order to win, but fail to achieve their ultimate objective if they did escalate.

The present Soviet approach—hard and intense on the battlefield, soft-sounding in the diplomatic arena—is responding to the developing situation by conveying in essence a single message.

That message is that they are as determined as ever to destroy and subjugate the resistance; that neither the resistance nor the Pakistani Government should put too much faith in the outside world because it will abandon them at the first opportunity. Hence the continuation of military operations at an intense level through the winter; hence the continued campaign of intimidation toward the Afghans and Pakistanis. Hence also the "hints" of withdrawal timetables, designed to undercut outside interest and support by encouraging the belief that increasing restraint by the outside world is the only way to a negotiated settlement. The "tough" component of the Soviet Technique is, if anything, meant to enhance further the appeal of the "peace" component by intimating that embracing the latter is the only way out of an increasingly painful course.

In conclusion, Moscow has probably decided that it has little to lose from the current exercise in deception. At the very least it will have injected an additional dose of distrust and suspicion on the part of the Mujahidin and of the Pakistanis toward the outside world, and helped demoralize somewhat the resistance. Should Soviet pressures for direct Pakistani negotiations with the puppet Karmal regime succeed—for such is the price demanded for the Pakistanis to see, and discuss, the withdrawal timetable—Moscow would have achieved the legitimacy that regime cannot otherwise attain. Beyond this, Moscow understands fully well that democracies, once having taken a step back from commitment, find it more difficult to recommit. Hence the attempt to erode that commitment through appeals to powerful impulses in the Western psyche.

The current series of Soviet "hints," then, does not convey a greater willingness to actually withdraw. The fact that the Soviets have found it necessary to put forth hints of withdrawal timetables, however, does suggest that they feel they now must go to greater lengths to obtain the same results as before. Diplomatically speaking, this may be progress of sorts. We will know that we are facing a changed situation when Moscow no longer insists that cessation or external support must precede talk of Soviet withdrawal. When will the Soviets decide to withdraw? One possibility is that they will do so only when the costs become great enough. The other is that Moscow will recognize before it actually faces the question of escalation, that the costs of such a course will be so great as to negate any potential benefits. Our hope should therefore be that the Soviets will understand sooner, rather than later, that it is in their interest to withdraw from Afghanistan and allow that brave people to resume control of their own destiny, free from the horrors and suffering that the current attempt at colonization carries with it.●

ANNUAL SURVEY OF NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOVIET JEWRY AND THE COALITION TO FREE SOVIET JEWS—1985

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to the 1985 annual survey on Soviet Jewry done by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews. The survey reviews the plight of Soviet Jews over the past year and describes the outlook for the future. Unfortunately, despite hopes raised by the Geneva summit, the picture for Soviet Jews remains bleak, and the need for continued efforts on behalf of this beleaguered community remains urgent.

In 1985, emigration levels remained relatively constant at a low level, with a little over 1,000 Jews permitted to leave during the year. But the survey points out that harassment of Jewish activists through arrests, trials, and other methods increased dramatically in 1985. And the vicious press campaign attacking Israel, Zionism, Judaism, and individual Soviet Jews continued unabated in 1985.

This report must reinvigorate our efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews. Congress has done a great deal to help, but its efforts must continue until every Jew who seeks to emigrate has been allowed to leave. And until those who want to stay are permitted the freedom to practice their religion in peace.

The continuing plight of the Soviet Jews serves as a reminder to the free world of the great strides necessary in the Soviet system to ensure both personal and political rights of Soviet citizens. Soviet Jews must receive our unwavering support as they struggle for ideals which we, as Americans, proudly cherish. We must continue to speak out and work for the freedom of Soviet Jewry until there is no need for an annual survey such as the one I have included in the RECORD today.

The annual survey follows:

ANNUAL SURVEY—1985

Nearly two months have passed since the November summit in Geneva between United States President Ronald Reagan and Soviet General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev. With the Soviet Party Congress approaching in February and the second round of summit meetings between Reagan and Gorbachev planned for June in Washington, D.C., there is still no concrete evidence—despite many rumors—of a significant improvement in the plight of Soviet Jews. In fact, on Monday, December 30, the Soviet Union issued a press statement labeling all rumors of an imminent large-scale Jewish emigration as "a vicious lie". The 1985 year therefore bodes ill for the future of this beleaguered community.

With respect to emigration, a relatively constant level was maintained, with an average of about 100 Jews per month permitted to leave. A comparison of the twelve months of 1985 during which a total of 1,139 Jews left, with those of last year when 896 received exit permits, demonstrates a continuing restrictive Soviet policy. Even those few allowed to leave did not, for the most part, include veteran refuseniks waiting over ten years, despite the welcome news that a handful of refuseniks, notably Eliyahu Essas and Yaakov Mesh, who were refused in the 70's, unexpectedly received permission to go to Israel. Former Prisoners of Conscience who served their terms also continued to be denied permits, with the exceptions of Isaak Shkolnik and Mark Nashpitz.

At the same time that emigration was kept low, the number of arrests, trials and other forms of harassment of Jewish activists rose alarmingly. Of the 26 Prisoners of Conscience sent to prison or labor camps, 12 were arrested or tried since the beginning of 1985—an average of one a month! The police methods employed in some cases were crude even by Soviet standards and involved, among other things, the planting of incriminating evidence. Since the major thrust of these police activities was directed at the informal network of Hebrew teachers, and Soviet authorities wished to maintain the myth that the study of Hebrew by Jews is permissible, the Soviets had a need to fabricate evidence of these teachers' alleged crimes. Wide-ranging searches were conducted in scores of homes in connection with these cases and involved the seizure of Hebrew instructional material as well as religious articles and books.

The tough Soviet policy was aptly demonstrated in the brutal beatings by KGB-provoked assailants of Jewish cultural activities, including film director Leonid Kelbert, who was hospitalized for his wounds, and twelve-year-old Avi Goldstein, son of Tblisi refusenik Isai Goldstein, who was beaten, stripped and photographed naked by his attackers. The general treatment of Jews in the prisons and camps also worsened, with Zachar Zunshain, Iosif Begun, Yuli Edelshtein, Simon Shnirman and Anatoly Shcharansky being particularly singled out for maltreatment. The maltreatment ranged from violations of these prisoners' rights to correspondence and visits, to long periods in isolation and punishment cells, as well as physical abuses by guards and fellow prisoners.

The past year did not see any diminution in the spate of vicious articles and television broadcasts attacking Israel, Zionism, Judaism and individual Soviet Jews. If there was a temporary abatement when Gorbachev assumed control of the party apparatus, they have now resumed their former level of frequency and intensity. "Zionists" of today continue to be equated with the "Nazis" of the past.

The response of Soviet Jews has been a renewal of public activities, manifested in petitions and protests to Soviet authorities, as well as to individuals and organizations abroad. These have focused on official abuses and on the renewed demand for "repatriation to Israel." A parallel development has been a steep rise in requests for Israeli citizenship.

SOVIET LEADERSHIP

These happenings took place against the background of leadership changes in the Soviet Union and within the framework of negotiations between the superpowers. Gorbachev has been rapidly and steadily consolidating his position, and changes to his advantage in the Party Politbureau and Central Committee Secretariat reflect this consolidation. Virtually all of Gorbachev's supporters, like himself, are proteges of former Party chief, and head of government, Yuri Andropov, who was also the former head of the KGB. Reflecting the ambivalence of the situation, his memory is now the subject of cult, promoted by the new leadership, even as Leonid Brezhnev and Konstantin Chernenko seem to slide into oblivion. It is also striking that 25% of the 13 members of the Politbureau have backgrounds in the police or the KGB. Also significant is the fact that the dread KGB, as an institution, appears to have obtained preeminence over the military. In the context of Gorbachev's new domestic policies, emphasizing strict discipline and the suppression of nonconformist behavior, the negative implications of these developments for Jewish activists is heightened.

This trend must be balanced against the opportunity offered by talks between the United States and the Soviet Union on a variety of subjects, including culture, science, arms limitation, and trade, as well as ongoing meetings between Soviet and West European leaders. The Soviet attitude towards Jews should serve as a test of the credibility of Soviet commitments and general good will. Jewish activists perceive the opportunity and are anxious that their fate be accorded a high place on the negotiating agenda of the superpowers. They recognize, however, that a strong public campaign on their behalf must continue to be waged.

The new Soviet leadership has already distinguished itself by a talent for public relations. This was demonstrated in an apparent campaign of disinformation on the Jewish question, designed to create the impression that the situation is improving and to defuse concern. Soviet policy makers would love to remove the matter entirely from the international agenda while the US and the USSR deal with other bilateral issues at the series of Presidential summits. Rumors which circulated in the months before the Geneva summit, of the impending issuance of large numbers of exit visas, proved false, the reality obscuring the moderate tone and the occasional hints with which the Soviet leaders chose to face the world. Similar rumors were spread by Soviet officials after the summit and were then vehemently denied in Moscow in an apparent attempt to throw critics in the West off balance.

It is unlikely that there will be any significant modification of the campaign for Soviet Jews, in the West, without any parallel substantial changes affecting the Jewish minority in the Soviet Union. There have been past occasions when Soviet representatives have given assurances that, if specific activities were to cease, some movement on particular cases could be expected. Such promises have not been fulfilled. Since the public advocacy campaign on behalf of Soviet Jews is a function of Soviet behavior, experience dictates that it remain constant in the face of the present situation.

THE ABORTION ISSUE

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, since 1973, when the Supreme Court ruling recognized a woman's right to choose abortion, opponents have attempted to overturn this decision through nearly 500 legislative initiatives. These initiatives seek to restrict abortion from several perspectives ranging from constitutional amendments to prohibiting abortion by statute. As the pro-choice advocates recognize this anniversary and the opponents work to reverse the 1973 ruling one single issue gains significance: that persons of sensitive and informed conscience find themselves on differing sides of the choice issue.

I strongly support the woman's right to terminate a pregnancy, but recognize that such a decision is not made lightly. One may struggle with the circumstances of their own ability to love and care for a coming child and the options a woman must choose from may all seem equally difficult. It is my belief that the pro-choice position is weighed with many responsibilities as we all work for greater respect for human life.

There is the responsibility of maintaining broad, accessible family planning to provide maternal and infant health care as well as preventive services. The provision of family planning services to low- and marginal-income persons can be instrumental in reducing or alleviating poverty and dependency. An especially important part of maternal and infant health is the timing and spacing of births—a key to adequate family planning services. And of course from the beginning, family planning has focused on preventive services to avert the unintended pregnancy. The consequences of pregnancy and childbearing for adolescents is particularly heartrending and family planning services have served to educate teenagers about the obligations of parenting and alternatives for prevention.

There is the responsibility of working for a better quality of life after birth. Our child nutrition programs, Head Start, assistance for the low income, education for the handicapped, and other special programs of benefit to children are all pro-life programs. They seek to improve the quality of life for all children regardless of a family's situation, a child's physical handicap, or other special concerns. Recognizing the value of life entails recognizing the hungry from the fed, the poor from the rich, and the sick from the well.

Coming full circle, though, we return to the value judgment placed on the issue of abortion. The belief in the right to choose abortion is based in philosophical and theological judgments, although no less weighty they cannot be imposed on a multireligious society.

The Supreme Court view in Roe against Wade stated that there is not a necessary relationship between the definition of legal personhood and a given theory of human life. One is the question of law, and the other a question of biology. On the question of law responsible individuals do and will probably continue to disagree.

The right to a safe and legal abortion is under attack from a specific group of opponents who seem to believe that in their effort to protect life, the sanctity of other lives may be threatened. Women have had their examining rooms invaded, children have come home from elementary schools with threatening notes in their school books, and our own domestic version of terrorism, clinic bombings—these incidences represent a trend that all free citizens should fear.

To conclude, I reaffirm my belief that reproductive freedom is a basic human right and while the right to choose abortion is a legal option I shall work to uphold this legal option.●

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES TO RECEIVE A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate turn to House Concurrent Resolution 268 providing for the State of the Union Address just received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (H. Con. Res. 268) providing for a joint session of Congress to receive a message from the President on the State of the Union.

The Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 268) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

INDEFINITE POSTPONEMENT OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 496

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 496 providing for the convening of the 2d session of the 99th Congress be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STAR PRINT OF SENATE RESOLUTION 280

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 280, which was introduced in the Senate on December 19, 1985, by myself, be star printed to reflect the following changes which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

RECESS UNTIL 12 NOON

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 noon on Thursday, January 23, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of Senators PROXMIRE and HART for not to exceed 15 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent that following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Under the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, at 1 p.m., a live quorum will begin. Immediately following the establishment of a quorum, a cloture vote will occur on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 638, the Conrail bill.

So I would guess that vote should come prior to 1:30 tomorrow afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. If cloture is invoked, the Senate will remain on the motion to proceed throughout the day on Thursday; and if it is involved, we will be on the bill or a substitute, as I understand it. So there could be other votes throughout the day tomorrow.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Does the majority leader expect the Senate to be in session on Friday?

Mr. DOLE. It depends. I would rather not be in on Friday, but I can announce that by 2 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. Could we debate TV in the Senate on Friday?

Mr. DOLE. I am not in a position to indicate that at this time.

RECESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 noon on January 23.

The motion was agreed to, and at 5:52 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, January 23, 1986, at 12 noon.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 22, 1986:

Jeffrey I. Zuckerman, of Maryland, to be general counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for a term of 4 years, vice David L. Slate, resigned.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Wayne D. Angell, of Kansas, to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for the unexpired term of 14 years from February 1, 1980, vice Lyle Elden Gramley, resigned.

Manuel H. Johnson, of Virginia, to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for a term of 14 years from February 1, 1986, vice J. Charles Partee, term expiring.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION SAFETY BOARD

Kenneth John Hill, of Virginia, to be a member of the National Transportation Safety Board for the remainder of the term expiring December 31, 1986, vice Donald D. Engen, resigned.

U.S. POSTAL SERVICE

Barry D. Schreiber, of Florida, to be a Governor of the U.S. Postal Service for the remainder of the term expiring December 8, 1992, vice Frieda Waldman.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

BLACK AMERICANS AND THE NFL

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, as football fans across the Nation prepare for the Super Bowl this Sunday, this is an ideal time to take a close look at the level of involvement of black Americans in professional football.

On Sunday, there will be a number of black Americans playing in the Super Bowl matchup between the Chicago Bears and the New England Patriots. Likewise during the regular professional football season, black America is well represented on the football field each Sunday. This is virtually the total and shameful extent of black Americans in professional football in this country today.

The meager number of black Americans in coaching and management positions is nothing short of disgraceful. While there are 32 black assistant coaches in the National Football League, the harsh reality is that there is not even one black head football coach. Even more appalling is the fact that with the wealth of talent of black Americans in all aspects of the game, not one black American—not even men with the talent or expertise of Bobby Mitchell—have received serious consideration for top management positions with any NFL team.

The Sunday Washington Post included an article by Ken Delinger which detailed this dreadful situation. At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to include it in the RECORD.

BLACKS ARE READY TO TACKLE MANAGEMENT JOBS, BUT THE NFL STILL BLOCKS THE WAY

Another season of shame has passed in the National Football League, one more year in which black men were judged qualified to star for their teams but not to manage them. For the 20th time in the Super Bowl's 20-year existence, blacks will be among the leaders on the field but not in the front office.

Our most popular sporting business is the least progressive. Probably, this massive appeal is a major reason for the NFL's management decisions.

Win or lose, most owners turn a tidy profit each year—and the value of their franchises escalates. Most stadiums either are sold out each week, or close to capacity.

So why even hop on the boat, let alone rock it?

Walter Payton can do everything in football just now except dream. Same with the exceptional defender who will lead his Patriots against Payton's Bears Sunday in New Orleans, Andre Tippett. Same with Henry Lawrence of the Raiders and so many more.

History shows that the NFL will make wonderful use of their bodies, but not their minds. If tactics were as slow to evolve in the NFL as social progress, teams still would be in leather helmets and running the single wing.

There is one general manager vacancy in the league and four head-coaching jobs open after the season. I would bet that not one black was even interviewed for any of them.

A generation ago, when somebody would inquire of NFL poohbahs why the ranks of head coach and general manager were lily-white, the answer was; name one qualified black.

That no longer works.

Want a black man qualified to be a general manager in the NFL? I can name one: Bobby Mitchell. Also, I can rattle off at least a half-dozen others who should have been groomed for managerial positions but were not.

Mitchell was.

He's been very good for a very long time, and still shut out. I cannot fathom how owners allegedly obsessed with winning could look past a Hall of Fame player who knows scouting and finances and who has organized training camps and Super Bowl functions. They have.

If Bobby Mitchell hasn't earned the chance to run a pro football team, Lee Iacocca isn't qualified to manage a Chrysler dealership on the Rockville Pike.

Vince Lombardi persuaded Mitchell to join Redskins management after his retirement in 1968; George Allen educated him in the ways of the league.

"I learned more football," Mitchell said in the spring of 1983, "more about the league and how to get things done under George Allen in those seven years [from 1971 through '77] than anybody [else] could have taught me.

"Like to have ran me crazy. I didn't have a gray hair when I met him. Three years later, it's gray all over. Dammit, though, he taught me. Have to give him credit for that . . .

"The only reason I stayed all these years was the hope that somebody eventually would say: 'Hey, Bobby Mitchell's good enough to do that.' I think about all the guys I used to have to show how to find a school who now are personnel directors or general managers.

"Certainly, in the back of my mind it's there. But it's not eatin' at me like it once was. This is a business where somebody has to take a chance. And most owners don't have that kind of guts."

As the Post's Gary Pomerantz reported recently, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of black assistant coaches in the NFL; there are 32 in all. Three (Tony Dungy of the Steelers, Billie Matthews with the Colts and Jimmy Raye of the Buccaneers) are in charge of an offense or defense.

Since 1981, the NFL also has sponsored a program during training camp that about 1,000 coaches from the nation's 48 predominantly black colleges have attended. That surely has speeded upward mobility.

Still, reacting to the 26-year-old son of Miami's Don Shula being prominently mentioned for the Eagles' head coaching job, Raye told Pomerantz: "We're always being told that being in the right place at the right time is important. I guess this is a case of being born in the right place at the right time.

Cynics suggest that Don Shula's grandson, David's boy, Danny, might be an NFL head coach before Raye and others from the black talent pool. Danny turned 2 in October.

Maybe many blacks are too smart to get into coaching. It's a business with more heartaches than glory. Even good head coaches are three knee injuries and two lousy drafts away from unemployment.

But Payton, Tippet, Lawrence or any other player—black and white—has devoted so much time to football that the logical career move is into coaching or management.

How appealing can that be when advancement seems no higher than being able to tell the fullback whether to run left, right or straight ahead. Or to make sure the frisky middle linebacker has gone beddy-bye at a decent hour before game day.

Pro football is life with a two-minute warning. Unfair a great deal of the time. Hundreds of talented white assistants and mid-level managers also have gotten bypassed.

There are hundreds of thousands of youngsters who aspire to football fame and fortune; there are 28 NFL head coaches and 28 NFL general managers. And one asinine attitude toward blacks: not yet.

LYNN WOOD RETIRING AS SHERIFF OF STANISLAUS COUNTY, CA

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, this spring Lynn Wood will retire from his post as Sheriff of Stanislaus County after 32 years of loyal public service.

Lynn was born in Alvarado, TX. He has spent the majority of his life performing duties for the betterment of our community. Over the years, Lynn has served on all three levels of law enforcement and security. He served as a member of the U.S. Marines during the Korean war before undertaking his initial position with the Stanislaus County sheriff's department in 1954. Sheriff Wood began his extensive career in civil service as jailer before many promotions such as those to lieutenant in 1962 and chief deputy in 1968. He was elected sheriff by the citizens of Stanislaus County in 1974. He is also past chairman of the Emergency Planning Committee of the California Peace Officers Association.

In addition, his educational focus has been on public service at the local, State, and national level. After receiving his bachelor of arts degree from the University of San Francisco, he obtained his peace officer standards and training certificate at the executive development level. Furthermore, he was also graduated from the FBI National Academy in 1968.

Lynn's dedication to progress and community improvement merits much admiration and respect. He has worked very hard to make his community, and thus our society, a better place to live. He is a life member of the Modesto Elks Lodge 1282, actively serving as the chairman of the board of the California-Hawaii Elks Association from 1982 to 1985. He is also a member of the Youth Advocacy Council and serves on the Muir Trail Girl Scout steering committee.

Lynn has been an influential and dedicated component of Stanislaus County in his many years of public service. On behalf of the citizens of Stanislaus County, I would like to thank him for all that he has done to maintain and improve the safety of our community.

NEW JERSEY FINDS SUCCESS IN ENTERPRISE ZONES

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, the debate on enterprise zones used to be a matter of theory. However in recent years we have seen much tangible evidence as the States have taken the lead in creating such zones. Now New Jersey has joined the ranks of States that have State designated enterprise zones. They have not been disappointed. Since August 1983, when enabling legislation was passed in the State of New Jersey, five zones have been created in Newark, Camden, Plainfield, Trenton, and Bridgeton. Since then, private sector investment of $125 million has been made by 380 companies, creating over 8,500 jobs. Because of this success five more zones have been approved.

The continual message we get from these States that have tried enterprise zones is that they work. Studies have shown that not only are jobs created, but these jobs tend to go to the long-term unemployed and disadvantaged. Another healthy sign is the number of existing businesses in the enterprise zones that are expanding in response to the incentives rather than closing their doors. Indeed, the retention and expansion of existing businesses is one of the most important elements of any revitalization strategy, especially in the older industrial areas of the Northeast and Midwest.

Enterprise zones are a departure from past urban policies in three ways: (1) they require virtually no new Federal bureaucracy, (2) they provide incentives for private sector job creation and investment automatically rather than through lengthy grant application procedures, and (3) they are designated to secure real commitments from the neighborhoods and up through the city, State and Federal levels of government. If an enterprise zone should fail to induce business activity, then it will not cost the taxpayer a cent. If tax credits are claimed, it is because people have been hired and a business has been formed or expanded.

So far, business, States and local governments have embraced enterprise zones enthusiastically. If Congress fails to followup on the experience the States are now providing us, we will have missed a golden opportunity to help get jobs and to help our cities.

GLOBAL ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH ORGANIZATION [GERO]

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Irwin W. Silverman of Weehawken, NJ, a constituent and a close personal friend of mine for more than 20 years, was recently appointed special consultant to Chancellor Huttenback at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

At the suggestion of Dr. Silverman, it was my good fortune to meet Chancellor Huttenback as well as the codirectors of the Global Environmental Research Organization [GERO], Dr. Daniel Botkin of the University of California and Dr. Angelo Orio of the University of Venice. I was invited by them to attend and address the conference sponsored by the Universities of California, Venice, and Padua held in Venice, Italy last October. As the mark up of the Tax Reform Act of 1985 was scheduled during the month of October, I was unable to attend.

Because of my deep interest in environmental matters and in the success of the project, I would like to share with my colleagues a report of the conference which was submitted to me:

A landmark in the history of environmental research was reached this year with the establishment of the Global Environmental Research Organization (GERO). Led by Codirectors Dr. Daniel B. Botkin of the University of California, Santa Barbara and Dr. Angelo Orio of the University of Venice, Italy, GERO was inaugurated at a conference dealing with Man's Role in Changing the Global Environment in Venice in October 1985. The conference introduced what Dr. Botkin called a "new science of the biosphere," which will encompass all aspects of environmental science. GERO's mission will be to lead a change in emphasis from negative to positive aspects of our abilities to technologically influence and manage our environment, and from a local and regional to a global perspective. The conference, attended by economists, geographers, geologists, chemists, biologists, academics from other disciplines, and government officials from various agencies, including the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the United Nations Environment Programme, underscored the inter-disciplinary dimension of the undertaking.

GERO is a broadly based program, whose initial conference drew 300 participants from 30 countries, including every major western European nation, the United States, Canada, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Poland, Israel, the People's Republic of China, Hong Kong, India, Bangladesh, Nigeria, and the Philippines (five papers from Soviet scientists were submitted to the conference; regrettably, none of the scientists were in attendance). Knowing that many environmental issues do not recognize geo-political boundaries, GERO is prepared to tackle issues which confront both industrialized and developing nations.

With headquarters in Italy and at the University of California, Santa Barbara, GERO will take an entirely new, constructive approach toward global environmental issues. As Lee M. Talbot of the World Resources Institute stated in the conference's concluding remarks, "sustainable use of resources can be achieved, and improvements in environmental quality can be obtained, if human wisdom and ability are well served by modern science and technology."

The Venice Conference was also addressed by the senior academic officers of the institutions which sponsor GERO: UCSB Chancellor Robert A. Huttenback, as well as Rector Giovanni Castellani of the University of Venice and Rector Marcello Cresti of the University of Padua. Each of them, as well as UCSB conference coordinators Dr. Margriet Caswell and Dr. John Estes, made a great contribution to the success of the conference. GERO is also attracting the interest of industry, banking, and government in expanding its foundations beyond the realm of academia; the World Bank and European Economic Community have already demonstrated interest by sending representatives to the first plenary conference.

The distinguished individuals who have come together to found GERO deserve both our praise and congratulations for breaking ground in the new and exciting science of the biosphere and for assembling an international body to assess and attack the international environmental problems which confront every resident of this planet. As UCSB Chancellor Robert A. Huttenback stated, "the Conference on Man's Role in Changing the Global Environment is significant and important in itself, but is not the end, or even the end of the beginning, of what we had in mind; it is rather the beginning of the beginning."

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join with me in extending warm congratulations to Dr. Silverman, Chancellor Huttenback, Dr. Botkin and Dr. Orio on the first plenary conference of the Global Environmental Research Organization. GERO's international and inter-disciplinary approach will open new avenues to solutions to the environmental challenges which we face.

A TRIBUTE TO BARBARA CAHN

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, on January 30, the Valley Stream Central High School District staff will honor a truly outstanding individual, Miss Barbara Cahn, for her efforts to strengthen school and community relations. Barbara is a constituent of mine from Wantagh, NY, and after 10 years of dedicated service, she will be leaving her position as the school district's community relations director for a well-earned retirement.

At this time, I'd like to say a few words in recognition of Barbara's successful efforts to promote support throughout the community for the local high schools. Barbara dedicated her energies to encouraging interaction and a beneficial working relationship between teachers, administrators, parents and students. This interest and mutual support is essential to meeting the educational needs of the community as well as the individual student.

Prior to her position as community relations director, Barbara worked for many years with the Massapequa Post, a popular weekly newspaper, meeting deadlines, writing, editing, informing people about the local events that are important in their daily lives. Working for the school district, Barbara successfully combined her skills in communicating with people and her interest in the local community. She revamped the concept of school and community relations and brought professional standards to a field that had never received the status it deserved. In addition, the New York State School Public Relations Association honored her with five awards in recognition of her noteworthy accomplishments.

I'd like to express my deepest gratitude to Barbara Cahn for her outstanding contributions to education and service to the community, and I wish her much health and happiness in the years ahead.

THE 1986 ELECTION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, January 22, 1986, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE 1986 ELECTION

With the 1986 elections less than a year away, political talk is beginning to heat up the congressional cloakrooms.

The stakes in the election are high both locally and nationally. With both political parties positioning themselves for the post-Reagan era, the consequences of this election could be greater than usual: Republicans could move within striking distance of becoming the majority party. The biggest national battle will be for control of the U.S. Senate, where Republicans now have a 53-47 advantage. A quieter year is expected in the U.S. House of Representatives, with most of the battles occurring over open seats. It is unlikely that Republicans will gain enough seats to overcome the Democrats' present 253 to 182 advantage. History suggests that the Democrats could solidify their control of the House: in mid-term elections in a President's second term, the party out of power in the White House usually gains seats. There will also be important races in 1986 in the states, where 34 of 50 governors are Democrats and two-thirds of the legislative houses have Democratic majorities. Just as Republicans must defend a disproportionate number of U.S. Senate seats, Democrats have to defend a disproportionate number of governorships. Because 27 of the 36 governors before the voters in 1986 are Democrats, opportunity is rich for Republican gains. The activity of the presidential contenders in both parties as they position themselves for the 1988 election will also be worth watching. The demands of building a national organization, and the intense competition for supporters and resources, drive contenders to increasingly early and elaborate efforts.

Given the high stakes, politicians at all levels are trying to come up with ways to appeal to apparently more open-minded voters. Voter affiliation with either party is at best loose. Recent polls show that the public's preference for political parties is nearly even, but that almost a third of the public identifies with neither party. Politicians are now looking past President Reagan and searching for themes that can win the voters' allegiance in future elections.

These politicians spend a lot of time arguing among themselves about the best way to appeal to American voters. Some favor an emphasis on issues; others stress broad themes. Issue-oriented politicians think voters decide on the basis of issues, like social security, the nuclear freeze, or the high deficit and interest rates. They believe that the way to win elections is to identify the issues most important to voters, then charge the opponent with being wrong on those issues and out of touch with the views of the majority. This issue approach is used in every election, and is especially popular in congressional campaigns. On the basis of some statement or vote, a political opponent is labeled a "big spender" or "soft on communism" or "lacking compassion" or "favoring the rich". One problem with this approach today is that, just eleven months before the next election, they do not detect an issue of overriding importance to the voters. They tend to think that now, with no crisis or great division, local issues will dominate the election, and that the personal, financial and organizational strengths of individual candidates will be more important than national trends and issues.

Another approach, popularized by President Reagan, deemphasizes specific issues, and stresses warmth, emotion, and personal values. In 1984, the President was successful in making people feel good about themselves and their country, and upbeat about their prospects. He was often more interested in creating a mood than in arguing about issues. His idea was that people vote more by how they feel about the candidate and general conditions, and less by their feelings on specific issues. Other politicians favoring this approach stress that people between 30 and 45 years of age cast a disproportionate number of votes, and tend to be the least ideological of all age groups, largely because they are preoccupied with family and personal concerns. Perhaps more than other voters, they are attracted to candidates who emphasize broad themes. Candidates who have a five-point plan for every problem do not make as good an impression on these voters as do those who appeal to values and life-styles. This approach worked well for an incumbent president in 1984 in a campaign dominated by television. A similar approach might not work as well for a challenger in a lesser race.

My view is that politicians must be cautious in choosing between these approaches. They must be ready to appeal to some voters on issues, and to others on broad themes. Recently I have come to believe that voters are concerned more with broad themes and general conditions, and somewhat less with specific issues. Above all, voters want government to keep the economy in reasonable order so that they can continue to provide for their families and tend to their concerns. They also want the government to keep the country out of needless military conflicts. In times when the economy is working reasonably well, and no military crisis looms, most voters will give politicians decent, if not high, grades.

I think that efforts to assess blame do not have as much effect on elections as politicians think. I do not find voters especially interested in efforts by politicians to place blame for failures or to claim credit for successes. Many voters do not have time to monitor closely the intricate political maneuvers in Washington, or to try to distinguish which party has a better approach to specific issues. They have more important and immediate things to do and to think about—principally, the conditions they face in their daily lives: Do they have jobs? Are prices going up? Is a war imminent? Announcing or denouncing specific policies undoubtedly has some effect on the outcome of elections, but I think that for most voters the issues are less important than their general feelings about the economy, security and the candidate.

Politicians may argue over the tactics and issues for 1986. They agree the stakes have rarely been higher.

ILL TREATMENT OF UNDOCUMENTED WORKERS

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as the House continues the debate on the reformation of immigration policy and the evaluation of the many issues involved, it is disappointing to read about the certain actions and beliefs of key administration officials charged with carrying out these policies.

The most recent Time magazine contains an article on Harold Ezell, the western regional commissioner for the Immigration and Naturalization Service, who apparently believes that acting out his Rambo fantasies by tearing up and down the Southwest border arresting illegal aliens is "fun," to quote him.

Aside from the fact that Mr. Ezell cannot even pretend to be qualified for the position he holds—his sole reason for having the job is the fact that he worked for the President in both his gubernatorial and Presidential campaigns—Mr. Ezell's philosophy on what should happen to those undocumented workers found in this country is summarized by saying: "If you catch 'em, yu ought to clean 'em and fry 'em yourself."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that most thinking people would recognize the depth of ignorance portrayed by such a statement on such a complex issue. What troubles me is that such a thing could be stated publicly by a Government official charged with at least having the semblance of being capable of performing his job without lapsing into tasteless "tough guy" posturing.

Racism has a thousand faces, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that Mr. Ezell, through his statements, has added his portrait to this collection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, January 14, 1986.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I would like to call to your attention an international incident which has developed in El Paso, Texas, over the last three days which the Federal Government has been either unable or unwilling to resolve.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) has refused entry to a band of about fifteen Mexican Indians who are in the process of making a walking pilgrimage from Mexico City to Los Angeles. The pilgrimage is designed to honor an ancient Aztec ruler. Because this band of Indians lacked the requisite papers for entry into the United States, the INS remains reluctant to act.

Based on conversations between members of my staff and representatives of both the INS and the Department of State (DOS), it appears that there is some degree of confusion as to which agency has primary jurisdiction in this area. It is also apparent that in order for a waiver to be granted to the Indians for normal visa requirements, certain conditions must be met.

I would appreciate your immediate intervention into this matter so as to guarantee a timely response on the part of our government to this problem in order to prevent the escalation of this issue into an international debacle. I would also take this opportunity to formally request a waiver of all traditional requirements for entry into this country in the case of these Mexican Indians. Based upon my personal review of the situation, I am convinced that these Indians seek entry for legitimate reasons and that our government should do all within its power to facilitate their stated intentions of continuing the pilgrimage to Los Angeles.

With kindest personal regards, I remain

Very truly yours,

RONALD D. COLEMAN,
Member of Congress.

IN HONOR OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I think Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. would be surprised that we are gathered here today, joining with millions of other Americans in cities and hamlets, in churches and courthouses, around banquet tables and kitchen tables, to continue a celebration—long overdue—to honor him now and for every year there is a United States of America.

I think he would be surprised that he was awarded the highest of honors that we have given to just two other Americans—George Washington and Abraham Lincoln—a national celebration of their birthdays. We don't do that often.

Dr. King said of himself, "If any of you are around when I have to meet my day, I don't want a long funeral, and if you get somebody to deliver the eulogy, tell him not to talk too long."

Well, here we are, remembering him in a way he didn't ask for, in a way he couldn't ever foresee. I think he would have been surprised.

I'd like to be true to his memory. I won't talk too long, and I'll speak about the ideals he lived for, instead of about him. Dr. King didn't care about himself—"It really doesn't matter with me now, because I have been to the mountaintop," he said—but he cared unto death about justice, peace, and righteousness.

Dr. King gave his life to a mortal struggle that can never be permanently won, but can be permanently lost if we aren't ever-vigilant in our support for human dignity.

He knew that each of us must be a constant caretaker for freedom. He said, "I can never be what I ought to be until you are what you ought to be. And you can never be what you ought to be until I am what I ought to be."

He knew if he blinked on his watch, the light of individual freedom could flicker and fade. And you and I must know that if we are not as vigilant as Dr. King, then racism, sexism, and ageism—all of the terrible "isms" that add to the slavery of the human race—can rise to the forefront, making us the weaker and the poorer for it.

Today, if you turn your head and pretend not to see, there are those in the U.S. Justice Department who will reinterpret the U.S. Constitution to forbid equal access and equal opportunity for all. They call this interpretation a "color-blind" Constitution, and say it is superior to the Constitution that led to the outlawing of segregation, to the Voting Rights Act and to the beginning of fairness in our society.

Today, if you turn your head, there will be no one to hear the voice of Winnie Mandela in South Africa. If you turn your head, there will be no one to prevent the President from an executive order dismissing affirmative action.

Dr. King showed us how never to turn our head, even if we would be called "maladjusted."

He said: "If you will allow the preacher in me to come out now, let me say to you that I never did intend to adjust to the evils of segregation and discrimination. I never did intend to adjust myself to religious bigotry. I never did intend to adjust myself to economic conditions that will take necessities from the many to give luxuries to the few. I never did intend to adjust myself to the madness of militarism, and the self-defeating effects of physical violence. And I call upon all of good will to be maladjusted because it may well be that the salvation of our world lies in the hands of the maladjusted."

As we gather today in celebration, let's remember that we dishonor Dr. King if we honor the man without the message. Let us all resolve to live this and every day in the true spirit of Martin Luther King, for when one of us in the human race loses dignity because of another who may not like our skin color, our sex, our religion, or the way we live, then all of the human race loses. Let us each and every one of us remember that well and remember the meaning of this day all year long.

DISTINGUISHED PUBLIC SERVANT: EARL TOULOUSE

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, it is through the dedication, professionalism, and zeal of public servants that our Nation's local, State, and the Federal governments are truly effective. Today I would like to pay tribute to a man who is the epitome of such a servant, Mr. Earl Toulouse. For 23 years as collector of revenue in Jefferson County, MO, Earl has made the collector's office into a professional organization that serves the county's taxpayers efficiently and effectively.

Throughout his tenure, Earl has worked with taxpayers and for taxpayers. When he assumed his position in 1962, the office had no filing system, no filing cabinets, and few employees. Earl has built the office into an efficient operation with professional staff whose first priority has always been serving the people fairly and honestly. It is quite a marvel that in all of his 23 years, the collector's office has been only 40 cents out of balance—a feat that both the public and private sector should strive toward. He has truly set a standard for effective government service.

Earl Toulouse has recently announced that this is his last term as collector of revenue. The third district wishes him a happy and healthy retirement. I ask my colleagues to join me today as I rise to extend my warm thanks to Earl for his contribution to public service.

Thank you Earl, and best wishes.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. SHEILA MEYERS

HON. ROBERT E. BADHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a truly outstanding citizen of my district, Mrs. Sheila Meyers of Fountain Valley, CA, upon her retirement from the Orange County Board of Education after a career of public service that has spanned more than 18 years.

In her years devoted to serving the needs of students, faculty, staff and parents of our community's fine public schools, Mrs. Meyers has demonstrated a broad scope of knowledge, expertise, understanding and care plus an immense capacity for hard work.

A recipient of the prestigious "Marian Bergeson Award" for outstanding school board service, Mrs. Meyers was first elected to the Fountain Valley School District Board of Trustees in 1968 after 2 years of service as chairman of the district's personnel commission. While a member of the board, she served two terms as president, two as president pro tem, four terms as clerk, and one as clerk pro tem. She was the district's representative at National and State school board conferences, served two terms as president of the Orange County School Boards Association, spent 7 years on the National School Boards Association Federal relations network and 8 years on the county committee on school district organization, including terms as chair and vice chair.

From 1980 to the present, she has been a member of the Orange County Board of Education, which has broad responsibilities for the education of hundreds of thousands of young people in a county of more than 2 million people.

Mrs. Meyers' commitment to the growth and betterment of her community does not stop with its schools, however. She has played active roles through the years with the March of Dimes, the Fountain Valley Library, the PTA, the women's auxiliary of Fountain Valley Community Hospital, the Little League, the Cub Scouts, the YMCA, and the Golden West College Citizens Advisory Committee.

The honors bestowed on Mrs. Meyers during this active and extensive period of public service are many, including plaudits from the State legislature, the National School Boards Association, the California School Boards Association and the Orange County School Boards Association.

It is a distinct honor for me to present the outstanding accomplishments of Mrs. Sheila Meyers for your consideration and recognition. Here is the kind of personal, individual commitment and dedication that makes our Nation truly great.

RIGHT TO LIFE OF UNBORN CHILDREN

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, today, on the 13th anniversary of the Supreme Court's Roe versus Wade decision, the attention of Congress and many throughout the Nation is focused on the issue of abortion. Although I realize this is a sensitive issue—one which many consider to be very personal—I cannot morally ignore it.

My feelings on this issue are deeply rooted in my life—a combination of my religious beliefs and lifetime commitments. Abortion is wrong, except in very rare instances such as when the life of the mother may be in danger because of the pregnancy. Fortunately, this belief is shared by a majority of residents of the Second District of Idaho.

During the recently completed session of Congress, I voted my conscience and consistently opposed legislation that would further encourage the morally wrong choice of abortion and as this new legislative year begins, I will continue to oppose legislation which promotes abortion or allows Federal dollars to be used to fund abortions.

I find statistics, which graphically show the number of abortions being performed in this country, staggering. Although it's very difficult to say for certain how many abortions are performed each year, the National Right to Life Committee estimates that 1,573,900 abortions were performed in 1985.

The legalization of abortion has had a dramatic effect on millions of couples who find adoption increasingly difficult. From 1957 to 1970, according to information from the National Committee for a Human Life Amendment, the number of children adopted rose annually from 91,000 to 175,000. However, since 1970, when abortion-on-demand first occurred in some States, the trend has reversed. During the first 5 years of legalized abortions, annual adoptions decreased 20 percent to 140,000.

There are many issues facing us in the House of Representatives this year. Protecting the lives of unborn children must be among our priorities. Toward this end, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of legislation introduced by Representative HAROLD VOLKMER which would amend the Constitution to define "person" to include unborn children for the purpose of the right to life guarantee.

As we begin a new legislative year, I remain committed to supporting legislation which supports the right to life of unborn children. I will continue to oppose legislation which supports abortion or promotes the use of Federal money to fund abortions. I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort.

DISARMAMENT BY STAGES

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, Mikhail Gorbachev's recent arms control proposal should be carefully considered by President Reagan. Although Gorbachev's goal of complete disarmament by the year 2000 may not be reached, elements of the first two stages of his three-stage program are encouraging.

Gorbachev has placed the ball in President Reagan's court, and it is his turn to respond. It has become increasingly evident that unless star wars is restricted to laboratory research, no reductions in offensive nuclear weapons are possible. President Reagan should recognize the opportunities for progress inherent in the new Soviet proposal, and drop his stubborn insistence that star wars be completely insulated from arms control. If President Reagan does not do this, he will lose his best opportunity to realize his rhetorical goal of eliminating all nuclear weapons from this planet.

I would like to call my colleagues' attention to a recent Boston Globe editorial on this important issue.

The article follows:

DISARMAMENT BY STAGES

The Kremlin's proposal for staged reductions in nuclear weaponry and its three-month extension of the unilateral moratorium on test explosions are keeping political pressure on the Reagan administration.

The commitment to the elimination of nuclear weapons by the year 2000 with a "universal accord that such weapons should never again come into being" is the least important element of the proposal. As nuclear-deterrent forces are thinned toward the vanishing point, the weapons remaining would assume great importance. Thus, complete disarmament is a theoretical goal unlikely to be reached for decades, if ever.

The intermediate stages proposed by Mikhail Gorbachev are more realistic. They will have an impact on Western public opinion, which no doubt was the reason for the announcement.

In the first stage, lasting five to eight years, Gorbachev proposes a 50-percent cut in long-distance nuclear weapons, together with the elimination of medium-range missiles that the United States and the Soviet Union have based in, or targeted on, Europe. The superpowers would also freeze their tactical, or "battlefield," weapons.

In the second stage, beginning in 1990 and extending five to seven years, other nuclear powers such as Britain and France would eliminate their nuclear forces. The superpowers would cut their tactical weapons.

This two-step sequence represents a substantial Soviet concession. Previously, the Kremlin had insisted on being compensated for British and French forces targeted on the Soviet Union, to maintain equal warhead counts on both sides. This was one issue on which the 1983 round of negotiations to reduce "Euromissiles" foundered.

Now, the Russians have moved to the sensible position that the superpowers, with their far larger arsenals, should move first. Whether this initiative will lead anywhere hinges on the Reagan administration.

To negotiate any cuts in offensive forces, the administration will have to change its stance on space weaponry.

"Star wars" technology is an acceptable subject for laboratory research. But unless it is held short of testing outside the laboratory, it will block any chance of cuts in offensive weapons. This is the Soviet position, one that many Western security specialists agree with.

In recent months, Soviet arms-control positions have had increasing appeal to the Western public. President Reagan should modify his goals on "star wars" and muster the flexibility, initiative and realism needed to match Gorbachev's pace—and possibly steal his thunder.

MERCHANT MARINE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today that will help to reverse the critical decline of a vital national resource—the U.S.-flag merchant marine. Foresighted leaders have long recognized the strategic and defense importance of merchant ships. In peace, they are the links that assure uninterrupted commerce. In war, they are the only reliable supply lines for our overseas forces.

Since merchant vessels are such an important resource many nations have developed elaborate methods to support their fleets. Unfortunately, over the last few years we have abandoned many of the programs that helped our fleet compete on the world market. I have never believed our merchant fleet should depend on the Government for its survival. The level of Government subsidy should not be the factor that determines which companies survive and which fall. However, I do believe it is fair and reasonable for the Federal Government to step into the international marketplace and assure the scales are balanced.

This legislation is aimed at decreasing the Government's regulatory role by eliminating requirements that make our fleet uncompetitive while offering the bare minimal assistance necessary to preserve the balance between U.S.-flag ships and their subsidized competitors.

If you examine the U.S. role in the maritime marketplace, it is evident we have largely played not a promotional role but rather an equalizing role. Just as we impose countervailing tariff duties on foreign goods to offset foreign government subsidies so, too, we need to offset foreign government subsidies given to foreign-flag shipping lines.

The centerpiece of this legislation is to build foreign authority. Currently, U.S. operators who receive operating-differential subsidies are prohibited from purchasing vessels built in a foreign yard. Since the elimination of the ship construction subsidy in 1981, it has not been financially feasible for U.S. operators to purchase vessels in the United States because U.S.-built ships cost two or three times more than foreign-built ships. Vessels obtained under this provision would be eligible for a 5-year subsidy for crew costs and insurance. Currently, subsidized operators receive subsidy for 20 years. The shorter subsidy period for foreign-built vessels will reduce Federal Government outlays while still offsetting foreign subsidies for the first 5 years a vessel is under U.S. registry.

Other important provisions of the bill relate to the Cargo Preference Program and will meet some of the past criticisms of the program.

First, the legislation will eliminate the prohibition barring reflagged vessels from the preference trade for their first 3 years under the U.S. flag. By increasing the pool of available vessels this provision will reduce the cost of the Cargo Preference Program.

Second, the legislation addresses the complaint that cargo preference rates are sometimes incorrectly based on the assumption that vessels carrying preference cargo will return to the United States empty. The legislation still allows operators to charge rates based on the assumption that they will not be carrying cargo on their return trip. However, the bill provides that if a ship carries cargo on any portion of the back haul, or if the vessel is scrapped while overseas, the operator wil be required to refund a portion of the money he received for that voyage to the Government.

Finally, the bill provides for the exclusive use of U.S.-flag vessels for the shipment of U.S. mail. This provision constitutes Government recognition that companies operating U.S.-flag ships should be given preference over foreign shipping companies. If U.S. vessels are not available at fair and reasonable rates or if U.S. vessels cannot provide sufficient service, the Postal Service would be permitted to use foreign-flag vessels.

Other provisions in this legislation though mainly technical, will streamline the administrative process and further deregulate the ocean shipping industry.

Let me assure my colleagues, I do not see this bill as a panacea for the shipping industry. Certainly, during consideration of this legislation other useful proposals may be presented. I only hope this bill will be a useful first step leading to the enactment of meaningful legislation that will help U.S. carriers compete more effectively while reducing Government outlays.

THE DRUG THREAT TO NATIONAL SECURITY

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, when the administration talks about threats to our "national security," it usually refers to the adventurism of the Soviet Union. But, another threat exists—drugs.

I, therefore, am flabbergasted by reports that the fiscal year 1987 budget may decimate the Customs Service—one of the agencies that is battling the drug threat to our security.

According to these reports, Customs will lose $69 million. About half will come from a decimation of the Customs Air Service. This cut would ground the P-3A aircraft that just now are being used to track drug traffickers entering south Florida.

I am reminded of what nearly occurred several years ago. The administration wanted the Defense Department to handle Customs' Air Interdiction Program, but the Pentagon refused. Congress finally insisted on maintaining the Customs program to prevent a reduction in our antidrug efforts.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for this administration to realize that drugs are as important a threat to American society as communism. Rhetoric will not stop drug traffickers. And neither will the Customs Service if we accept these draconian reductions.

MIAMI HERALD EDITORIAL COMMEMORATES REAGAN'S DECISION TO HONOR SALT II TREATY

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, an important editorial came to my attention recently regarding U.S. policy toward the SALT II Treaty—the strategic arms limitation treaty signed in 1979, but never ratified. Published in the December 26, 1985, Miami Herald, the editorial emphasizes the key role the SALT II Treaty has played in limiting the number of long-range missiles that either superpower may deploy.

In a letter sent to the President in mid-December I described the President's decision last June to follow a policy of not undercutting the SALT II Treaty as a testament to his commitment to achieving mutual and verifiable arms control agreements. I also urged him to continue U.S. adherence to the treaty.

The President reaffirmed his commitment to the treaty when he recently decided to continue U.S. adherence to the SALT II Treaty after its expiration on December 31, 1985.

As the editorial points out, "the United States and the Soviet Union both have dismantled weapons whose continued existence would have placed them in violation of SALT II limitations." Moreover, while it "has been a bleak year for arms control, the President's decision to continue honoring SALT II averts a costly step backward." I might also add that the President's decision averts a potentially destabilizing impact on the United States-Soviet arms control negotiations in Geneva.

I encourage my colleagues to carefully read this editorial commending the President's decision to honor the SALT II Treaty. The text of the Miami Herald editorial follows:

[From the Miami Herald, Dec. 26, 1985]

NUMBERS DO MATTER

After a year of ominous fulminations, President Reagan quietly has decided against trashing the SALT II Treaty when it expires on Dec. 31. Mr. Reagan's restraint offers welcome reassurance that neither he nor his key advisers have resigned themselves to resuming unbridled arms competition.

Mr. Reagan, mind, has never been a champion of SALT II. The Senate never did ratify the 1979 accords, which limit the number of long-range missiles (ICBMs) that either side may deploy. The President has criticized the treaty for countenancing what he perceives as a Soviet advantage in strategic weapons, and arms-control opponents within his Administration allege that repeated Soviet violations have rendered the agreement meaningless.

But even SALT II's critics concede that both sides have observed the weapons ceiling fixed in the treaty. In fact, the United States and the Soviet Union both have dismantled weapons whose continued existence would have placed them in violation of SALT II limitations.

Whether the number of strategic weapons that either side is permitted to deploy matters as much as the character of those weapons—their mode of basing their targetability, their usefulness in a pre-emptive strike—is a legitimate question. But it's a long way from there to the conclusion that numbers are irrelevant. Numbers do matter, if only because neither side can afford—economically, politically, or morally—to devote ever-increasing proportions of its resources to the production of strategic weapons.

It has been a bleak year for arms control, but the President's decision to continue honoring SALT II averts a costly step backward. If he is to build on his predecessor's modest arms-control legacy, Mr. Reagan must continue to reject any return to unrestrained arms competitions as vigorously as he rejects recourse to nuclear arms themselves.

PITTSBURGH AND ITS SUCCESSFUL TEACHING CENTER

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, back in the late 1970's, the Pittsburgh public school system was experiencing some difficulties with a court-ordered desegregation directive and a general perception by disillusioned parents that public education was on the decline. Starting in 1980 the city school system, under the direction of Superintendent Richard C. Wallace, Jr., set about to cure the ailing educational system with a unique set of remedies. First, a workable desegregation plan was enacted calling on voluntary and mandatory shifts in student assignment and then a "teacher center" was instituted.

I would like to take this opportunity to share with you the success Pittsburgh has had in rebuilding its inner city school system. In two articles recently run in the Christian Science Monitor the model teacher center program was discussed at some lenght. I would like to submit these articles for the RECORD.

THE ARTICLES

As Jake Milliones, school board president so aptly points out, "so much in education has to do with what you expect from students and teachers". The Pittsburgh system, through its instructional experiment, has made great strides toward the goal of teacher and student improvement.

PITTSBURGH REBUILDS ITS INNER-CITY SCHOOL SYSTEM

(By Keith Henderson)

In the late 1970s, Pittsburgh public schools were stuck in a political quagmire.

The school board was locked in wrangling over court-ordered desegregation. Parents, disillusioned by both that struggle and what they saw as a general decline in public education locally, were whisking their children away to private and parochial schools.

A half dozen years later, those storm clouds have largely dispersed.

The city's schools now draw more praise than scorn. Theodore Sizer of Brown University, a prominent critic of public education, hails the city's efforts to "improve schools by helping teachers improve themselves." Eileen Dewalt, a parent volunteer at Pittsburgh's Schenley High School who had taken her son, Jason, out of the city school system, is now "impressed by what the public schools are offering."

What happened? First, in 1980 a workable desegregation plan was finally put in effect, mixing voluntary and mandatory shifts in student assignment. Then administrators and board members zeroed in on the "root cause of the desegregation movement—the quality of education," according to Richard C. Wallace Jr., the superintendent.

Among other things, the district set up a program called MAP (Monitoring Achievement in Pittsburgh) to establish districtwide goals for each subject—e.g., math, reading, writing—and for each grade level. It developed an "instructional model" (dubbed PRISM) that is now used throughout the system to train and evaluate teachers. And it converted an aging hulk of a high school—Schenley, formerly considered one of the worst schools in the city—into a teacher center, where instructors are given eight-week refresher courses.

The payoffs from all this are starting to roll in. Over the last four years all the city's public elementary and middle schools have risen above the national norm in academic achievement tests. In 1981, by contrast, almost half these schools were below that norm. The high school dropout rate is down to 21 percent, from 35 percent five years earlier.

And perhaps most gratifying, the flow of students away from the public schools has reversed. Some 3,400 children have enrolled over the past three years.

Dr. Wallace is widely acknowledged as chief architect of Pittsburgh's educational rebuilding effort. Seated in a spacious office in the block-long Greek Revival administration building, the superintendent recalled his initial task on taking the school district's reins in late 1980: to hammer together a firm list of priorities from a sprawl of "concerns and anxieties."

Working with experts at the University of Pittsburgh, he and his staff surveyed the community—children, parents, teachers, administrators—to see what was on people's minds.

The superintendent took his findings to the school board with the message that, as he put it, "This is what the district says are problems to be addressed." Leading the list: better student achievement, better evaluation of teachers and other personnel, and dealing with declining enrollments.

The board's unanimous approval of these and other priorities was "the most significant thing that's happened in the district," Wallace says. A few months later the board united behind the programs designed to meet those priorities, including the MAP, PRISM, and teacher center projects.

The big difference between now and six years ago, observes school board president Jake Milliones, a clinical psychologist by profession, is a firm emphasis on instruction. "And Dick Wallace is an instructional leader," he adds.

Among other things, the board wanted Wallace to get rid of incompetent teachers.

Instead of going at this as a "weeding out" process, the superintendent decided to view the task as "a strong effort to improve the performance of all the people in the district." That's where PRISM (Pittsburgh's Research-based Instructional Supervisory Model) came in.

"From my perspective," says Wallace, "it's the most important thing we've done—a massive staff development effort."

The tenets of good teaching included in the PRISM model—teaching to an objective, monitoring learners, consistent observation of teachers, among others—are hardly new. But Pittsburgh's thoroughness in promulgating them throughout a large urban school district is. This effort is part of what Dr. Sizer terms the city's "marvelous unwillingness to think that educational reform is simply a matter of testing and grades."

While some teachers have been fired—20 or so in the last three years—the emphasis, says Sizer, is on "not hassling them, but trying to get the best in them to emerge."

Superintendent Wallace explains that the job of teaching the PRISM model began with a four-member "staff development team" assigned to work with principals and supervisory people.

Individual teachers were brought into the program through the teacher center at Schenley High School. A similar center for elementary teachers is just getting under way at the Brookline Elementary School.

In some ways, the city's schools are building on inherent strengths.

For one thing, the district has independent taxing authority and a citizenry willing to support education observes Dr. Milliones. For another, the local teachers' union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers, has been willing to work closely with the district to "professionalize" classroom work. And teachers' pay in Pittsburgh is unusually high—a district average of $35,000 a year.

There is little doubt, however, that innovations of the past few years have been crucial to turning the district around. But Milliones is quick to point out "there's still a ways to go." The board president, himself black, wants to see an even greater effort to close the gap between the achievement of white and black students.

"It's narrowing," he concedes, "but at a pace I'm certainly not satisfied with." In particular, he sees a need to further trim the dropout rate. "We cannot write off any of our kids."

So much in education "has to do with what you expect" from students and teachers, Milliones concludes. In that regard, certainly, Pittsburgh has made genuine strides.

NEW LIFE FOR PITTSBURGH'S SCHENLEY HIGH

(By Keith Henderson)

Not long ago, Pittsburgh's Schenley High School had all the earmarks of a depressed inner-city school: deteriorating physical plant, an all-black student body, soaring dropout rate, and dismal academic performance.

But the school's image has shifted radically in the last three years. Beginning in 1983, Schenley became Pittsburgh's High School Teacher Center, a place where educators from all parts of the city can sharpen their classroom skills. The school attracted top teachers—180 applicants for 75 openings—district superintendent Richard Wallace recalls. "Magnet" programs such as international studies—designed to draw high-achieving students—were placed there. Physical improvements, including construction of a new gym, are under way.

Schenley is also piloting Pittsburgh's critical thinking" curriculum, aimed at getting high school students to wrestle with Kant, Bacon, and other classical philosophers. What goes on now at Schenley is a kind of multilayered education—for both children and teachers.

A visitor to Harry Bratsky's ninth-grade social studies class sees something akin to a college-level discussion seminar, with Mr. Bratsky firing questions. The students come back with some fairly spirited answers about social security funding and other issues.

A short walk down one of Schenley's cavernous halls, Roger Babusci—a former Pennsylvania "teacher of the year"—helps a class of 10 or 15 pupils negotiate the mysteries of punctuation. These students, from a mix of ethnic backgrounds, need help with fundamental language skills.

In the music room, Ralph Hill admonishes the girls' chorus, "You may not realize it, but you have to sing this Thursday in front of strangers. . . . Sing it now like you're going to sing it Thursday!" Dr. Hill is one of 25 clinical resident teachers (CRTs) at Schenley. They serve as mentors to other teachers in the district, along with handling regular classroom responsibilities of their own.

Four times a year, a new set of 46 to 48 teachers comes to Schenley to begin an eight-week training program. Their regular duties are taken up by replacement teachers assigned from the teacher center.

The first two weeks of the program are spent in seminars devoted to educational theory. The last six focus on applying that theory in Schenley's classrooms, under the tutelage of CRTs. Each visiting teacher conducts 12 classes during his or her stay. Conferences follows each class—a time for comment and useful criticism.

"We're trying to develop a collegial atmosphere," says Judy Johnston, director of the teacher center. Throughout the program, she explains, every effort is made to be "sure that observing of other teachers is seen as positive," not threatening. As many as 200 teachers were involved in drawing up plans for the center, so it's less something imposed on them than something they helped shape.

Evaluations of those who've been through the program have shown clear gains in such areas as responsiveness to students and ability to concentrate on "the learning task," Dr. Johnston notes.

The training program at Schenley is scheduled to end after 1987. By that time all the high school teachers in the district—900 of them—will have taken part.

The "big-buck question," as Johnston puts it, is how well gains made at the center will be maintained. One key, she says, could be the role of department chairmen in the city's various high schools. They could be instrumental in reinforcing the teaching theory and practice learned at Schenley.

Meanwhile, students at Schenley have shown their own "dramatic improvement in achievement," according to superintendent Wallace. In language skills, for instance, test show 68 percent of the student body is at or above national norms. Three years ago the figure was 27 percent.

Even in "filtering out" the white students—the school is now 30 percent white—there has been remarkable improvement, adds Jake Milliones, president of the city's board of education. Not long ago Schenley was "thumbs down," he says. The main thing, in his view, is that a "climate of learning" has been built within the school and should persist well beyond the four-year run of the teacher center.

Wallace points out that the Schenley Teacher Center costs over $1 million a year and a Ford Foundation grant was crucial in getting the project rolling. He and others in the district, however, have few doubts that it's a sound investment in the future of education in their city.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HIROSHIMA NIKKEI JIN KAI

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of the U.S. Congress a monumental event in the history of the Hiroshima Nikkei Jin Kai. This exceptional organization will be marking its 80th year with an anniversary celebration and new year's party to be held in Sacramento on the afternoon of January 11.

The motivation behind the formation of this remarkable group was deep concern for immigrants coming to the United States from the Hiroshima Prefecture. One of the problems exacerbated by the language barrier was the difficulty of borrowing money from American banks. Based on trust and selfless desire to help, this group came together to assist those facing this serious problem. Over the years the responsibilities of this outstanding club have grown to incorporate those of the community while still generously attending to the special needs of its members.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of Sacramento, I want to commend this worthy group and offer my best wishes for continued success in all of its endeavors in the coming years.

IN RECOGNITION OF NEW YORK STATE SENATOR RICHARD SCHERMERHORN

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, today I call the Members' attention to an outstanding legislator from the great State of New York, State Senator Richard E. Schermerhorn. I do so on the occasion of Senator Schermerhorn's recognition by the Republican Committee of the town of Newburgh, NY, as "Man of the Year."

Dick Schermerhorn was first elected to the State senate in 1970, and is presently serving his eighth term in office. During the last 16 years, he has received a long list of awards from the State's uniformed service organizations, including police organizations and professional firefighters. The American Legion has honored the senator for his service in public office and for his Americanism. Senator Schermerhorn was the first recipient of the New York State Youth Bureau Award for Distinguished Services for "promoting the welfare of youth."

The senator enjoys membership in a variety of civic and fraternal organizations, and has served his community faithfully on many different levels. He is also the president of Richard Schermerhorn Insurance, one of the largest insurance agencies in the lower Hudson Valley.

It is only fitting that this dedicated elected official be named "Man of the Year" by those who know him well. He has served as a model of leadership and involvement for the people of the Hudson River Valley. His many years of hard work and service deserve gratitude and praise, and I join the Newburgh Republicans in thanking and commending State Senator Richard E. Schermerhorn.

HOLDING CYPRUS HOSTAGE

HON. MARK D. SILJANDER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, the Cyprus problem, which now spans more than 30 years, has been a matter of concern to the House for a number of years. It has now reached a critical point.

When the leaders of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities agreed to meet in New York a year ago, there was genuine hope that 4 months of proximity talks conducted by U.N. Secretary General Peres de Cuellar had succeeded in bringing the two sides close to a settlement.

Regrettably, the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr. Kyprianou, refused to accept the draft agreement put forward by the U.N. Secretary General.

Dissatisfaction with Mr. Kyprianou's action which led to failure of the summit prompted even the Greek Cypriot National Assembly to formally censure him twice.

Many observers have long suspected that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou has been encouraging Mr. Kyprianou's intransigence on a Cyprus settlement. Mr. Papandreou's intervention in the December Greek Cypriot elections, with a warning to the electorate against accepting a settlement formula unacceptable to Greece, was clearly designed to undermine support for the opposition parties, which had made Mr. Kyprianou's handling of the Cyprus negotiations the central campaign issue.

It is paradoxical indeed that Mr. Papandreou decided upon such an open intervention in the Greek Cypriot political process, considering his often proclaimed commitment to the principle of nonintervention in Cyprus.

Mr. Papandreou's action at this critical juncture will certainly have a negative effect on the Secretary General's ongoing efforts to find a solution to the Cyprus problem.

The Wall Street Journal, in a recent editorial titled "Holding Cyprus Hostage," focused on Mr. Papandreou's role in failure to make progress on the Cyprus issue. It clearly describes the current state of affairs, and I commend it to my colleagues.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Dec. 26, 1985]

HOLDING CYPRUS HOSTAGE

For years Greece's premier, Andreas Papandreou, has tried to compensate for his domestic shortcomings by thumbing his nose at both the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which protects his nation, and the Common Market, which subsidizes it. This has often seemed more silly than sinister. But he has looked a bit nastier as he's tried to embarrass Turkey by flogging the Cyprus issue.

It's time for the Western democracies to sit on Mr. Papandreou. The Greek premier recently attacked a Greek Cypriot parliamentary opposition that had been promoting a more conciliatory line toward Turkish Cypriots. U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar has been trying to prevent total collapse of once-promising talks between Cyprus' resident Greek and Turkish leaders. The U.S. State Department is trying to lend its good offices as well. Finally, EC commissioner Claude Cheysson has been conducting negotiations for a customs union between Cyprus and the EC.

The latest haggling over trade benefits from the EC illuminates the real reason the much-lamented "Cyprus problem" has not been solved. The Greek Cypriots and their Greek guardians have had little incentive to do so. An exclusively Greek Cypriot government is recognized by all but Turkey as the only legitimate voice of Cyprus. Consequently it is Greek Cypriots who get the millions in aid from such institutions as the EC, UNESCO and the World Bank. A Greek Cypriot embargo against the north has helped ensure that Turkish Cypriots remain in relative squalor, dependent upon Turkey for sustenance as well as security.

This dismal state of affairs continues primarily because it serves Mr. Papandreou. So long as Turkish troops remain in North Cyprus to protect the lives and property of Turkish Cypriots, Mr. Papandreou can present Turkey as an imperialist aggressor. Yet while criticizing Turkey, he calls for Cyprus to be unified with Greece.

Now it's true that Turkish troops are in Cyprus and that they invaded the island in July 1974. But the Turks can legitimately claim that the invasion would not have occurred had not Greek Cypriots abused their role as the majority population and had there not been a military coup against then President Makarios, who described it as an invasion by Greeks led by Greek officers. Greece was then run by the colonels who'd taken power through their own coup in 1967 and certainly were no heroes in the eyes of Mr. Papandreou and his fellow leftists. Yet Mr. Papandreou has not improved much on their Cyprus policy.

Turkey, for its part, has been moving closer to the West under Prime Minister Turgut Ozal. Joint European and U.S. recognition of a federated Cyprus would go a long way to guarantee the democratic rights of Turkish Cypriots and put pressure on the Greeks and Greek Cypriots to reach an accord with them. Such recognition could apply to Turkish Cypriot passports; it would entail allowing trade and communications to go directly to Turkish Cyprus and consulting the Turkish Cypriot leadership in any decisions affecting the island. Indeed, Western institutions like the EC and the World Bank should divide up the money earmarked for Cyprus between the two Cypriot states.

That the Turkish Cypriots still want an accord can be seen even in their 1983 statement of independence, where they hold out their hand to the south to join with them in a federal union. The main problem is to influence Mr. Papandreou, but we fail to see why that should be as hard as it has been made to seem.

PITTSBURGH ELKS GROUP CELEBRATES

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, on February 16, 1986, the Pittsburgh South Hills Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks will celebrate the 118th anniversary of the founding of this order. This lodge is the first to institute Elks American Patriotism Day, a displaying of the colors. For this, the South Hills group was awarded the All-American Lodge Award in 1984 by the Pennsylvania Elks Association.

The Elks are to be commended for their unwavering patriotism and their contributions to our communities across the land. I would like to share with my colleagues the following background information on the Elks.

THE ELKS

The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks is one of the oldest and largest fraternal organizations in the United States.

The first formal meeting was held on February 16, 1968, in New York City. Fifteen persons turned out, most of them young, undiscovered but budding artists who had gathered for companionship and to help their other out-of-work peers.

The idea caught on and spread to other groups and other cities. As it grew, the new organization broadened its membership base to include businessmen, professionals, farmers and representatives from other occupations.

Today there are more than 1.6 million members of the Elks in 2,280 local "Lodges" found throughout all fifty states and the District of Columbia. Over the years, these Lodges have evolved into the primary building blocks of the highly decentralized Elks organization. They provide recreational facilities for the entire family, but the Lodges are also the focal point for the many community service and charitable programs that have become an Elk tradition.

Early in its history, the Elks supported groups such as the Salvation Army and the Red Cross. In 1871, they staged a benefit for the victims of the great Chicago fire. Money was raised for victims of the Seattle fire and the Johnstown flood in 1889. And the Elks were the first on the scene to supply money and rescue assistance during the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Today, disaster relief continues to play an important part in Elk activities.

Patriotism has also been a hallmark of the Elks. In 1907, the Elks became the first fraternal organization in the nation to mandate observance of June 14 as Flag Day. More than 40 years later, fellow Elk, President Harry S. Truman signed into order a declaration naming Flag Day as an official national holiday.

The Elks National Foundation, the philanthropic arm of the organization, was created in July, 1928, as an income-producing fund to help support national Elk projects and to supplement programs at the state and local Lodge levels. Each year, scholarships are awarded to 500 outstanding high school students across the nation. Emergency educational grants are also provided to children of members who have died or been disabled.

Foundation support of state association projects is based on a "revenue sharing" concept. Funds are provided to each state in proportion to the level of contributions made by individuals in the state. The Elks contributed $26 million in 1983 to support cerebral palsy research, veteran's hospital, retarded child care and to provide wheelchairs, recreational facilities and other aids to the handicapped.

The Elks devote a great deal of attention to youth programs. Lodges and individual members today sponsor more than 1,000 Boy Scout troops and 3,000 Little League teams, as well as Boy's Clubs and Camp Fire Girls Clubs.

But one of the most important youth programs in recent years has been the annual "Elks' Hoop Shoot," a national free throw shooting contest, for boys and girls from ages 8 to 13. Over three million youngsters from all fifty states participate yearly in the "Hoop Shoot" from local contest to the national finals where six champions were named.

The program, begun in 1972 on a national basis, provides spirited competition and the chance for youngsters to develop new friendships. Winners and their families also travel to state, regional and national competition, courtesy of the Elks.

RETIREMENT OF THOMAS R. CLARKE FROM TAYLOR CENTER HIGH SCHOOL

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Thomas R. Clarke, who is retiring from Taylor Center High School in my hometown of Taylor, MI.

Tom's retirement follows 33 years of service at Taylor Center High. In fact, Tom has been on the faculty since the school originally opened in 1953. Prior to this, he taught at Tennessee Tech and at Richman High School.

Tom's involvement with and concern for the youth of Taylor extend beyond the classroom. He has coached basketball, baseball, and track at Taylor Center.

Tom has also been active in a number of capacities with the Taylor Federation of Teachers. Tom has served as the treasurer, executive secretary and an organizer for the TFT.

The citizens of Taylor have benefited substantially from Tom's experience in the classroom and in the community. He will truly be missed by students, his fellow teachers, and other members of the community.

I want to take this opportunity to wish Tom, his wife Ruth and the rest of his family all the best as he begins his retirement.

SAKHAROV SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF EXILE

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my strong support for the resolution being introduced today to express the sense of Congress that Dr. Sakharov and his wife Yelena Bonner should be allowed to exercise the rights of expression and movement guaranteed to them by the Helsinki accords.

On January 22, 1980, Nobel laureate and human rights activist, Dr. Andrei Sakharov, was arrested and exiled for 5 years to the closed city of Gorky for criticizing Soviet actions. Now, 6 years later, despite his declining health condition, Dr. Sakharov is still in exile. The Soviets have denied proper medical attention to Dr. Sakharov and Yelena Bonner. Fortunately, Yelena Bonner was granted a 3-month visa to receive medical treatment in the United States. She was released from Massachusetts General on Monday 7 days after the triple bypass surgery with the hope of quickly recovering in a home environment of her children. While the surgery was deemed a success, Mrs. Bonner is reported to be in great pain during her recovery process. She has been allowed almost no phone contact with her husband during her visit and what little contact has been allowed has been jammed. Certainly this lack of direct communication has not been easy on Andrei Sakharov whose own health has been reported to be even more serious since his wife's trip to the United States.

Dr. Sakharov and his wife have been dedicated in their fight to preserve human rights and have suffered greatly. It is clearly time for this arbitrary, illegal, and inhumane term of imprisonment to end so that Sakharov and Bonner will finally be able to exercise their rights granted to them in the Helsinki accord. I would like to praise my colleague, BARNEY

FRANK, for his perseverance and leadership in this matter and join with him in sponsoring this timely and important resolution. I urge my colleagues to join with me in this effort and hope that they will continue to press the Soviet Union for the freedom of Dr. Sakharov and his wife.

Thank you very much.

INJUSTICES IN BUDGET BILL

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to remedy what I consider to be an injustice for the millions of Americans who have faithfully served the people of this Nation as Government employees and members of the military.

Mr. Speaker, my bill would reverse the injustice contained in the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-177). My bill would remove all Federal civil service, military, and tier II railroad retirement and disability programs from the sequestration process and provide for full reimbursement of the January 1986 cost-of-living adjustment.

The conferees, whom I commend for their diligence and concern for fairness in deficit reduction, unfortunately overlooked this injustice. By including the cost-of-living adjustments for Federal, military, judicial, and railroad retirees, the Congress broke a good-faith contract with the employees of the Government and the Nation's rail systems. We broke a contract which stems over many years and has contributed to the well-being of millions of Americans in their sunset years of life. That good-faith contract, to provide a fair and equitable employer-employee sponsored retirement and disability plan, has allowed the Government to attract qualified men and women to carry out the duty of Government at a lower rate of compensation than they would have been granted in the private sector. In effect, these men and women in the public work force were promised a respectable retirement in return for a lower rate of pay during their years of labor. This system has worked and it has allowed the Federal Government to attain and retain qualified personnel. But last December, the Congress changed all of that. In the mad rush to defuse the deficit time bomb which truly threatens the economy of this great Nation, the Congress passed the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985. I supported that legislation because I believed then and now that further Government borrowing to finance our excessive spending would, in the long run, mortgage the future of this Nation. The conferees sought to draft a plan which would achieve a balanced budget by fiscal 1991, while at the same time ensure that the cuts were spread evenly over defense and nondefense spending, and that the poorest of the poor were protected from the automatic cutting measure contained in the bill. They did a worthy job and I commend them. However, somewhere in their deliberations, they overlooked the retirees who have given a lifetime toward the defense, operations, and movement of people and goods. The conferees were looking for every dollar they could find. But in taking away that dollar from the retiree, are we really contributing to deficit reduction while reducing the real purchasing power of millions of Americans?

Section 251 of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Public Law 99-177, provides that automatic spending increases shall be reduced as part of the sequestration order issued by the President to conform with the specific deficit level provided for fiscal years 1986 through 1991. These automatic spending increases, as defined in section 257 of the act, consist of 19 retirement and disability programs and 3 other Federal programs which are indexed to adjust with increases in inflation. Of these 19 programs, 13 are either Federal employee or military retirement and disability programs. My legislation would exempt all but one of these retirement programs and include the retirement program for tier II railroad retirement under the exemption contained in the bill. These programs, including tier II railroad retirement, would no longer be considered as automatic spending increases for purposes under the act. Therefore, cost-of-living adjustments for these programs would be protected in the same way as those for veterans' pensions and compensation. The bill would set as the effective date the date of the passage of Public Law 99-177, and therefore provide for the full reimbursement of the January 1986 cost-of-living adjustment for Federal, military, and tier II retirees. The cost of this exemption for fiscal year 1986 would be $993.6 million, according to the General Accounting Office report to the President, submitted January 21, 1986.

The programs exempted from being considered as automatic spending increases for purposes of the act and the U.S. General Accounting Office estimated fiscal year 1986 outlays are listed below:

[In millions of dollars]

Program	GAO estimate
Retirement and disability programs (section 257(1), part A):
CIA retirement and disability system fund	(1)
Civil Service retirement and disability fund	534.5
Comptrollers general retirement system	(2)
Foreign service retirement and disability fund	5.9
Judicial survivors' annuities fund [3]	0
Military retirement fund	409.1
NOAA retirement	0.2
Railroad retirement tier II	18.0
Retired pay, Coast Guard	8.6
Retirement pay for commisioned Public Health Service Officers	2.3
Special benefits, FECA [4]	15.0
Tax Court judges survivors annuity fund [3]	0
Total, part A	993.5

[1] Amounts are classified and have not been included in totals.
[2] Less than $50,000.
[3] Benefits are indexed to general schedule, judicial, or executive level pay, which did not increase for fiscal ear 1986.
[4] Scheduled benefit increase was 3.4 percent.
Source: U.S. General Accounting Office.

In its report to the President, as required by the new budget law, the General Accounting Office calculates the amount of savings the Government will achieve through the suspension of the January 1986 COLA's for civil service, military, and railroad retirees will total less than $1 billion. That amount is 8.49 percent of the total $11.7 billion of cuts which need to be made in fiscal 1986. However, as the total of cuts necessary to meet the specified deficit levels contained in the law rises, to approximately $64 billion in fiscal 1987, the percentage share of savings made up through suspension of the COLA's will fall dramatically. Assuming that inflation stays constant, even with the new entrants into the retirement programs, the percentage value of the savings achieved through suspending the COLA's would fall to a level of approximately 2 percent in fiscal 1987. In the meantime, the real purchasing power of the retirees would have declined by at least 6 percent over this 2-year period.

Mr. Speaker, the law as enacted greatly punishes the Federal, military, and railroad retirees who have given of themselves so that we may live a more safe and secure life as a nation. It is a punishment for a crime they did not commit. In a mad rush to balance the Federal budget, which I agree must be done, we have substituted the welfare of those persons who have provided the goods and services to ensure our own well-being. For the last 5 years Federal and military personnel have willfully contributed to deficit reduction through pay freezes and COLA reductions. They have been more than glad to do their part. But as the law is now written, these retirees are a minority have been singled out unfairly. This law subjects only this minority to the annual threat of reduction in real purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will join me in assuring the Federal, military, and railroad retiree community that this legislation will be given fair and swift consideration by the appropriate committees and the full House.

ANDREI SAKHAROV

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I would first like to commend my colleague, Representative FRANK, for calling this timely special order.

Tomorrow, January 22, 1986, marks the sixth anniversary of Dr. Andrei Sakharov's internal exile to the city of Gorky. To those of us around the world who are concerned with human rights, not one day passes where we do not think of the tragic imprisonment of the man who was called by the Nobel Peace Committee in 1975, "the conscience of mankind."

In demanding Dr. Sakharov's release, we must remember his contributions to the fundamental causes of world peace and human rights. Dr. Sakharov was one of the first scientists to call for a universal political commitment to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to call for world disarmament.

Dr. Sakharov was also one of the first to state the idea that world peace and human rights are inseparable issues. He recognized that human rights without peace, or peace without human rights, is worthless. Dr. Sakharov constantly warned against sacrificing one for the other.

On January 22, 1980, Andrei Sakharov was arrested, stripped of his state honors, and sent into internal exile. Although 5 years is the maximum penalty for exile in the Soviet judicial system, Dr. Sakharov was never given a trial or charged with any official crime. Thus he remains in the closed city of Gorky, cut off from the world.

Mr. Speaker, time and again I have stood on this floor condemning the Soviets for their outrageous human rights abuses. But I am not discouraged. I simply keep in mind the words of Dr. Sakharov himself:

Our only protection is the spotlight of public attention on our fate by friends around the world.

I am sure that Dr. Sakharov would be the first to ask us not to forget that January 20 was the 38th birthday of Anatoly Shcharansky, who remains in prison for the crime of asking to join his wife Avital in Israel, and for pointing out Soviet violations of the 1975 Helsinki accord on human rights.

Today we again call on the Soviet Union to release Andrei Sakharov and Anatoly Shcharansky in the name of humanity and respect for human rights. Our voices will not be silent on this issue. As long as these men remain in prison, those of us who believe in the fundamental importance of human rights and justice will not be able to rest.

HILLSDALE COLLEGE, NATIONAL NAIA CHAMPION

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring tribute to a college which, although lacking the reputation of a football powerhouse, successfully stayed the course to win a national football championship last month.

Hillsdale College, long recognized as an outstanding academic institution located in the city of Hillsdale, MI, demonstrated athletic strength and prowess in becoming the 1985 NAIA national champions.

Just days before Christmas, the 1985 Hillsdale Chargers delivered their "championship gift" by playing to a 10–10 tie with the Central Arkansas Bears. As Head Coach Dick Lowry said after the game, "Winning a national title is not just for Dick Lowry or just the football team. It's for all of Michigan, it's for the Hillsdale people and for the college."

Undoubtedly, it was this spirited perspective which helped the Chargers bring home their first national title since starting a football program 91 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud today to represent Hillsdale College—and not just because they have won a national title. It is true that a national championship for a school such a Hillsdale College is a proud accomplishment, not having the athletic stature or recruiting clout of larger universities.

I am proud instead, because the determination and dedication of the Hillsdale players parallels that of the entire institution. To me, as well as many others, Hillsdale College serves as a hallmark for smaller educational institutions. And, Mr. Speaker, winning the 1985 championship reinforces that idea.

I ask my colleagues to join with me in congratulating the 1985 Chargers, and Hillsdale College on this fine accomplishment and in wishing them continued athletic and academic success.

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. MARTIN FROST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, January 20, 1986, marked the first observance of our national holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr. Dr. King, from his cell in the Birmingham City jail, predicted that, "one day the South will recognize its real heroes." He was referring to all those who joined him in his courageous struggle for peace, justice, and freedom. On Monday, his prophecy came true in a way he could never have foreseen. Americans in all parts of our country, not just the South, joined together to pay tribute to a great national hero, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Dr. King's work with the civil rights movement began in Montgomery, AL, in 1955 and ended, tragically, in Memphis in 1968. In a span of just 13 short years, he provided leadership and focus for the civil rights movement, touched the world with his philosophy of nonviolence, and was awarded a Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts. In that 13 years, he changed the life of a nation and his influence continues to be felt nearly 18 years after his death. It's impossible to fully comprehend the real meaning his life had for every one of us, and for the generations that will follow us.

Martin Luther King, Jr., awakened in us the best qualities of the American spirit. He called upon us to put aside our fears, our prejudices, and to commit ourselves to the American ideal of liberty and justice for all. We saw him threatened, harrassed, jailed, and finally murdered because he would not abandon his dream. His courage gave us strength, and his words of love and hope gave us inspiration. He provided the voice for a generation's dream and, because of him, that dream lives on today.

Martin Luther King, Jr., devoted his life to fighting bigotry and injustice. Clear vision, courage, and determination were the hallmarks of his character. His memory provides, not just an example, but a challenge. It challenges us to believe, as he did, that "injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." It presents a special challenge to those of us in public life. It demands that we use the power of politics and of public office to pursue equal justice and true liberation for all Americans. Significant gains have been made but there is much work left to do. We must do all we can to see that our Government is just and responsive—in employment, in education, in health, and in public services. It is up to us to fulfill the dream that Martin Luther King, Jr., articulated so beautifully.

It's important, then, that Martin Luther King Day be more than a celebration of a great man's life. It must be an opportunity for all of us to reaffirm our own commitment to brotherhood and justice. When we quote his speeches, we must remember to live the lessons they teach us. When we praise him, we must remember that words alone are not adequate to honor his memory. We can only truly honor Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., by working to complete the struggle for which he gave his life. We must remember his hope that "in some not too distant tomorrow, the radiant starts of love and brotherhood will shine over our great Nation in all their scintillating beauty." We must commit ourselves to putting aside those things which separate us and to working together toward that day. The memory of Martin Luther King, Jr., will truly be honored when every American is living his dream of peace, freedom, and equality.

A TRIBUTE TO MR. KENT M. PIERCE

HON. ROBERT E. BADHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize an outstanding citizen of my district, Mr. Kent M. Pierce, for his years of service to the community and to his profession as a realtor. He recently completed his second term as president of the Huntington-Beach/Fountain Valley Board of Realtors in Orange County, CA, and is only the fourth person to serve twice in that capacity in the 25-year history of the organization.

As president of Coats and Wallace Real Estate, he has spent countless hours in volunteer service to the programs, events and activities of the board of realtors over the past 13 years. In recognition of his unselfish commitment to the growth and excellence of his profession, he is a past recipient of the "Realtor Associate of the Year" award.

During his tenure as a board officer, which also includes 5 years as a director, Mr. Pierce has established himself as a staunch defender of private property rights, a strong advocate of the realtors code of ethics and an active promoter of professional standards.

In addition to his work at the local level, Mr. Pierce has established himself as a statewide leader in service to the State Trade Association, the California Association of Realtors. He went first to serve as a delegate in 1975 and then served for 8 years as a member of the board. This year, he is regional vice president of the State organization, representing not only his home board but also the boards which serve the profession in more than two-thirds of Orange County.

Mr. Chairman, it is a distinct pleasure for me to bring this recognition to Mr. Kent Pierce. I am sure the pride in his accomplishments that is felt by his wife, Gianna, and their five daughters is shared by the hundreds of his colleagues with whom he has worked through the years.

HISPANICS IN THE LABOR MARKET

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, Hispanic Americans constitute the fastest growing minority group in our Nation today. Unfortunately, we are often without the data necessary to develop public and social policies to address the needs of this population.

Hispanic educational and civil rights organizations have begun to fill this gap developing their own statistical information on Hispanic Americans. This information is particularly useful when it compares the various subgroups within the Hispanic community, that is, Cuban Americans, Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans. One of the most recent efforts, in this regard, is a study by the National Council of La Raza entitled, "Hispanics in the Labor Market: 1980–85." This study provides some very important comparative analyses on Hispanics performance in the labor market. I have included this study for my colleagues' review. I am certain that the statistics found in the study will be useful to those who are concerned about the employment problems of Hispanic Americans.

HISPANICS IN THE LABOR MARKET: 1980–85

I. INTRODUCTION

Hispanic Americans are the nation's youngest and fastest-growing major population group. Their youth and relatively low levels of eduation pose especially intractable problems, suggesting that hard-core Hispanic unemployment and poverty will endure into the future.

The 1980 Census estimated the Hispanic population in the United States at 14.6 million, or 6.4% of the total U.S. population. The Hispanic community had a birth rate in 1980 of 106.5 births per 1,000 women aged 18–44, compared to the White rate of 68.5 and the Black rate of 84.0. This high fertility rate, which is well above "replacement" level, guarantees larger cohorts of children for years to come. These high birth rates, which stem partly from a higher proportion of Hispanic women of child-bearing age, reflect the low median age of Hispanics, which is 23.2 years as compared to 31.7 years for Whites, and 24.9 years for Blacks.

Hispanics are projected to account for at least 8% of the labor force by 1995. The Hispanic community is an increasing pool of potentially productive workers. However, the progress of Hispanics in the labor market is hindered by their low levels of education, employment, and earnings. Hispanics are the least-educated and the lowest-paid of all groups in the labor market. Hispanic workers are "distressed" workers—a phrase coined by Professor Daniel Saks of Vanderbilt University to identify large segments in the labor force who do poorly in the labor market despite good economic times.[1] As "distressed" workers, Hispanics are extremely vulnerable to shifts in the economy and to restrictive federal policies in education and employment and training.

II. LABOR MARKET STATUS

A. Education

Data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics reveal that Hispanics are the least-educated major population group in the country, and that the general Hispanic population has lower educational attainment than Hispanics in the civilian labor force:

MEDIAN SCHOOL YEARS COMPLETED BY THE CIVILIAN LABOR FORCE

[Persons 16 years old and over, 1980–84]

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Hispanics:
Men	11.7	11.6	12.0	12.1	12.0
Women	12.2	12.2	12.2	12.3	12.3
Blacks:
Men	12.3	12.3	12.4	12.4	12.4
Women	12.4	12.5	12.5	12.6	12.6
Whites:
Men	12.7	12.7	12.7	12.8	12.8
Women	12.7	12.7	12.7	12.7	12.8

A cursory analysis of the civilian labor force data may lead to the conclusion that there are only small differences in the educational levels of various segments of the labor market. However, these numbers only reflect the civilian labor force—the employed and the unemployed who are actively looking for work. It does not include the 1.2 million discouraged workers—those workers who have given up looking for jobs because of the prevailing economic situation or because of various personal factors such as age, or lack of education or training. This measure also does not include the chronically unemployed—those that founder in the job market because they are bereft of marketable skills. This measure also does not include women who are housewives, or persons who are retired from the labor force. Finally, this measure does not include that segment of the population between the ages of 14 and 16. This specific age group is very important to the Hispanic community since Hispanics appear to drop out of school earlier than do other groups of students. According to the Bureau of the Census, 9.0% of Hispanics 14–17 years old have left school without graduating, as compared to 5.3% of White youth, and 5.2% of Black youth.

If these excluded segments of the population were included, Hispanics appear more undereducated when compared to Blacks and Whites, as shown in the following data from the March 1981 Current Population Survey:

Median school years completed, 1981

[Persons 25 years old and over]	Years
White males	12.6
White females	12.5
Black males	12.1
Black females	12.1
Hispanic males	11.0
Hispanic females	10.5

The Current Population Survey measures a cross-section of the general population, whether in the labor force or not. Thus, it includes those segments of the general population who are excluded by data based on the civilian labor force.

A disproportionately high percentage of Hispanic youth leave high school without a diploma. Data from a 1979 Census Bureau study showed that 35% of Hispanics 18–21 years old had dropped out of high school as compared with 25% of Blacks and 15% of Whites. In 1983, only 50.3% of Hispanic 18–19 year olds had graduated from high school as compared to 75.6% of Whites and 59.1% of Blacks.

For certain groups of Hispanics, such as women, dropout rates are even higher. Hispanic females are more likely to drop out of school than are Hispanic males, and are more likely than other groups of women to be high school dropouts. Census data from 1980 showed that by age 17, 20.9% of Hispanic females have left high school without a diploma. In 1979, of Hispanic women aged 16–24, 34.2% were high school dropouts as compared to 31.5% of Hispanic males, 12.8% of White females, and 20.0% of Black females.

Education is the single most important human capital characteristic in terms of its direct correlation on future earnings. A study using data from the 1976 Survey of Income and Education and the 1970 census found that Hispanics have lower returns to education than Whites. For example, White men earned 6.1% more for each additional grade of school completed, whereas Mexican men earned 5.4% higher wages per school grade completed, Puerto Rican men earned 3.6%, Cuban men earned 3.5%, and Black men earned 4.9% [2]

These findings are consistent with the results of a 1982 research project of the National Council of La Raza which analyzed data from the March 1981 Current Population Survey and found that Hispanics, both males and females, received less income for each additional year of schooling than did Whites. Hispanic women were worse off in this regard, as they earned only an additional $271.93 per year for each year of education received, while Hispanic males earned $524.84, White females $544.51, and White males $870.91.[3]

B. Labor force participation

The labor force participation rate measures the percent of those persons age 16 and over who are either employed or actively seeking employment. Table 1, attached, reveals that in 1984 Hispanics recorded the highest labor force participation rate of any major population group.

Hispanic men have higher labor force participation rates than White or Black men. Some economists believe that the higher overall labor force participation rate reflects the fact that the current Hispanic male population in the United States is, on average, younger than the non-Hispanic male population (in 1983, 49.7% of the adult Hispanic men were between the ages of 20 and 34 as compared to 39.1% for all adult men) and young adult men traditionally have higher labor force participation rates than older men.[4]

Hispanic women, like all women, have lower labor force participation rates than men. This is primarily due to the traditional cultural belief that women should remain at home and raise the family. However, in recent years, the growth of the labor force is due to the increasing numbers of women entering the workplace. In the last quarter of calendar year 1981, 47 million working women accounted for about 43% of the work force. Such growth equaled two-thirds of the total labor force increase during 1981. Hispanic women still have somewhat lower labor force participation rates than other women (49.9% in 1984, compared with 53.3% for White women, and 55.3% for Black women), but Hispanic women's labor force participation increased slightly more between 1981 and 1984 than did participation rates for other women (a 4.4% increase, compared to 4.1% for White women and 4.0% for Black women).

C. Occupational distribution

In 1984 Hispanic workers were especially concentrated in the following occupations:

1. Technical, sales, and administrative support, where 25.8% of Hispanics in the civilian labor force are employed, compared to 30.9% of the total labor force. Over half of Hispanics (60%) employed in this category are concentrated in administrative support, including clerical work.

2. Operators, fabricators, and laborers, where 25.0% of Hispanics in the labor force are employed, compared to 16.0% of the total labor force. Over half of Hispanics (55%) employed in this category are machine operators, assemblers, and inspectors; one-fourth (27%) are handlers, equipment cleaners, and helpers.

3. Service occupations, where 17.6% of Hispanics in the labor force are employed, compared to 13.5% of the total labor force. Excluding private household and protective service occupations, over four-fifths of Hispanics (83%) employed in this category are concentrated in jobs such as cooks, dishwashers, cleaning service workers, and food counter workers.

Hispanics are underrepresented in the managerial and professional occupations, where only 11.8% of Hispanic workers are employed, compared to 14.0% of Black workers, and 24.0% of White workers. On the other hand, Hispanics are overrepresented in the agriculture industry, where 5.7% of Hispanics are employed, compared to 2.7% of Black workers, and 0.35% of White workers.

D. Earnings

The occupational concentration of Hispanics is within those jobs which require a low level of skills and are low paid. The following table identifies the three occupational categories with highest concentrations of Hispanics, and lists their corresponding median weekly earnings:

Occupation and median weekly earnings, 1984

	Dollars
1. Technical, sales, and administrative support	300
Administrative support, including clerical	273
2. Operators, fabricators, and laborers	287
Machine operators, assemblers, inspectors	279
Handlers, equipment cleaners, helpers	250
3. Service occupations	208
Service, except private household/protective	200

Hispanic men and women earn the lowest wages in the labor market. In this regard, Hispanic women are worst off, earning only 52% as much as white men, while Hispanic men earn 71% as much as white men. For the first quarter of 1985, the median weekly earnings by sex and ethnic origin, for individuals 25 years and over, were as follows:

Median weekly earnings, first quarter 1985

	Dollars
White men	452
Black men	325
Hispanic men	319
White women	293
Black women	255
Hispanic women	237

For the total Hispanic workforce, this pattern of lowest median weekly earnings is a recurrent one, as the following table indicates:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Total White	$265	$292	$307	$321	$339

The low wage levels of Hispanics in the U.S. are a result of varying factors. For some Hispanics, such as Mexican origin workers, the low level of education is the major source for the wage discrepancy. However, discrimination still plays a significant role in determining the wages earned in Hispanic workers. In this regard, the wage levels of Puerto Rican and Central and South American men appear to be determined by discriminatory practices to a greater degree than the wage levels of other Hispanic subgroups.

Professor Cordelia Reimers in her study, "A Comparative Analysis of the Hispanics, Blacks, and non-Hispanic Whites," found that the average wages offered to minority men are at least 15% below those offered to White men.[5] The Reimers study, based on data from the 1976 Survey of Income and Education and the 1970 Census, yielded the following findings:

1. The lower level of education of Hispanics was the single most important reason for the lower wages they received compared to non-Hispanic Whites.

2. Controlling for sex, age, race, education, and other observable characteristics, lower wages among Hispanic groups were attributed, in part, to employment discrimination. Puerto Rican and Central and South American men were found to experience the most employment discrimination.

3. Even if Puerto Rican wage earners received the same wages as other groups, their families would still have a lower income as a result of relatively low female labor force participation rates and the large proportion of female-headed families.

The following table indicates the wage differences between White men and minority men found by the Reimers study:

WAGE DIFFERENCES

[In percent]

Group	Wage gap	Potential discrimination
Mexican	34	6
Puerto Rican	33	18
Cuban	16	−6
Central/South American	42	36
Black	23	14

Education was found to be the major source of differences in wage offerings. For Mexican origin men, education differences account for half (17%) of the 34% wage-offer differential; for Puerto Rican men, education differences account for 13% of the 33% wage-offer differential; for Cuban men, education differences account for 5% of the 16% wage-offer differential; for Central and South American men, education differences account for 3% of the 42% wage-offer differential; and for Black men, education differences account for 10% of the 23% wage-offer differential.[6]

The Reimers study also found that differences in language fluency, time in the United States, work experience, race, age, armed forces experience, health and government employment are also sources of wage differentials. But, after all these factors are taken into consideration, a wage gap still remains, which can be attributed to discrimination. For Mexican origin men, this "discrimination" wage gap is 6%; for Puerto Rican men, it is 18%; for Central and South American men, it is 36%; and for Black men, it is 14%.[7] With regard to Cuban men, if their background characteristics were the same as those of White non-Hispanic men, the wage differential would be 6% in the Cuban's favor. This result may be explained by the fact that Cubans who immigrated to the U.S. before 1970 formed and maintained their own economic and institutional structure within a small geographic area.[8]

The Reimers study, though based on 1970 and 1976 Census data, corroborates the findings of a 1982 research project of the National Council of La Raza. This research project analyzed data from the March 1981 Current Population Survey and found that unequal opportunities faced by Hispanics account for much of the earnings gap. These inequalities, however, do not account for the total difference between earnings of Whites and Hispanics. La Raza's regression-based analysis evaluated the effects of the following variables on wage and salary income: age, sex, ethnicity, marital status, hours worked, occupation, employment sector (private versus public sector), and industry (which was divided into nine different categories). The results of the analysis indicate that even when all other variables are controlled—thus assuming that Hispanics are equally educated, trained, work the same number of hours, etc.—ethnicity alone appears to account for 14% of the wage differences between White and Hispanic males and 29% of the total difference in earning power between White males and Hispanic females.[9]

E. Unemployment

Hispanics face severe, continuing unemployment and underemployment. During both good and bad economic times, unemployment among Hispanics is usually 60% higher than that of White Americans. Table 2, reveals that double-digit unemployment has been a pattern for both the Hispanic and Black communities during the last five years. In October 1985, the official unemployment rate was 7.1% for the total population, 6.1% for Whites, 15.0% for Blacks, and 11.3% for Hispanics.

The official rate of unemployment does not include long-term discouraged workers, or persons working part-time for economic reasons. When the 1.2 million discouraged workers and 5.5 million part-time workers are added to the officially unemployed, the number of persons affected by unemployment climbs dramatically. In 1984, the official unemployment rate of 7.5% translated to a real rate of 13.6%. In June 1985, the overall official unemployment rate of 7.3% translated to a real rate of 13.0%; the official White unemployment rate of 6.5% translated to a real rate of 11.7%; the official Black unemployment rate of 14.0% translated to a real rate of 23.7%; and the official Hispanic unemployment rate of 10.6% translated to a real rate of 18.0%.

Table 3, ranks metropolitan areas according to incidence of unemployment. Three of the six metropolitan areas with the highest unemployment rates have a Hispanic population of three-fourths or more; among other areas in the top twenty, the concentration of Hispanics is significant. The McAllen, Brownsville, Laredo, and El Paso, TX metropolitan areas are border regions particularly vulnerable to the Mexican peso devaluations and the resultant loss of jobs. These regions were also hit by a severe freeze during Christmas 1983, which destroyed millions of crops and citrus trees and caused the unemployment rates among agricultural and food processing workers to climb dramatically.

III. CONCLUSIONS AND POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

An analysis of the labor market data clearly shows that Hispanic workers occupy the bottom rungs of the labor market. Although they have a higher labor force participation and lower unemployment rate than Blacks, Hispanics are the least-educated and earn the lowest wages of any major population group in the country. However, Hispanics are a youthful subpopulation group with a vast productivity potential. Hispanics are projected to account for at least 8% of the labor force by 1995. Though national demographics will favor lower unemployment over the next 12 years as prime-age workers make up a larger share of the work force, the particular demographic trends of the Hispanic community indicate the opposite, since its high birth rates and lower median age mean that Hispanics will be entering the workforce at a high rate.

One long-range effect of this demographic trend is that the taxable salaries of Hispanic workers will be increasingly vital to the fiscal viability of many domestic programs, especially Social Security, which relies on withholding allowances of current workers for the support of current retirees. It is not unrealistic to envision an aged White population being supported by an increasingly non-White workforce. Therefore, changes in public policy, which recognize these demographic realities, are necessary in order to bring about greater parity in the labor market for minority subpopulation groups such as the Hispanic community.

The National Council of La Raza strongly supports the continuation and improvement of federal programs and policies which seek to eliminate the barriers to equal employment opportunities. A strong federal commitment to accomplishing equal access for minorities to education and employment and training programs is essential if Hispanics are to improve their labor market status.

Responsive policies from the federal government, policies which recognize the educational crisis faced by Hispanics, are crucial if Hispanics are to become productive workers. Education is inextricably bound to earning levels. Higher education not only raises wage rates, it also lowers the probability and duration of unemployment spells, which ultimately translate to lower earnings. However, research from the National Council of La Raza indicates that when certain variables are controlled—thus assuming that Hispanics are equally educated, trained, work the same number of hours, etc.—ethnicity alone appears to account for 14% of the wage differences between White and Hispanic males and 29% of the total difference in earning power between White males and Hispanic females. Thus, policies which eliminate discrimination in the workplace are also necessary.

Federal employment and training policies must address the issue of hard-core structural unemployment, that unemployment level which never disappears despite the economic progress made during a recovery. Hard-core structural unemployment primarily affects disadvantaged minorities and individuals who lack the education necessary to meet the needs of a changing economy. Current federal employment and training programs, such as the Job Training Partnership Act, must be adequately funded and structured in order to address the differing needs of the various segments of the labor market such as minorities, youth, dropouts, disadvantaged adults, dislocated workers, limited-English proficient persons, and women.

Hispanic workers are disproportionately vulnerable to shifts in the economy and to restrictive federal policies in education and employment and training. The growing Hispanic population will make up an increasing segment of the future labor force. Therefore, to enable Hispanics and other minority groups to make their full contribution in the future—and to assure a trained work force which can meet the future needs of the U.S. economy—human investment partnerships must develop between the public, private, and nonprofit sectors. The Hispanic community is a human resource, whose reservoirs must be tapped in order to maximize its work force participation and productivity potential. The investment should be made now in order to reap societal benefits and protect the nation's economic security tomorrow.

BROOKLYN'S POLYTECH, A STORYBOOK SUCCESS

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an institution of learning which has rightfully earned the distinction as one of the finest and most successful technological schools in the Nation.

Since its inception in 1854 as a finishing school for young men, Polytechnic University has transformed into the largest technological university in the New York metropolitan area.

Comprised of a distinguished faculty and an outstanding student body, Polytech is both an innovator and a major contributor in the field of technology. Over the past 131 years, the Brooklyn university has played a key role in the research and development of microwave physics, radar, the space program and, most recently, electrophysics and polymer blends. Last year a $3.2 million research grant was awarded to the school to develop technology for the Star Wars Program. Polytechnic University's past achievements has been beneficial to all Americans and I am confident that the school's graduates and faculty will continue in their great contributions in high technology.

I would like to share with you an insightful article which appeared in the January 5, 1986, New York Times.

The article follows:

BROOKLYN'S POLYTECH, A STORYBOOK SUCCESS

(By Cynthia Sanz)

In a converted razor factory in downtown Brooklyn, across the street from a pizza parlor and a hardware store, resides a school whose contributions to science stand in wild contrast to its surroundings. Over the years it has been a key center of research in the development of microwave physics, radar, polymers and the space program. More recently it has played a key role in the promotion of Metrotech, a 16-acre academic-industrial research park in Brooklyn. And just this year the school—Polytechnic University, the newest of several names it has taken over its 131-year history—was awarded a research grant to develop technology for the "Star Wars" project, the Strategic Defense Initiative.

"We are the institution of the American dream," said Dr. George Bugliarello, president to Polytechnic. "We're scrappy and we're determined to be the best."

With a relatively small and unpretentious campus and buildings designed more for function than esthetics, Polytechnic University, the name it adopted last year, seems light-years away from the ivy-covered walls that usually accompany the image of academia. Founded in 1854 as the Brooklyn Collegiate and Polytechnic Insitute, the school was first an upper-class college-preparatory and finishing school for young men, as recalled by Prof. A. George Schillinger, chairman of Polytechnic's division of management, who came to the institute in 1957. In the late 19th century downtown Brooklyn grew as a commercial and residential area. In response the school altered its focus to training in engineering and the sciences; and in 1890 it became a college, changing its name to the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. It retained the preparatory division until 1917, when it split off. By 1985 the college had outgrown its facilities and moved a few blocks away to its present, larger quarters.

The school's shift to a scientific curriculum reflected a change in the student pool from the wealthier group to an upwardly mobile middle class. These demographics remained stable until the 1930's, according to Professor Schillinger, when the school began to attract the immigrant groups that until that time had mostly attended City College.

Polytechnic has long had a distinguished faculty. Over the last half-century its members have included Herman Mark, a chemist in polymers, who came in 1930; Paul Ewald, an early leader in crystal physics and a founder of X-ray crystallography; Ernst Weber, an electrical engineer and an early leader of the university's Microwave Research Institute; and Donald Othmer and Raymond Kirk, who together edited the Kirk-Othmer Encyclopedia of Chemical Technology.

During World War II the Microwave Institute worked on problems whose solution led to the development of radar, and later broke ground in electromagnetic theory and electronics in general. In later years the university's aerospace department has participated in the space program, solving re-entry problems of the manned space capsules.

Enrollment at Polytechnic is 5,100, making it the largest technological university in the New York metropolitan area and the second-largest in graduate enrollment in the nation after the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

But while its position now is comfortable, there were days not long ago when faculty members outnumbered students, and a $3.5 million deficit, despite state subsidies of more than $18 million, threatened to close the school for good.

The university began to experience severe budgetary difficulties in the late 1960's as a result of cutbacks in Federal science and engineering support and a general decline in engineering enrollment nationally. By 1970, having invested more than $4 million in teaching and research faculty and new laboratories, Polytechnic found itself left with very few students.

From 1969 to 1975, Polytechnic was forced to rely on state subsidies, which it obtained on the basis of its value as an engineering school and the economic hardship it would create locally if it folded. Despite the state aid, with no cushion of endowments to tide it over, Polytechnic was forced to merge in 1973 with New York University's School of Engineering and Science in the Bronx, another financially troubled private school, but one with enough students to help pay Polytechnic's bills. With the merger went another name change, to Polytechnic Institute of New York.

Over the next several years, Dr. Bugliarello and his staff managed to turn Polytechnic around. An intensive student recruitment plan increased enrollment, while the encouragement of early retirement pruned the faculty. The makeover did not end there. In the mid-1970's Polytechnic began an undergraduate engineering program at its Long Island campus in Farmingdale, which had previously been used only for research, and started offering courses through other universities in the metropolitan area. University administrators meanwhile were furiously pursuing research dollars and endowments.

After three and a half years of tightening its belt, Polytechnic managed to balance its budget, and in 1979 was able to achieve enough of a budget surplus to begin a program of capital reinvestment. "The moment we balanced the budget, we accelerated the tempo," Dr. Bugliarello said. "We started strengthening our computer program while most universities were ignoring theirs, and at the same time we reached out into previously unexplored areas. We began a technical management program and created the nation's only philosophy and technology studies center."

Of the 300 engineering schools in the United States, Polytechnic has the second-largest graduate enrollment and is among the most successful institutions in the country as a producer of science and engineering graduates who go on to doctoral studies. An average of 7.2 percent of Polytechnic graduates go on to achieve a PH.D., compared with two other schools with large engineering programs: Carnegie-Mellon, with an average of 6 percent, and Princeton, with 4.5 percent.

Today, Polytechnic is a full-fledged university generally rated academically in the top 5 percent of all U.S. colleges and universities, and is well known for its research centers in electrophysics and polymer blends. Last year the school was awarded a $3.2 million Federal Government grant to study the concept pulsepower physics—how to produce bursts of power—in space, for the "Star Wars" program.

Polytechnic is also designated the New York State Center for Advanced Technology in Telecommunications, and last year it played a lead role in organizing support for bringing to downtown Brooklyn the Metrotech complex, a 16-acre academic-industrial research park.

"Poly has a reputation of being the best," said Maria C Elevado, a computer-science junior at the school. She remembers applying for a part-time job with the New York City Department of General Services as a freshman and being called immediately to interview for the position. "They saw 'Polytechnic' at the top of my résumé and didn't even read any further," she said. "Simply by virtue of that name, I was chosen for the interview, and I'm sure it was at least partly responsible for my getting the job."

Remi Begonia Mendoza, a graduate student in technological management, agrees. Miss Mendoza says she would have left New York if she felt she could get a better technological education elsewhere, but after studying the alternatives, decided on Polytechnic. "Polytechnic is exploring new areas in this type of education," she said. "Most colleges don't offer such a wide range of courses in the field of technology." She is currently a senior flavor chemist at Pepsico.

"Poly is a breeder of entrepreneurs," said Dr. Bugliarello. "We see our mission as that of a catalyst in the economic development of the region."

The school hopes to give the New York area a strong center of academic support that will insure that it holds its place as the technological nerve center of the nation. "New York is one of those cities at risk," Dr. Bugliarello said. "People can easily move their operations somewhere else, someplace less expensive. But if we can provide an environment that cannot be found in other cities, then New York will continue to be extremely vital."

STOCKTON'S MAN OF THE YEAR—LEO D'OR

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to ask that my colleagues join with me in hornoring the outstanding civic contributions of an equally exceptional individual, Mr. Leo d'Or, of Stockton, CA. Leo has just been named "Stocktonian of the Year" for 1985 by the Stockton Board of Realtors. This highly coveted award is given annually to the individual who has contributed beyond the call to the community, and Leo d'Or certainly qualifies as a fine recipient.

I would like to take the liberty of sharing with my colleagues a succinct and touching article concerning the full and wonderful life of Leo d'Or as it appeared in the Stockton Record, for which Leo labored by more than 35 years. He is well remembered and well loved by those who worked with him, those who know of his devotion to the community, and those who are just fortunate enough to know him as a fine human being.

STOCKTON'S MAN OF YEAR—LEO D'OR

(By Luanne Hyde)

Leo d'Or received a bill and a surprise Tuesday when he walked into a meeting of the Weber Point Coffee Club at the Holiday Inn.

The club's founder and president, d'Or has been known to rap his gavel during meetings and jovially tag a member with paying for the day's coffee.

On Tuesday, 35 members watched while Matt Marinkovich, 1985 president of the Stockton Board of Realtors, presented him with a large facsimile of a restaurant bill.

D'Or was asked to read the bill aloud: "Leo C. d'Or, You have been charged with being the 1985 Stocktonian of the Year."

The man who celebrated his 85th birthday two months ago almost missed the surprise announcement of his recognition. He was attending another meeting.

Once at the Holiday Inn. he said, "I can't believe it yet. I was in another meeting but they (club members) knew I'd come back here for coffee."

Chosen Stocktonian of the Year because of his involvement in community activities, d'Or will be honored by the Stockton Board of Realtors at a Jan. 23 banquet at the Stockton Golf and Country Club. Reservations, at $25, may be made by calling the board office at 951-9300.

Friends and former co-workers said Tuesday that active volunteering keeps the retired d'Or laboring as hard or harder than many who receive paychecks.

D'Or was employed by The Stockton Record for more than 35 years and retired in 1969. He began his career as a salesman, then became advertising manager, director of advertising and headed the department when he retired. Since that time, he has devoted much time to volunteering.

The indefatigable d'Or said Tuesday, "It's fun. The big thing is there are no deadlines."

When The Record's retail advertising manager, Fred Risso learned of d'Or's honor, he said, "I'm real excited about this. He's 85 years old and sharp as a tack. There's no one more deserving than Leo d'Or."

"D'Or worked here (The Record) when I started in 1944," Risso said. "He was always the most involved, caring person in Stockton and, through the years, his activities have increased."

Deputy Police Chief Ralph Tribble said, "Leo's the kind of guy that all of us try to emulate. At 85, he's still very active. His mind is brilliant. He is the master of one-liners."

"This club is one of the most upbeat organizations I belong to. Leo runs it with a fast gavel," Tribble said.

The nucleus of the club was formed in the 1940s when d'Or began dropping into Tiny's restaurant at 27 N. Sutter St. for morning coffee. Others joined him and later migrated to DeBono's on Weber Avenue, the Ambassador Hotel on Channel Street and finally the Holiday Inn. By acclamation, d'Or was chosen to lead the group.

The active Stocktonian has been selected for numerous other honors.

For maintaining high standards in the area of public relations, advertising and communications, d'Or in 1984 received the first Ken Fong Memorial Award, established in memory of the late local advertising firm owner. He also received the American Advertising Federation's Silver Medal Award for accomplishments in the field of advertising and civic betterment.

D'Or's concern for education led him to become a Waverly School District trustee and board clerk. He was an original member of the first elected San Joaquin County Board of Education, which he served as chairman for five years. He has also been treasurer of the San Joaquin County School Boards Association.

D'Or started many of the institutions he later served.

He was a founder of the Waterloo/Morada Fire Protection District and served as trustee and secretary for 12 years. He helped organize a lay board of trustees for St. Joseph's Hospital and served the board for 10 years, eight at chairman.

The San Joaquin County Board of Supervisors appointed him to the San Joaquin County Retirement Board and, in 1973, the Private Industry Council board, which he served as chairman for three terms.

In 1985, he received a commendation from President Reagan and the United States Department of Labor for assisting in making the Job Training and Partnership Act a success in San Joaquin County.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, last week, Soviet General Secretary Gorbachev indicated that the Soviets will continue Moscow's moratorium on underground nuclear tests until April, and perhaps longer if the United States also stops testing.

The Reagan administration quickly indicated that it has little interest in joining this moratorium. It wants to keep on testing, contending that continued nuclear warhead testing is required for the United States to assure strategic "deterrence."

I find it somewhat incredible that a President who repeatedly says his ultimate goal is the elimination of all nuclear weapons from the face of the earth keeps ducking out of comprehensive test ban talks. If he really wants to eliminate all nuclear weapons, the President should be willing to talk about halting the tests needed to develop new warheads.

When the Soviets first announced their unilateral testing halt, the administration said that we wouldn't join because it was just a propaganda stunt.

But the Soviets have stopped testing. That's not just a stunt; they aren't testing their nuclear warheads and we're continuing to test ours.

As the attached chart indicates, the United States conducted 16 underground tests last year, 7 of them following announcement of the Soviet test moratorium. The Soviets conducted seven tests in 1985 prior to the announcement of their moratorium last July. They have not tested since that time.

I am convinced that the primary reason the administration refuses to enter into a testing moratorium is not its concern with the preservation of strategic deterrence nor its concern about verification. The United States has kept on testing chiefly because of the administration's desire to accelerate a key part of star wars program—the x-ray laser.

The most recent U.S. nuclear test, codenamed Goldstone, was reportedly a test of the nuclear-driven x-ray laser. Maintaining a rigid and accelerated test schedule for this program is so important to this administration that it denied a request from Representative BILL GREEN, myself, and 28 other Members of Congress to temporarily delay this test until technical problems with the design of these experiments had been rectified.

Star wars is not only an obstacle to progress in strategic arms reduction; it is holding up talks on a comprehensive test ban. The administration would better serve our national security interests if it stopped reaching for harebrained technological panaceas like the x-ray laser and committed itself to negotiations to end nuclear testing.

I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a recent article by Fred Kaplan of the Boston Globe, which analyzes the administration's decision to reject a test ban.

The article follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Jan. 19, 1986]

WHY U.S. REJECTED NUCLEAR TEST BAN

(By Fred Kaplan)

WASHINGTON.—In the package of arms control proposals offered last week by Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, there is one element that could instantly be put into effect—a ban on nuclear weapons tests.

Yet the Reagan administration has rejected this idea. The reason is simple. It has nothing to do with whether such a ban can be verified or whether it would make the existing U.S. nuclear arsenal less reliable. It is because the administration wants to develop new types of nuclear weapons, and this requires nuclear testing.

Last July, Gorbachev announced that, as of Aug. 6, the Soviet Union would suspend nuclear testing. The moratorium would last until the end of the year, and could be extended if the United States reciprocated.

Reagan spokesmen declined the invitation. They said a test ban could not be verified, and called the offer a propaganda hoax. They said the Soviets had just completed tests of a new series of nuclear weapons, and had indeed accelerated the test schedule so it could be finished before the suspension began.

One of those rationales for refusal was false, and the Soviets would soon make the other a moot point.

The falsehood was that the Soviets had just accelerated a series of new weapons tests. The data—gathered by the Swedish National Defense Research Institute, whose Hagfors Observatory has seismometers capable of detecting underground nuclear explosions in the Soviet Union down to the level of one kiloton—indicates otherwise.

COUNTING TESTS

In 1983, the Soviets conducted 14 nuclear tests. In 1984, they conducted 18 tests. In the first half of 1985, before the moratorium took effect, they conducted 7 tests, hardly an acceleration.

If one looks at the nuclear explosions the Soviets set off underground for nonmilitary purposes (to open up gas lines, for example), it appears that the number of those tests also declined just before the moratorium. In 1983, they conducted 27 such tests, including the "peaceful nuclear explosions." In 1984, they conducted 28 tests. Yet from January through July 1985, they conducted only 8 tests in all.

The United States conducted 17 nuclear tests in 1983, 17 tests in 1984, and 16 in 1985, 7 of them after Gorbachev's moratorium began.

There is also no way US officials could truthfully say the Soviets had just completed a series of tests on new nuclear weapons. While seismometers can detect a nuclear explosion and measure its magnitude, they cannot tell what weapon is being tested. Only a fraction of the total explosive yield of a weapon is exploded in a nuclear test.

This is because a hydrogen bomb is two bombs in one—a fission explosion, which triggers a fusion implosion. To see if it works, weapons designers need only test the fission element and its trigger.

Thus there is no way anyone could measure a US or Soviet underground nuclear explosion and infer from that which weapon was being set off, or whether the weapons were new or old.

VERIFICATION MEASURES

There is another reason for doubting the Reagan administration's view that Gorbachev's offer was merely propaganda. Since 1957, the Soviets have consistently conducted most—on average, 64 percent—of their nuclear tests in the latter half of the year. Had Gorbachev wanted to score political points, he would have stopped the tests in January.

As for the other US rationale for rejecting the Soviet test-ban offer-that it cannot be vertified—this was made moot last month when Gorbachev offered to allow the United States to place seismic detectors on Soviet soil and to permit US scientists to inspect Soviet test sites if any suspicions arose.

It has been reported that 26 U.S.-designed seismometers, already in place in Norway, can detect Soviet nuclear tests of roughly one-half kiloton. In testimony last April before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Jack Evernden of the U.S. Geological Survey said an additional network of 25 seismic stations inside the U.S.S.R. "could successfully monitor compliance with a one-kiloton threshold test-ban treaty, even if such explosions were placed in large decoupling cavities." Opponents of a test ban have argued that a bomb exploded in a deep cavity could not be detected by seismometers.

As a result of this proposal, Reagan officials were forced to alter their rationale for opposing a test ban. They now say periodic testing of weapons in the existing arsenal is necessary to gauge their continued reliability, and is thus—in the words of Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle—"indispensable to maintaining the credibility of our nuclear deterrent."

However, in 1978, Norris Bradbury, director of the Los Alamos weapons lab from 1945-70, J. Carson Mark, head of the lab's theoretical division from 1947-73, and Richard Garwin, a Los Alamos consultant since 1950, wrote a letter to then-President Jimmy Carter, saying: "Can the continued operability of our stockpile of nuclear weapons be assured without future nuclear testing? . . . Our answer is 'yes.' "

They said reliability could be, and had been, assured "almost exclusively" by other means—inspection and disassembly of components, firing fuses, and remanufacturing.

The real reason for the refusal to consider test-ban offers is that the Reagan administration wants to develop a new generation of nuclear weapons. For example, a leading program in the Strategic Defense initiative is a weapon that enhances the X-ray energy of an H-bomb and funnels it into a laser beam. The labs are also developing weapons that boost other aspects of a nuclear explosion, for example electromagnetic pulse, which wipes out communications networks.

These effects have never before been tried in nuclear-weapons design. Building such weapons means testing them first.

ROBERT A. FUHRMAN

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask you and my distinguished colleagues to join me in saluting Robert A. Fuhrman, group president of Lockheed Missiles, Space, and Electronics Systems. Bob will be honored at a dinner on February 1, 1986, marking his departure from Sunnyvale to new duties in Burbank as president of Lockheed Corp.

In the 27 years that Bob has been associated with Lockheed Missiles and Space, he has been deeply involved in the U.S. Navy's Fleet Ballistic Missile Program from its inception, serving as a member of the Navy's steering task group, occupying successively higher technical management positions in the program, and receiving the Secretary of the Navy's Certificate of Commendation for his contribution. The fleet ballistic missile series—from Polaris through Trident—has been widely regarded as the Nation's most effective deterrent against nuclear war.

Under his leadership, Lockheed in Santa Clara County has become the bay area's largest employer and has continued its longstanding tradition of helpful involvement in the community's charitable and civic efforts. Bob has played a personal role in many of these efforts, including trustee of the United Way, chairman of its Loaned Executive Program for 3 years and general campaign chairman in 1978. He was a founding director of the Santa Clara County Manufacturing Group, served as its second chairman and has continued on the board for the group's entire history. Bob was a member of the San Jose Management Study's executive committee, the bay area council's board of directors, the advisory councils of Junior Achievement and the National Alliance of Businessmen, and Scout-O-Rama chairman for the Palo Alto-Stanford area Boy Scouts. He organized and recruited the leadership council for the Salvation Army's current $5 million capital fund campaign. Bob has served on the advisory boards at Santa Clara University and Stanford University, as well as the Universities of Michigan and Texas.

In his business activities, Bob is a member of the National Defense Science Board, the Aeronautics and Space Engineering Board of the National Research Council, and the Science Advisory Committee of the Alabama Space and Rocket Center. He has served on the boards of Bank of the West and the Federated Employers of the Bay Area and has been awarded Tau Beta Pi's Eminent Engineer Award, the Society of Manufacturing Engineers' Manufacturing Management and Industrial Technology Management Awards, the National Society of Aerospace Professionals John Montgomery Award for his role in the Polaris Program, the National Management Association's Silver Knight of Management and honorary memberships in Tau Beta Pi and Beta Gamma Sigma. Bob is a fellow of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics and was elected in 1976 to the National Academy of Engineering.

Bob's generous devotion of time to our area is a reflection of his own personality. I've known Bob for many years, and I've always been impressed with his sincerity, his spirit, and his high regard for the people around him. I've also come to know Bob as a friend, a friend willing at any time to devote himself to the betterment of our community and our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of this awards banquet, Robert A. Fuhrman can be confident that our country is most grateful for his contributions and accomplishments. Therefore, I ask you Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues to join in expressing my thanks and congratulations to Bob Fuhrman and to wish him the best for his health and future endeavors.

Thank you very much.

NOT TOO LONG AGO: "I HAVE A DREAM"

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, in honoring the late Martin Luther King, Jr., it should be remembered that he died barely a generation ago. The movement he led is still alive; the "dream" not completely fulfilled.

Martin Luther King created the atmosphere that required action. To his great credit, this was all done by nonviolent means. He raised the conscience of this country and compelled us all to look at the inequalities that existed. Indeed great steps were taken in breaking down the barriers to equality; from voting rights to desegregation he accomplished much for all people. The law came to recognize equality, not just on paper, but in practice.

If we are to make the fruit of his efforts last, we can not stop now. It is our task to bring to fulfillment his dream. Legal justice is now served and people's conscience has been raised. However, we must continue to break down the economic barriers to all minorities and all disadvantaged that still exist today. A constant commitment to helping the poor, improving our cities, relieving our farmers, and aiding the disadvantaged is needed.

It is fitting that Dr. King's birthday should fall at the beginning of the congressional session. His dream speech, of a dream we all should now hold, was made not too far from here and not too long ago. His remembrance should be honored by renewed efforts in making that dream come to be reality. As chairman of the Census and Population Subcommittee, I am proud to have played a part in the development and passage of the King holiday legislation. It is my fervent hope that this holiday will further raise our conscience and reinvigorate our efforts.

Attached is an article which appeared in the Washington Post, Wednesday, January 15, 1986, which expresses the debt that all people owe to Martin Luther King, Jr.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 22, 1986]

SOUTHERN WHITES OWE THANKS TO KING

ATLANTA.—The billboards went up a few weeks ago. Dramatic and elegant, they portray a pensive Martin Luther King, Jr. in shades of black and white. There is nothing more on them except a date: Jan. 20. A local advertising company raised 10 of the sidings around town to remind Atlantans that a new holiday approaches.

Not everyone needs reminders. The Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, City Hall and the Martin Luther King Center for Nonviolent Social Change have been scrambling for corporate contributions to a local holiday parade. King's home town, which expects to receive national attention during the holiday, hopes to mount a worthy extravaganza.

Yet among whites elsewhere in the South, a different attitude sometimes surfaces. Not long ago, the mayor of Claxton, Ga., was asked what his town would do for the holiday. Not much, he reckoned: "It just not something we can do without irritating the taxpayers. If they want to have something in the black community, that's fine, but the city itself will not participate."

Why? Apparently the mayor believes that while blacks may owe King a debt of gratitude, southern whites owe his memory nothing.

Is he ever wrong. Two decades after the South got on with the business of enfranchisement and desegregation, this much is clear: The social justice that King and civil rights movement forced upon the region was perhaps the best thing that ever happened to it.

If Martin Luther King was a latter-day Moses who led southern blacks toward full equality under the law, he did even more for southern whites. He led us toward the milk and honey of America's economic mainstream. The business boom that Atlanta and other parts of the South have long enjoyed would have been meager stuff indeed without King and the movement.

The reason is simple enough. Ultimately, social justice means efficiency and stability. If the movement did not create today's business boom, it did build an environment that could sustain high-quality investment and growth.

No longer was scarce money squandered on dual sets of schools, colleges, stores, restaurants and the rest. No longer was a major part of the southern work force denied real jobs and decent wages. No longer was the southern caste system allowed to undermine the work ethic among blacks and whites alike.

Suddenly the South was an attractive place in which to invest. In the five counties of metropolitan Atlanta between 1960 and 1972, service jobs increased from 50,350 to 105,900; manufacturing jobs from 85,050 to 112,800; retail jobs from 60,150 to 115,500, and wholesale jobs from 38,850 to 69,500.

Legal segregation had shackled everyone. When it was finally gone, areas that were ripe with economic potential took off. Even areas that saw little actual development reaped some benefits. The wealthier metropolitan Atlanta grew, for example, the more money state coffers held for health, education and welfare throughout Georgia.

Of course, there is a nagging irony here. While the economic benefits have touched rich and poor, the biggest beneficiary has been the middle class. In this category, far and away, whites have gained the most.

For blacks, while the civil rights movement delivered full citizenship, it didn't solve inequities that stem from poor education and historical discrimination. But for whites, it allowed mainstream southerners to become mainstream Americans. It opened the region to a business climate that was to pay handsomely for skills they already possessed.

Two decades after the end of the Civil War, Henry Grady, editor of The Atlanta Constitution, wrote that white southerners "are thankful that the issues at stake in the great Civil War were adjudged by a higher wisdom than their own." Grady and his fellow "New South" boosters knew that economic development could come about only if the South became one with the nation.

Tragically, their aspirations foundered on the twin mistakes of disenfranchisement and segregation.

No, Martin Luther King did not end these two evils by himself. The federal courts and a cast of thousands inside and outside the movement played major roles. But as a symbol of the struggle to reinstate the South as a full-fledged part of the country, the martyred pastor of Atlanta's Ebenezer Baptist Church will do nicely.

On Monday, communities throughout the South may rejoice that the issues at stake two decades ago were "adjudged by a higher wisdom than their own." The King holiday is for everyone, but especially for southern whites. Even those who are blind to the human goodness of his work have tasted its fruits—and liked them.

NATIONAL SANCTITY OF HUMAN LIFE DAY, 1986

HON. MARK D. SILJANDER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 13th anniversary of the greatest tragedy to take place in the United States in our lifetimes. The Supreme Court's decision in Roe versus Wade has resulted in the deaths of nearly 20 million unborn children and has blazed the trail for infanticide and euthanasia.

The Democratic leadership in the House has always blocked any attempt to overturn this evil decision. As a result, they too must be considered responsible for the consequences of Roe versus Wade. Every session legislation is offered to overturn this decision. Every poll that examines the depth of public feelings shows that the vast majority of Americans reject abortion on demand and favor it only in extreme cases. Yet no pro-life legislation that wasn't an amendment has ever been considered on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, the pro-life movement will never go away. Although politicians may wish it, judges may hope for it, and the feminist movement may desire it, the love of life is too strong to ever fade away. As long as I am in this Congress, I will never allow this issue to fade away.

Albert Camus once said:

Perhaps we cannot make this a world in which children do not suffer, but we can lessen the number of suffering children. And if you don't help us do this, who will?

Mr. Speaker, every time the opportunity presents itself, a pro-life Member of this Congress will introduce an amendment, a substitute or legislation that will lessen the number of suffering unborn children. I hope you will leave your mark on history in this final year of your service to the people of the United States by helping us save some lives.

I ask permission that the text of President Reagan's proclamation making today National Sanctity of Human Life Day be printed in the RECORD.

[Proclamation by the President of the United States of America]

NATIONAL SANCTITY OF HUMAN LIFE DAY, 1986

America was founded with a ringing affirmation of the transcendence of human rights. Our Declaration of Independence proclaims that the rights to "Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness" are not a grant from the government, but a gift from the Creator; and we declared that the same Divine Providence in which the new Nation placed its "firm reliance" imposes on government a solemn duty to respect and secure these fundamental rights.

Yet, on January 22, 1973, the Supreme Court of the United States struck down our laws protecting the lives of unborn children. At that time there were those who predicted confidently that in time Americans would come to accept the Court's decision and the "new ethic" that it reflects. History has proved them wrong. Each year the terrible toll of more than a million innocent human lives has weighed more heavily on the conscience of America.

Each year remarkable advances in prenatal medicine bring ever more dramatic confirmation of what common sense told us all along—that the child in the womb is simply what each of us once was: a very young, very small, dependent, vulnerable member of the human family. When Americans demand legal protections for human life, we are simply being true to our most basic principles and convictions. We are reaffirming the self-evident truths set forth in our Declaration of Independence. Indeed, we are reaffirming the consensus of civilized humanity by recognizing that children need special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth.

Those who champion the right to life know the harsh pressures and the profound anguish that drive some women to consider abortion. The most moving testimony to our reverence for human life has been the generous, even heroic efforts made by so many religious and charitable organizations to help women with problem pregnancies and to facilitate the adoption of infants into families eager to give them love and care.

Those who work to restore legal protection to the unborn do so with the knowledge that they have gone to the defense of the weak, the silent, the endangered. But that is not something new. Whenever disasters have endangered human life, we Americans have always responded swiftly and selflessly.

Respect for the sanctity of human life has not died in America. Far from it. With every passing year it shines ever more brightly in the hearts of more and more of our citizens as they come to see the issue with greater clarity in all of its dimensions. As we carry this message to our courts, our legislatures, and our fellow citizens, let us never be discouraged. Let us put our trust in God, the Lord and Giver of Life, the Creator Who endowed us with our inalienable rights. May we soon rejoice in the day when reverence for human life is enshrined as surely in our laws as in our hearts.

Now, therefore, I Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Sunday, January 19, 1986, as National Sanctity of Human Life Day. I call upon citizens of this blessed land to gather on that day in homes and places of worship to give thanks for the gift of life and to reaffirm our commitment to the dignity of every human being and the sanctity, of each human life.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this fifteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-six, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and tenth.

RONALD REAGAN.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, January 23, 1986, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED

JANUARY 24

9:30 a.m.
Appropriations
Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold oversight hearings on the foreclosure policies of the Farmers Home Administration's and on new regulations for handling delinquent farm borrowers.
SD-138

SENATE—Thursday, January 23, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 21, 1986)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Our Father in Heaven, this morning we express our profound appreciation for the officers of the Senate, for Secretary Coe, Sergeant at Arms Garcia, their assistants and staffs, who render indispensable service to the Senate. We thank You for their dedication to the task, their sensitivity to Senate needs and their ready response to those needs. We thank You for the Secretary for the Majority Greene and the Secretary for the Minority Pratt, their assistants and staffs. Like a nerve center in the body, all of the impulses, schedules, aggravations, frustrations, pains, converge on the cloakrooms and we thank You, Lord, for the remarkable way they receive and respond to this multitude of signals. Thank You for their loving interest in and care for the pages. Grant to all of these officers, assistants, staffs, and their families the richest of Your blessings throughout this year and may 1986 be the finest, most satisfying year of their lives and service. Thank You, Father in Heaven, for these splendid servants and friends. In the name of Him Who is the Friend of friends. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each; then we have special orders for Senators PROXMIRE and HART not to exceed 15 minutes; routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each; and, under rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, at 1 p.m. a live quorum will begin.

Immediately following the establishment of a quorum, a cloture vote will occur on the motion to proceed to S. 638, the Conrail bill. I hope to indicate sometime shortly after that vote what the schedule will be for the remainder of today and tomorrow, but I am not able to do that at this time. It would seem to me, if there is cloture and if we can then vote on the motion to proceed and get on the bill itself, I would be prepared not to be in session tomorrow. But if those who want to delay consideration of the bill want to delay it, then they ought to be here to delay it on Friday and Monday. But, in any event, that judgment will be made after the cloture vote.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Democratic leader is recognized.

TELEVISION IN THE SENATE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, at the close of yesterday's session, I had inquired of the distinguished majority leader as to whether or not he would be willing to call up on tomorrow, legislation to provide for Senate TV coverage. I have since spoken with the distinguished majority leader to say that, on second thought, I do not think that is a very good idea; the reason being I do not want TV in the Senate to be just filler material. I want TV in the Senate to be center stage when it is brought up. I hope the distinguished majority leader is amenable to this suggestion.

I do not want S. 28 brought up tomorrow, because I do not want that proposed legislation to be used as filler material.

I thank the majority leader for indicating yesterday afternoon that he would give some thought to having this matter brought up tomorrow. So I want the record to show that, in the event the distinguished majority leader does not heed my yesterday's request, in my judgment he is doing the better thing and certainly has my full support in not attempting to bring it up on tomorrow.

(Mr. HUMPHREY assumed the chair.)

THE AMERICAN-SOVIET DIALOG

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, our relations with the Soviet Union will be at the top of the Nation's agenda again this year. No one can reasonably doubt the Soviets will remain anything other than our principal adversary at the beginning of 1987, just as they are today, at the beginning of 1986. Nevertheless, the possibilities of developing and deepening the constructive aspects of our relationship should be fully exploited. We should make every effort to preserve and take advantage of the improved international atmosphere created by the summit meeting held in Geneva last November. We should try in various ways to continue and expand the dialog on the major issues which continue to be in contention between our two nations—particularly in the fields of arms control and our conflicting interests in various regions of the Third World.

Democrats in the Senate, and I am sure in the other body as well, will do their part to further these goals, so that peace will be preserved, international stability will be enhanced, and advancements can be made across broad fronts of problems facing our world—in education, basic living conditions for all peoples, and in human rights. These are goals and issues that go beyond party politics. We all desire the President to succeed in establishing sound agreements—sound agreements—with the Soviets in arms control. We do not ask for an agreement just for the sake of having an agreement. We want such arms control agreements to be sound and in the very best security interests of our own country as well as in the best interests of peace. The President has our full and active support in this very important enterprise.

Senator DOLE and I have encouraged the Arms Control Observer Group to continue its monitoring and advising efforts in regard to the Geneva talks again this year. We have encouraged the distinguished administrative chairman of the Arms Control Observer Group, Mr. Stevens, to make the necessary arrangements for a group visit to the negotiations early in the fourth round of the talks, preferably during the recess period early next month. I, personally, plan to accompany the group to one of the negotiation rounds later this year. I note that the current round of talks began on January 16 and that the Soviets chose to offer another comprehensive proposal at the outset of this current round.

I am not now attempting to pass judgment on the proposal one way or another, but I think it was at least an encouraging sign, and the initiative was welcomed by the President. A continued and vigorous give and take on the whole complex of issues—Euromissiles, strategic and space weaponry—if proposed in a good faith effort to reach a fair meeting of the minds will hopefully lead us to a mutually acceptable treaty capable and worthy of Senate approval as to its ratification.

In addition, Mr. President, I understand that the second Reagan-Gorbachev summit meeting will take place in the United States sometime this year—although the exact dates have not been nailed down as yet. I would hope that tangible progress on arms control matters can be validated at that time—and, of course, that further exchanges of views and, hopefully agreements on a variety of bilaterial and regional questions will occur as well.

In this regard, it seems to be useful to bring the unedited, straight, full American view of our relations with the Soviet Union directly to the Soviet people. President Reagan has great strengths as a public communicator and is highly effective in expressing his views on television. I was pleased to see the mutual exchange of views, by both President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev, beamed directly to both populations on New Year's Day this year. I understand President Reagan's brief address was broadcast in its entirety to a vast segment of the Soviet population. This is a welcome event, unprecedented in our relationship. As well, we certainly welcome Mr. Gorbachev's interest in expressing his views to the American people—he is articulate and forceful.

The American people are an informed people capable of seeing through propaganda. I am not concerned about the decision of the American people in any matter. If they are fully informed, they will make the right decision. Talleyrand stated that public opinion was wiser than Voltaire, Napoleon, or all the ministers of state, present and to come. I think Talleyrand was right. That is the point that we gain. If we could have assurance on the part of the Soviet Government that President Reagan's speech at that time would be beamed to the television audience of the peoples throughout the Soviet Union unedited and with our own interpreter doing the interpreting, it would be a tremendous step forward in my view.

I have no doubt that Mr. Reagan would come through on Soviet television as he comes through on our own—as a person who is warm, congenial, amiable, and reasonable. And while I do not agree with him on all of his policies, I think that such an appearance would be a positive one in the peace process if our President could be shown in the Soviet Union, and the Soviet people would be able to see our President and hear his remarks unfiltered and unedited.

All of this, I think, would be useful and beneficial in furthering what might be called the General American-Soviet Dialog.

With these considerations in mind, I have today suggested to the President and to the Speaker of the House, Mr. O'NEILL, that Mr. Gorbachev's upcoming visit constitutes an appropriate opportunity to extend an invitation to him to address a joint meeting of the Congress.

I should not attempt to speak for the Speaker, but I can speak for myself. I am tired of joint meetings of Congress. I think they pose serious problems in many ways. I think they are degraded by having every Tom, Dick, and Harry who comes to the United States address a joint meeting of the two Houses. But not in this case.

As I have indicated before, no Soviet leader has ever been invited to address a joint meeting, and I think Gorbachev should be invited to address a joint session with quid pro quo that the American President would be allowed to have his own appearance and statement presented during prime viewing time on Soviet television without any editing on the part of the Soviets.

It has been a longstanding practice to recognize foreign leaders in this respect, and I feel it would enhance the development of meaningful communication between the United States and the Soviet Union after years of sterile rhetoric. The recent Geneva summit meeting provided a positive beginning for a more productive relationship with the Soviet Union, and I believe every opportunity should be taken to follow up on that beginning.

I suggested that two conditions be included as part of the invitation: First, that President Reagan also be invited to address a joint meeting of the Congress after Mr. Gorbachev—whatever the President would desire in that regard; and second, that Mr. Gorbachev provide his assurance that President Reagan's address be transmitted in its entirety, live, on Soviet television in prime time. Since Mr. Gorbachev's address would be televised to the American people, it seems only fair that a reciprocal arrangement be made with the Soviets. In this way, both leaders would address both national audiences from the same podium. I believe this idea, if accepted by the President as well as Mr. Gorbachev, would help to enhance the positive development of the Soviet-American relationship.

The more the Soviet people are given the opportunity to hear our President's views, in an unfiltered way, on the vital issues between our two nations, the better the prospects for genuine understanding between our two peoples. Such an event would, I hope, help draw back the heavy curtain which has snuffed out real communications for so many years.

I ask unanimous consent that my letters, to the Speaker and the President appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC, January 23, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR TIP: The President, as you know, has invited the Soviet General Secretary, Mr. Mikhail Gorbachev, to make an official visit to the United States this year, and Mr. Gorbachev has accepted. I believe that this is a welcome event which will extend the vital process of a continuing dialogue between the two leaders. It is a tribute to you that you seized the opportunity to begin this process last April, when you led the first Congressional delegation to meet with Mr. Gorbachev. In an effort to keep that momentum alive, I led a bipartisan group of Senators in a similar effort this past September.

It occurs to me, Tip, that no Soviet leader has ever been invited to address a joint meeting of the Congress. I believe Mr. Gorbachev's upcoming visit constitutes an appropriate opportunity to extend such an invitation, and I would strongly recommend that you consider doing so. It has been a long-standing practice to recognize foreign leaders in this respect, and I feel it would enhance the development of meaningful communication between the United States and the Soviet Union after years of sterile rhetoric. The recent Geneva summit meeting provided a positive beginning for a more productive relationship with the Soviet Union, and I believe every opportunity should be taken to follow-up on that beginning.

I would suggest that two considerations be included in the invitation: First, that President Reagan also be invited to address the same joint meeting of the Congress; and second, that Mr. Gorbachev assure that President Reagan's address be transmitted in its entirety, live, on Soviet television. Since Mr. Gorbachev's address would be televised to the American people, it seems only fair that a reciprocal arrangement be made with the Soviets. In this way, both leaders would address both national audiences from the same podium.

The more the Soviet people are given the opportunity to hear our President's views, in an unfiltered way, on the vital issues between our two nations, the better the prospects for genuine understanding between our two peoples. Such an event would, I hope, help draw back the heavy curtain which has snuffed out real communication for so many years.

I would suggest that such a joint meeting be scheduled so that it may be broadcast during prime viewing time in Moscow.

I hope that you will agree that this idea, if accepted by the President as well as Mr. Gorbachev, would help to enhance the positive development of the Soviet-American relationship. I am prepared to provide any assistance that you may desire in making the appropriate arrangements for this event.

With high personal regards,

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC, January 23, 1986.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was very pleased to learn that during your meetings last November with Mr. Gorbachev in Geneva, Mr. Gorbachev accepted your invitation to visit the United States this year. The development of a more positive relationship with the Soviet Union will, of course, take time, but it is clear that the dialogue which you began with Mr. Gorbachev in Geneva has led to a better overall atmosphere in which to try to resolve our outstanding differences with the Soviet Union. In addition, the schedule for future meetings which was established at the Summit will permit the U.S. and the Soviet Union to explore their relationship regularly.

I have written to Speaker O'Neill to outline the suggestion I spoke with you about this morning, that is, that he consider inviting Mr. Gorbachev to address a joint meeting of the Congress during his upcoming visit to the United States. It is my hope that this would help to enhance the positive atmosphere within which progress is possible with the new Soviet leadership.

As I discussed with you, I also indicated to the Speaker that if he decided to extend such an invitation to Mr. Gorbachev, you should have the opportunity to address the same joint meeting. In addition, it is my feeling that the Soviets should agree to televise your address, live and in its entirety, to the Soviet people. Since any address Mr. Gorbachev made would be televised to the American people, I believe reciprocity would be in order.

I appreciated very much your expression of support for this proposal in our conversation this morning.

With highest personal regards,
Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. PROXMIRE, is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

NEW YORK TIMES SCHIZOPHRENIA ON THE TEST BAN TREATY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on December 30 last year, the New York Times lead editorial showed that even that great institution has moments of stumblebum error. Year in and year out, the New York Times editorials may be the best in the country. They also seem to be getting better with each passing year. But on last December 30 the Times tripped and fell. It picked far and away the biggest issue of our time to fall over: the issue of whether or not the United States should negotiate a nuclear test ban treaty with the Soviet Union. Here is an issue that goes to the very heart of the nuclear arms race. Stop nuclear testing, and we make the quintessential beginning at ending the arms race. If nuclear testing continues, the arms race continues no matter what other steps we take. If nuclear testing ends, we can begin the long process of reducing nuclear arsenals without the fear that a new nuclear weapon that can be delivered with greater accuracy, surer penetration and more devastating power will emerge from the testing laboratory. Without testing, the terrible specter of a perfected antimatter bomb disappears. Such a bomb could be cheap, light, portable, made to order for a terrorist intent on blowing up American cities.

What did the Times say about such a test ban treaty? It said the following:

I am going to give a series of quick quotations, and my remarks.

First, "A nuclear test ban is no substitute for an agreement to limit nuclear arsenals."

How about that? Consider: a nuclear test ban treaty is far more likely to prevent a nuclear war than an agreement to limit nuclear arsenals. Both have advantages. Both agreements would be desirable. Both would contribute to credible deterrence. Both would slow the feverish nuclear arms race. Both would save billions of dollars. But only the test ban would stop the evolution of nuclear weapons toward ever more destructive weapons.

Why are new weapons developed? Answer: Because both military forces constantly seek advantage. What kind of advantage? An advantage in lesser vulnerability and that is good. But both sides have enough invulnerability now to deter an attack. The danger is that both sides will develop a less stable advantage. Such an ability would more surely and swiftly deliver nuclear power on the adversary.

What will be the consequence on the nuclear arsenals of the two superpowers from continued nuclear weapon testing? Nuclear arsenals may be able to advance their power while reducing the number and the megatonnage. In the last 20 years the U.S. nuclear arsenal has diminished its megatonnage. It has at the same time greatly increased the potency of that arsenal. How? By changing and "improving" their nuclear weapons. Testing was quintessential to this "improvement."

Second, the New York Times wrote: "The arms race is driven by enduring rivalry, not by changing technology."

Sure. Enduring rivalry drives the arms race. And how does it drive the arms race? Answer: By changing technology. Here is the heat of the arms race. Without changing technology, reduction of nuclear missiles, and warhead, and megatonnage and throw-weights on both sides would have meaning. Ah, but with changing technology, the race toward ever more devastating technologies speeds on. Negotiators cannot stop "enduring rivalry." They can put a leash on this rivalry. How? By stopping changing technology and then agreeing to reduce nuclear arsenals.

Third, the New York Times wrote: "A complete test ban in the past would have prevented desirable and undesirable weapons alike, both those that add to nuclear stability * * * and those that detract from it. On balance it would add to nuclear stability in the long term."

You betcha. This is precisely why the United States and the Soviet Union should negotiate a test ban. The question is, Do the superpowers have a stable relationship now? They do, indeed. Best evidence: For the 40 years of the nuclear age—since Nagasaki—we have had nuclear peace. At times, the superpowers have edged toward a threat of nuclear war, but not lately. For the past 20 years the United States and the Soviets have not come close to nuclear war. Now for the first time a President of the United States and a Secretary of the Russian Communist Party can both say: "A nuclear war can never be won, and must never be fought." And they can both mean it. Now is the time to stop "changing technology" by agreeing to end nuclear testing.

Fourth, the New York Times wrote, "The testing debate is still a sideshow. The central issue * * * (is) how to lessen the incentive for launching a surprise attack."

No, the testing debate is not a sideshow. Yes, the central issue is to lessen the incentive for launching a surprise attack. And how do you lessen that incentive? Easy. You stop testing. You stop changing technology at the point which happens to be the present point—where the deterrent is so conspicuous that the leaders of both superpowers agree that a nuclear war must never be fought and can never be won. That time is now.

Fifth, the New York Times wrote: "Can the Russians be induced to reduce their threatening force of land-based missiles? Can the Reagan administration be induced to trade in its threatening star wars defense system? Further restraints of weapons modernization may be easier to reach in the wake of such a deal."

But how do we make such a deal? Answer: Again it is easy. We agree to stop testing. Without testing, star wars stops. Without testing, both Russia and the United States can with confidence greatly reduce their nuclear arsenals in full confidence that their much smaller remaining force provides a deterrent that makes a preemptive attack an act of certain mutual suicide. In fact, the United States could enter into negotiations with the Soviet Union to stop nuclear weapons testing on the condition and only on the condition that the Soviets agree to a very sharp reduction in the offensive nuclear arsenals of both superpowers.

Survival depends on stopping the nuclear arms race. It cannot stop if the technological race rushes on. This country has promised, solemnly and officially promised, twice in treaties signed by the President of the United States—I repeat, promised—to negotiate a comprehensive end to all nuclear weapons testing. One of those treaties was ratified by the Senate; one was not. We should keep our word.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I have referred from the December 30 New York Times headlined "The Test Ban Clock Nears Midnight," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TEST BAN CLOCK NEARS MIDNIGHT

Last August, Mikhail Gorbachev, the Soviet leader, announced that his country would unilaterally stop underground testing of nuclear weapons. The moratorium will expire Wednesday; the United States rejected the invitation to follow suit as soon as it was made. Is a critical chance to moderate the arms race being lost? Hardly. A nuclear test ban is no substitute for an agreement to limit nuclear arsenals.

Mr. Gorbachev's ban, lasting a mere five months, was proposed for the eve of the 40th anniversary of Hiroshima. He added a dab of substance with a letter this month offering to let Soviet test sites be inspected.

Even with that sweetener, there's no more reason to swallow the Soviet offers than to accept Reagan Administration arguments that Soviet compliance would be impossible to verify. Technical improvements in monitoring seismic waves allow detection of explosions too small for military significance.

Public sparring aside, the Administration opposes a comprehensive test ban for a simple reason—it wants to keep on testing. Is that bad? Its critics say a ban on testing new designs of warheads would halt the momentum of the arms race. But the arms race is driven by enduring rivalry, not by changing technology.

A complete test ban in the past would have prevented desirable and undesirable weapons alike, both those that add to nuclear stability, like the undetectable submarine-launched missiles, and those that detract from it, such as land-based missiles with multiple warheads like the MX. The modernization of strategic weapons, which has included a trend toward smaller, less destructive warheads, is not wholly bad.

The Administration's present plans include testing the nuclear-pumped X-ray laser, an exotic weapon of possible use in the "Star Wars" defense system. One such test was conducted last week. The X-ray laser is a good example of what a test ban could usefully close off. The stabilizing, single-headed Midgetman missile, proposed as an eventual substitute for MX-type missiles, would use the same warhead, already tested, as the MX. But a test ban might preclude other desirable weapons in the future for which no off-the-shelf warhead design were available.

A full test ban would make the nuclear powers, like reformed sinners, zealous in preventing other countries from testing nuclear weapons. On balance, it would add to strategic stability in the long term. For all that, the testing debate is still a side-show. The central issue is not how to ban nuclear tests but how to lessen the incentive for launching a surprise attack.

Can the Russians be induced to reduce their threatening force of land-based missiles? Can the Reagan Administration be induced to trade in its threatening "Star Wars" defense system? Further restraints on weapons modernization may be easier to reach in the wake of such a deal.

WHEN LIGHT PIERCED THE DARKNESS: THE RESCUE OF POLISH JEWS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, much has been written about the Holocaust, but we are still a long way from understanding why people behaved as they did. Nechama Tec's recent book, "When Light Pierced the Darkness," probes the rescue of Jews in Nazi-occupied Poland and reveals some startling findings.

A New York Times review of the book points out that "many rescuers interviewed by Mrs. Tec shared a feeling of hostility or at least estrangement from the Jews." That some Poles felt hostility toward Jews and yet risked their lives to save them belies any simple explanations of human behavior. We have much to learn about why people acted as they did during the Holocaust and why the murder of 6 million Jews was allowed to occur. Genocide is a baffling, insidious and despicable underside to mankind's positive achievements.

The dimension of moral complexity that motivates action—the actions of those who participated in the Nazi death machine and those who valiantly defied it, often abandoning the safety of silence and apathy—deserve our careful consideration. In the long run, such an understanding of the criminal mind can only improve the effectiveness of our efforts to thwart such heinous actions.

But the continuing prospect of genocide does not permit us the leisure of waiting for the answers and insights which will come from further work in this area. We have a moral imperative to do what we can, everything we can, to prevent a recurrence of the Holocaust.

The Genocide Convention exists for that very purpose. It seeks to make genocide an international crime. It is a small step, but a very important one, in halting the destruction of national, ethnic, racial, and religious groups and deserves our wholehearted support. And it deserves our support this year. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in seeking prompt action early in this session. We have waited too long already. We cannot afford to let another opportunity slip away.

MYTH OF THE DAY: MEDICAID COVERAGE IS RATIONAL, EQUITABLE OR COMPREHENSIBLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that Medicaid coverage of the poor is rational, equitable, or even comprehensible to most policymakers, let alone the poor to whom the program is targeted.

As I have pointed out, the Medicaid Program has been riddled by myths. First, that all of the poor are eligible. In fact, 5 out of 10 poor Americans have no public or private health care coverage during the year. And, if you pick any given month in 1982, Medicaid covered only 4 of every 10 Americans below the Federal poverty standard.

Second is the myth that Medicaid's costs are driven by the acute care needs of the poor. In fact, it is the long-term nursing home needs of the aged and disabled which consume the lion's share; 7 percent of the beneficiaries consume 50 percent of the entire Medicaid budget. When the high costs of acute care for the disabled are included, we find that the aged, blind, and disabled account for 70 percent of the Medicaid dollar; the AFDC population account for 70 percent of those eligible for Medicaid coverage but only 26 percent of the program's costs. Thus, savings from increased competition in health care do not offer the potential for the magnitude of savings touted by the administration's competition advocates. At best, those savings can only be gotten from 50 percent of the Medicaid budget and, realistically, there will be little competition for treating the high-cost disabled for at least a few more years so those savings will come from only a fourth of the total budget.

And, it is against this background, that the administration promotes the most insidious myth of all, seldom stated, but always implied: that the Medicaid Program that remains rationally and equitably provides health care to the poorest of Americans. Even if it does not now, and will not in the near future, it at least covers those most in need and we can smugly feel secure by that knowledge.

Unfortunately, those assurances are nothing but a myth. It does not take away from the tremendous value that Medicaid has proven itself to be for those qualified for coverage to recognize its inadequacies. Medicaid coverage is inequitable. It is not rational. And it is certainly not comprehensible, even to most policymakers.

Let us look at just three case studies developed by the Center for Social Policy in a recent report on Medicaid. These cases underscore the unfairness with which Medicaid coverage is extended to the poor.

Case No. 1.—Tom and Frank work in the same store in Portland, ME, where both receive the minimum wage for 30 hours of work per week. Tom lives with his wife and children; Frank is divorced but has custody of his children. When business slows, both are laid off. Frank qualifies for Medicaid coverage as a single parent with children; Tom does not qualify since the State does not have an AFDC-U program covering intact low-income families.

Tom learned the hard way that Medicaid coverage is a game of geographical Russian roulette for low-income families. In 25 States, including Wisconsin, Tom would have been eligible for Medicaid coverage because the State had chosen to establish an AFDC-U program.

And the establishment of an AFDC-U program for intact families is just the first variation on a theme. The States have a myriad of options for AFDC coverage, resulting in a bewildering array of categorical criteria that must be met, in addition to being low-income, if a family is to qualify for Medicaid coverage.

Case No. 2.—Consider the case of Mrs. Ball. She works as a nurse's assistant for $4.50/hr for 30 hrs/week. Separated, she lives with her 3 children—two of which are in school, one she puts in a day care center. Unfortunately, she lives in one of 16 States setting very tough criteria for AFDC eligibility and, is not eligible; in the other 34 States, or in DC, she would be eligible for AFDC and, therefore, receive health care coverage for herself and her children.

Mrs. Ball is a victim of the fact that there is no minimum for coverage of the poorest of the poor; the States can set AFDC eligibility—the gateway for Medicaid coverage—as they see fit. In 1982, the cutoff point for coverage for a mother and her child ranged from $89 a month to $508 a month in Alaska. Which means that in 11 States in 1982 a mother and child with income of only $175 a month would be considered ineligible.

Case No. 3.—The final case looks at two families in Illinois. Mr. & Mrs. Banks, a retired couple, are solely dependent upon their social security check, which was $488/month in 1982. In the same neighborhood, Ms. Rogers and her daughter also lived. Ms. Rogers, a waitress, also earns $488/month that year. Are both households eligible for Medicaid? No. Mr. and Mrs. Banks qualify because their $488 check is just below the State's SSI threshold level for eligibility ($492). But Ms. Rogers and her daughter are ineligible; the AFDC criteria are lower. Therefore, despite the fact that Ms. Rogers income is lower (it's taxable), she and her daughter are left behind by Medicaid.

As these cases demonstrate, for many, it is the luck of geography whether you qualify for Medicaid. For others, it is the happenstance of age, the composition, or structure of their family. It is not surprising to find families with comparable income being treated differently. And for single individuals, unless they meet SSI's criteria, coverage is virtually nonexistent.

Is this fair? Is this rational? It is neither. And when you examine in detail the options States can exercise for SSI and AFDC coverage, it quickly becomes clear that it is not comprehensible either. As the Center for Social Policy's report noted:

Eligibility for Medicaid is now so complex that few people understand its effects and even those close to the program sometimes fail to comprehend its intricacies.

Medicaid is too important a component of the Nation's social safety net for these problems to remain unexamined. Particularly now as we will face continuous pressure for cuts in public spending to meet the deficit targets of Gramm-Rudman.

But as long as we permit all of these myths regarding the Medicaid program to remain unchallenged, we will be making uninformed and unfair public policy decisions. And, by default, the injustice will continue.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HART

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

AFTER GRAMM-RUDMAN: A NEW CONTRACT OF COOPERATION

Mr. HART. Mr. President, there are moments in life when we are caught between clarity and helplessness. I do not know whether there is a word for this phenomenon. But it is something we have all experienced—when we slip on an icy patch of pavement, when we glance up in traffic and see we are about to collide with a car stopped ahead, or any of several experiences of that sort.

Time slows down. We see with great clarity the danger, the peril. We experience a feeling of regret, a desire to reverse the irreversible. And in the split second before the impact, we know with certainty there is not a thing we can do about it.

As a Congress, as a people, we are now caught in our own moment between clarity and helplessness. If there were no name for that sensation before, there is now: We can call it "Gramm-Rudman." That ill-conceived law is an accident in progress. We have braced for the impact. We foresee the collision. Yet we keep sliding forward.

We have returned from recess facing a yawning deficit that has grown by $48 billion over estimates that are only 5 months old. That re-estimate means Gramm-Rudman now requires $600 to $700 billion in deficit reduction over 5 years. The President tells us this will be accomplished without raising a nickel in taxes, without cutting a dime of buildup from the Pentagon.

But he is already mistaken. The statute the President carelessly embraced has produced the first real dollar decline in defense spending in 15 years. Star wars and procurement contracts were spared. Cut instead were the working expenditures that spell the difference between paper defenses and an intelligent, durable, winning military—training flights, readiness, steaming time for ships, maintenance for tanks.

Mr. President, in 11 days, the administration will announce its budget for the coming fiscal year. In 12 days, that budget will be declared dead on arrival. Not by those of us in the opposition party, but by the leadership of the majority here in the Senate. The administration will propose over $50 billion in spending reductions. It will attempt to comply with Gramm-Rudman by terminating 30 to 50 domestic programs and by selling Federal assets as if it were conducting a fire sale.

As dependable as Halley's Comet—and faithful to the tradition they established 5 years ago—its budget will be founded on a series of economic projections which every thoughtful and honest person will know are deliberately inaccurate in terms of estimates of projected growth and data of that sort.

Most of us see what is bound to happen with perfect clarity. We are facing a classic clash of ideologies and egos. The President will circle his wagons around the Defense and Treasury Departments. Absent Presidntial leadership, Congress will divide into special interest caucuses preferring to protect their favorite programs by bleeding the rest. We will enter the summer in stalemate.

Then, in August, the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget will unveil new deficit estimates. Suddenly, 6 months of budget wrangling will be rendered irrelevant. Billions in budget reductions will not be enough. The economy will not have conformed to the fanciful 4-percent growth estimates the administration has produced. As a result, the computers will order reductions of 15 percent or 20 percent or more from that scanty portion of the budget Gramm-Rudman's authors left on the table.

This is the collision we are careening toward. But, unlike a car crash or a slip on the ice, we are not yet helpless. This is a collision we can prevent.

To do so, we must return to some fundamental truths which some thought Gramm-Rudman would help us forget.

The truth about the Federal budget is that it is and must be more than a simple equation of revenues and expenditures. Like any family's budget, the Federal budget is fundamentally a statement of our values and priorities.

It should be at best a blueprint of the future we want.

The future most Americans want includes a strong and just America driven by a growing economy. That is why the titanic Reagan deficits are so dangerous: They will suffocate our future. But if we balance the budget at the expense of basic prerequisites for economic and social growth, we defeat our purpose. We will cut off our nose to spite the deficit.

A bold, innovative, compassionate Government should be capable of achieving more than the accountant's dream of balanced books. It should be an active partner in the quest for a growing and just economy. It should open the gates of a university to a student from the inner city. It should give a shot in the arm to the young child who needs immunizations. It should feed the hungry and teach them how to feed themselves. It should build a ladder to new job skills for an unemployed steelworker. It should bring a first mortgage within the reach of a young couple. It should help spark the inventions and modernize the factories that put America first in the world in trade in years past and that have let it tragically fall behind.

If we are to reach those goals, the first priority as a nation and as a society, our Government, and our budget must be investment—in our children, our workers, our schools, our factories, and our national security. Deficit reduction is one investment we must make in our future, but it is only one, and it must not preclude or totally overshadow the others.

We are not now making the investments we need. Eight million Americans remain out of work. We have lost 2 million jobs to overseas. A quarter of our students drop out of school while the children of our economic competitors go on to become engineers and scientists and productive individuals. We have let our own roads, bridges, and ports decay while our foreign competitors build new economic circulatory systems of fiber optic cables and supercomputers. Who among us can say we are doing enough as American society?

It is time to clear the haze and speak honestly about the kind of budget we need to reach, the kind of future we want as a nation. It is time to set some markers.

First, despite the clear and present danger of deficits, we must increase our investments in America—not cut them across the board. We need new investments in child nutrition, education, training, innovation, and economic modernization and productivity. Any budget that does not allow for $10 billion each year in new investments is not an opportunity budget, it is not a knowledge budget, and it is not a compassionate budget.

Second, it is time to moderate the uncontrolled defense buildup—a buildup, after 5 years, still in search of a strategy. We are now spending 100 percent more for our defenses than in 1979. We needed some of that increase, but we do not need the continuing pattern of misallocation and waste. For now, we should concentrate on reforming our military forces so our limited funds can buy a credible conventional defense.

Mr. Reagan says the next Federal budget will increase defense spending 3 percent after inflation. I say Mr. Reagan is wrong. The next defense budget must keep pace with inflation—not a penny more or less. Anyone who argues otherwise is destroying our future. Pegging the defense budget to inflation will save $100 billion over the next 5 years.

Third, we must cut spending in other areas. A budget that reflects our priorities must admit that student loans are more important than Amtrak, that worker training is more important than subsidies to the nuclear power industry. For some programs, across-the-board cuts are not good enough; we must eliminate them. Other programs must be returned to State governments, which can operate them with great competence and lower cost. In all, we should cut Federal spending by at least $100 billion over the next 5 years. That includes the increases in investment I have already mentioned.

Finally, we must increase the Federal Government's revenues. Everyone knows it, and everyone but the President has admitted it. We simply cannot keep taking 100 percent of what government has to offer at 80 percent of the cost. That includes the military. Mr. Reagan says the next Federal budget will not include a penny in new revenues. I say it must contain at least $200 billion over the next 5 years.

A good starting place would be a $10-per-barrel oil freedom fee, complemented by a gradual increase in the gasoline tax as oil imports and revenues decline. These fees will promote conservation, revive our domestic petroleum industry, and strengthen our energy security. They can also raise close to $90 billion over the next 5 years.

We must also demand better tax enforcement, and require that those who benefited disproportionately from the Reagan tax cuts now pay their fair share. It is unconscionable that Gramm-Rudman cuts vital social and economic spending without cutting a penny of the billions in "tax spending" that powerful corporations and the wealthy enjoy each year. The collector who makes his $100,000 buying and selling antique cars should pay the same taxes as the office worker who makes his $20,000 working a word processor.

Mr. President, I fought Gramm-Rudman; I voted against it. It is folly and it should be repealed. We should replace it with an agreement between Congress and the President to achieve a "full employment balanced budget" in a way that will not ruin our country's economic future.

Whether or not we repeal Gramm-Rudman, we must write a new contract of cooperation between the Congress and the President. The basic articles of faith in this contract must be: New investment in America; leveling off the defense buildup, particularly in the nuclear area; new revenues; and spending cuts. Those new revenues should not come from an income tax on middle- and lower-income Americans.

For this contract to work, all parties must surrender their ideological totems. The President and his party must abandon their intransigence on revenues and on the defense buildup. Members of my own party must abandon their intransigence on certain entitlement programs—for there is no hope of cutting billions in spending without reforming Medicare, Federal pensions, and commodity support programs.

This meeting of the minds must happen soon. If it does not occur by the end of February, there can be little hope of escaping the bed of Procrustes now called sequestration. Only those who are indifferent to deficit reduction and invesment in our economy will be absent from the table by the first day of March.

Mr. President, the challenge for this Nation and this Congress is not a revisit the debate over Gramm-Rudman. We each have our own opinions, but history will ultimately decide that law's merits.

History will decide whether Gramm-Rudman in the 1980's will be a metaphor for the same kind of economic isolationism and disarray as the Smoot-Hawley tariff a half century earlier.

History will decide whether—like the 19th amendment to the Constitution—Gramm-Rudman will be repealed as foolish, unwise, and unworkable.

And history will decide whether the authors of Gramm-Rudman will finally echo the words of Pyrrhus, who said, after defeating the Romans at Asculum, "one more such victory and we are lost."

Time will determine Gramm-Rudman's place in history. But only we can decide whether America will settle for a balanced budget, or strive for a balanced economy and a balanced society.

At America's proudest moments, this Nation and Congress have shown courage and patriotism by rising above partisanship, above politics, and above sacrifice to protect and defend the priorities and the values that have made us great. I am confident we can and will show the same courage and patriotism now. I am confident we will choose clarity over helplessness, and steer this Nation safely to a better future.

COMMENDING BISHOP DESMOND TUTU FOR HIS COURAGEOUS WORK FOR EQUALITY AND PEACE IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am proud to join the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] in introducing a resolution to commend Bishop Desmond Tutu for his courageous leadership in the struggle for justice, equality, and peace in South Africa.

Bishop Tutu is well known not only in this country but indeed, throughout the world. He is a Nobel laureate, a leading theologian, a man of immense personal courage, a moral leader, and one of a dwindling number of voices preaching nonviolence in a land already racked by the pain and violence of apartheid.

Mr. President, I believe that it is significant that Bishop Tutu recently traveled to Atlanta, GA, to participate in the first national observance of the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. While in Atlanta, Mr. President, Bishop Tutu was presented the Martin Luther King, Jr., Non-Violent Peace Prize by Dr. King's widow, Mrs. Coretta Scott King.

Like Dr. King, Bishop Tutu responds to the call of a higher authority in his quest for right. He leads through the power of love and moral suasion; powers as old as the Bible, as current as the day's headlines, and stronger than the greatest armies.

To hear Bishop Tutu speak, Mr. President, is to lose any doubt that this Nation must cast its lot with "the least of these" in South Africa. To hear him speak is to know that apartheid is "an evil and immoral system which cannot be reformed." To hear him speak is to know that apartheid must be destroyed. It is to know that South Africa will be free.

Moreover, Mr. President, Bishop Tutu readily admits that he has been thrust into a position of political leadership not by choice, but through default—for the original leaders of the South African majority have been jailed, like Nelson Mandela; murdered, like Steven Biko; banished, like Oliver Tambo; and silenced, like Donald Woods. We can only be thankful Mr. President, that after losses of this magnitude, there are still voices of reason like Bishop Tutu's to fill the void.

Thanks to the work of Bishop Tutu and thousands of other committed, yet unheralded activists, the seeds of victory in South Africa have been sown. In this Nation, they have been sown on college campuses and in our churches. We have even begun to sow them within the fortified walls of our corporations and pension funds.

Those are seeds which all people of conscience and good will must never, never cease to water, to nuture, and to tend, for we hear the voice of ageless prophecy assuring us that we shall indeed reap what we sow.

Mr. President, the suffering and struggle of Bishop Tutu proves once again that the trek across the wasteland of injustice is always long and difficult. But as Dr. King so eloquently reminded us, "the moral arc of the universe is long, but it bends toward justice."

Mr. President, the people of the United States must pledge to continue walking that dry, hot path with Bishop Tutu until the barren desert of oppression blossoms like a garden, "until justice rolls down like water and righteousness like a mighty stream"—for we know that the oppressed people of South Africa have manifested the will for freedom—and will not remain oppressed forever.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which the Senator from Maryland and I are introducing today be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 103

Whereas Desmond Tutu has committed himself to nonviolent change in South Africa;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has advocated direct dialogue between blacks and whites as the central need for the future of South Africa;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has personally rescued victims of mob violence from certain injury or death at great risk to himself;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has advocated economic sanctions against South Africa as a means to peacefully encourage Pretoria to dismantle the apartheid system of racial separation;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has repeatedly turned to the United States for assistance in his quest for peaceful change in his native country, and

Whereas Desmond Tutu received the 1984 Nobel Peace Prize for his moral leadership in South Africa, Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress commends Bishop Desmond Tutu for his courageous work for peace and freedom in South Africa, and

That Congress encourages all South Africans to heed Bishop Tutu's call for a peaceful end to apartheid.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, if the previous order accommodates, I shall yield whatever time I have remaining to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, by this measure we salute moral leadership and a moral leader.

There can be no more exacting test of character, of leadership, than a man's willingness to stand up and put his life in danger to promote and defend his people and his principles. There is no more demanding test of that man's courage than to stand up and lead his people in the path of nonviolent change when the odds are so overwhelmingly against him.

Bishop Desmond Tutu is a man of such courage. "Valor," as Carl Sandberg wrote, "is a gift. Those having it never know for sure whether they have it till the test comes. And those having it in one test never know for sure if they will have it when the next test comes."

The tests have come with staggering frequency and intensity to Bishop Tutu in his years as a schoolmaster and a parish priest and now a truly humanitarian leader on a national and international scale. And he has passed them each time in his unrelenting search for a peaceful path to freedom and justice and reconciliation in South Africa.

Repeatedly, Bishop Tutu has called on his people to protest peacefully and without violence against the inhumane system of apartheid. Repeatedly, he has personally intervened in explosive confrontations to head off more violence and tragedy.

Repeatedly, he has sought to inspire a vision of the future when the pressures of the moment would tempt less patient and visionary men and women to precipitate violent action. While many urged immediate sanctions, he called for an 18-month to 2-year delay with a final deadline to encourage peaceful change. While many resist negotiations, he has sought talks with the leaders of South African Government. In recent weeks, he has traveled in the United States not only to honor Martin Luther King but to secure funds to expand educational opportunities for black South Africans. By such activities he has gained the attention of the world and earned the Nobel Peace Prize.

Let me close by reciting what I consider a remarkably simple and honest plea made by Bishop Tutu last year, a plea to white South Africans which reflects his commitment to peace and reconciliation:

It is that we too are just ordinary human beings. We too love to be with our wives everyday; we too want our children to rush out to meet us as we come back from work; we too would like to live where we can afford it.

We too want to be able to move freely in the land of our birth, we too want to have security of tenure. We too want to participate in the decisions that affect our lives. These are not extravagant demands. They are the expectation of any human being. We want to have a new kind of South Africa. Where we all, black and white, can walk tall together, black and white, into the glorious future which God is opening before us, black and white together.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements limited to 5 minutes each.

CONRAIL SALE

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, in the course of approximately 15 minutes there will be a live quorum as provided by the procedural rules for the day, and then the scheduling of a cloture vote on the proposition to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern. For the past 3 days—Tuesday, Wednesday, and today—the attention of the Senate has turned to this issue. I opposed the unanimous-consent request to proceed to the consideration of the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern because it seemed to this Senator that there needed to be some focused attention on the underlying issues.

In the course of the presentations, we have attracted the attention of some Senators on the Senate floor, and that is always a difficult matter, especially when the facts are as complex as those present in this subject.

The debate, Mr. President, has laid the foundation to show that the Senate must give very extensive consideration to the antitrust implications of the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. In this matter there is no independent ICC consideration as is customary in a proposed merger, and as is present, for example, in the pending merger between Santa Fe and Southern Pacific Railroads.

It is obvious that the Department of Justice has not given the kind of analysis needed to give the Senate assurance that the antitrust considerations have adequately been considered.

Back in January of 1985, the Department of Justice wrote to the Secretary of Transportation saying that there would be antitrust violations with the proposed merger unless there were appropriate divestitures.

Since that time, Norfolk Southern has come forward with three proposals for divestiture to two small rail lines, the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie and Guilford transportation industries. Both of the first two proposals were rejected by the Department of Justice as being inadequate to provide the requisite competition.

Then, when a third proposal was made in November, in short order the Department of Justice gave what it calls preliminary approval. This is somewhat unfathomable, given the context that the Department of Justice has opposed the proposed merger of Southern Pacific and Santa Fe—a merger which would be less violative of the antitrust laws than the Conrail-Norfolk Southern proposal.

The procedures by the Department of Justice are strange, as evidenced in a letter, which I previously placed in the RECORD, from Assistant Attorney General Douglas Ginsburg to me, dated January 21, 1986. This letter referred to a request for information and documents which I had outstanding for some time, and was only delivered to me while I was on the Senate floor on Tuesday of this week, discussing this issue.

The letter from Mr. Ginsburg to me, dated January 21, 1986, contained copies of letters which have been sent by the Department of Justice to Pittsburgh & Lake Erie and Guilford.

I now refer to a letter dated January 8, 1986, from attorney Paul A. Mapes of the Antitrust Division to Joe Sims, Esq., representing Guilford, which says at page 2:

> However, the nature and viability of the rail service your client intends to provide on the divested properties is of major interest to Congress and the public.

I could not agree more with the statement of the Antitrust Division that it is of interest to Congress, and of course Congress includes the U.S. Senate. But if this body is going to be voting on the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern at this time, or next week or the week after, before this information is provided, then obviously, the Senate, as part of the Congress, is not in a position to review these very important matters.

That is why this Senator so strenuously contends that this entire issue is not ripe for consideration by the Senate. We are really being asked to buy a pig in a poke on a matter of enormous importance to this country—the joinder of the 18,000-mile Norfolk Southern line with the 15,000-mile Conrail line, in a context where the Department of Justice has said that this joinder would violate the antitrust laws unless there is appropriate divestiture. There have been two proposals of divestiture to the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie and Guilford railroads, which were rejected by the Department of Justice after an expansive study by a consultant, R.L. Banks. Now the Department of Justice is going back into the field and selecting a new consultant. Why they are not going to Banks is explainable only in terms of their anticipation of a finding by Banks that proposal 3 violates the antitrust laws, as proposals 1 and 2 did.

There have been preliminary studies by the U.S. Railway Association on the third plan. In a letter dated December 3, 1985, to Representative JAMES J. FLORIO, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, the U.S. Railway Association commented:

> Lacking definitive agreements which should clarify important terms still under negotiation, the divestiture carriers have not revised their operating plans and financial projections.

That letter makes the obvious point that there can be no determination on the sketchy state of the present record as to whether any proposals would comply with the antitrust laws.

The third proposal contains the infirmities of the first two. There will continue to be "little or no service to many of the problem markets," a failure identified by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, in his letter to the Department of Transportation dated September 25, 1985.

The problems raised in that letter are still present. The Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie will not meet the test of the Department of Justice for effective competition. The facilities to be acquired are inferior to those to be retained by Norfolk Southern-Conrail. One specific criticism by the Department of Justice is with respect to the yard which Guilford would use in St. Louis. The very cogent objections raised by Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg in his letter of September 25, 1985, to Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole are still present.

Mr. President, that is why it seems to this Senator that the underlying issue of the sale to Norfolk Southern should not be voted upon by this body until we have the details of the divestiture proposal and until there is a hearing by the Committee on the Judiciary on these very important issues. It is only after such consideration has been given that the U.S. Senate will be in a position to undertake an analysis as to whether, in any event, there could be a sale to Norfolk Southern.

Then the issue would arise as a comparison of the merits between Norfolk Southern as a buyer and Morgan Stanley as a buyer—that is, the investor group which has been put together by Morgan Stanley. When we come to that point, the arguments in favor of Morgan Stanley are very substantial.

First, Morgan Stanley has offered $200 million in excess of the Norfolk Southern offer. Second, if Norfolk Southern acquires Conrail, Norfolk Southern will have a tax advantage in the neighborhood of $400 million, or perhaps as high as $800 million.

The offer of Morgan Stanley, with $200 million excess cash on its face and additional tax factors, would bring dollars to the taxpayers of the United States in the range of $600 million, at a minimum, and perhaps as high as $1 billion. These considerations may well be undertaken by further review by the Department of Commerce.

One suggestion which may arise as a possible amendment would be to have the bill recommitted to the Senate Committee on Commerce for consideration of the Morgan Stanley offer, and there certainly should be consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary of these very serious antitrust issues.

Mr. President, it is my thought that these matters should be foremost in the minds of Senators as we approach the consideration of this very important issue involving the transportation of our Nation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, we are about to act on a motion to invoke cloture on the motion to proceed to S. 638, the Conrail sale legislation.

I continue to believe that S. 638 is a fatally flawed bill. It is far inferior financially to the Morgan Stanley proposal. S. 638's sale recommendation provides the Government with over $600 million less than the Morgan Stanley public offering. What is more, the bill raises the most serious kind of antitrust concerns. I think selling Conrail to the Norfolk Southern violates the antitrust laws, and that the efforts to date to cure the antitrust problems have been hopelessly inadequate. What is more, no one, including the Justice Department, has seen the kind of detailed financial and operating information made available in all other merger cases. In the absence of this information, it is impossible for anyone to conclude that the antitrust problems that even the Justice Department admits exist have been resolved.

It seems to me that the Morgan Stanley proposal represents a far better basis for Senate action on the Conrail sale issue, and that we should be moving to proceed to that bill, not S. 638. I do want to sell Conrail, however, and I want to sell it this year. I therefore intend to support cloture on the motion to proceed to S. 638. I do so reluctantly, and only because I believe there is no other practical way to bring the Morgan Stanley alternative before the Senate.

I urge my colleagues to remember, though, that S. 638 does present extremely important antitrust issues, tax issues, issues related to the value of the competing proposals, and issues related to the economic future of railroading in the East, the Midwest, and the rest of the Nation. These issues require and deserve time for full and fair consideration by the Senate. I hope and expect the Senate will provide that kind of opportunity if and when S. 638 is finally before us.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, although I oppose the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corp., I will vote for cloture on the motion to proceed. The issues posed by this legislation are too important to be clouded amidst parliamentary maneuverings. It is time we proceed to the bill at hand, and bring to light the various concerns many of us hold about the potential impact of this legislation. In my mind, this institution works best when we can avoid excessive parliamentary battles and, instead, allow the forces of debate and argument to produce the appropriate legislative response.

I welcome the opportunity to engage in the debate surrounding the Conrail Sale Amendments Act, S. 638. Indeed, only until the debate proceeds to the legislation itself can we begin the process necessary to achieve those changes which will more clearly address the problems at hand.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I support the motion to proceed with consideration of S. 638.

Should the Federal Government remain involved in the business of supporting an ailing Conrail? That is the first question to be answered when considering this issue. I believe the answer is, "No." Each year, Conrail costs the Federal Government $20 million for employee protection alone. Since 1976, the total cost to subsidize Conrail has been $7.3 billion. As we strive to lower the Federal deficit, I cannot justify continuing such expenditures to Conrail when another alternative is at hand.

Second question: Should the Federal Government sell its share of Conrail to a group of investors led by Morgan Stanley, or should Conrail be sold to Norfolk Southern? Framing this second question is simple, answering it is much more difficult. Two highly pertinent factors to be considered in formulating our answer must be those of national interest and the interests of the Conrail employees.

On the question of employment, Conrail has proven to be a profitable rail carrier, yet it continues to abandon lines and layoff employees. Since 1976, Conrail's work force has been reduced by 59,000 employees. In the span of 1 year, July 1984 through July 1985, Conrail lost nearly 3,600 employees, or over 9 percent of its work force. As Conrail's traffic continues to decline and as it continues to scale back its operations to save money, more displacement of its work force is expected.

For example, in its most recent operating plan, Conrail projected that it will layoff some 4,500 employees over the next 5 years. Norfolk Southern anticipates only 1,800 layoffs in that same period. Further, Norfolk Southern foresees the creation of approximately 600 new positions in the next few years due to the increased business generated by a combined Norfolk Southern-Conrail.

Let me quote a letter from Jim Snyder, national legislative director of the United Transportation Union dated November 27, 1985, to a number of U.S. Senators:

> I know that you are well aware of the many problems created by the rail crisis during the past two decades and of the enormous burden that has been borne by rail employees as a result of the financial collapse of the northeastern and midwestern railroads. Unfortunately, despite massive amounts of Federal funding and major sacrifices by rail labor, Conrail management continues to find it necessary to shrink the system in order to survive. In the last 12 months alone, the railroad has reduced its work force by another 3,200 employees.

Mr. Snyder goes on to conclude:

> In my personal opinion, we would be pleased if you analyze the record of one of the bidders for Conrail, the Norfolk Southern Corp. That company, in my view, has a record of stable employment as well as one of improving its service to shippers and developing new opportunities for those who wish to locate on its lines.

On the question of national interest, it is a given in this debate that the Nation benefits from a stable, secure rail system. By my analysis, it appears that Norfolk Southern's proposal offers the ability and resources to contribute to that goal. Norfolk Southern's net income last year was $482.2 million. It has assets of $8.7 billion, cash in short-term investments exceeding $1 billion, and a long-term debt of $858 million. All of its capital improvements for the past 2½ years have been financed from current earnings. Its managerial talent and expertise in this field is substantial.

A combined Norfolk Southern-Conrail would provide an economically sound railroad and enhanced competition. The Department of Justice has not yet approved the current divestiture plan, but is confident that the current plan will encourage competition and create new markets for railway alternatives, such as in the trucking industry.

On balance, therefore, I support the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. I believe it offers us the best combination of benefits for its employees and for the Nation as a whole.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the motion to proceed to consideration of S. 638, legislation to implement the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. The time has come for the Senate to deliberate this matter, which has been under intense examination by many people for many months.

The notion of selling Conrail is not a new one. In 1981 Congress passed the Northeast Rail Services Act, which established a process for selling Conrail in the private sector. It is this process which brings us to the Senate floor today, 4 years later.

Even with this mandate, opponents of this motion to proceed will argue that several questions remain unanswered about any sale of Conrail, and thus that further study is necessary before a decision can be made. The record of deliberations in this matter does not support this conclusion.

Three years ago, in accordance with the Northeast Rail Services Act, the Department of Transportation began the formal process of finding a buyer for Conrail by hiring an investment banker and proceeding to solicit bids. Throughout 1983 and the first part of 1984, the Department and Goldman Sachs contacted over 100 corporations, and a competitive bidding process resulted in the submission of 15 bids by June 1984. Subsequently, the Department conducted extensive analyses and negotiations regarding these bids, which culminated in the selection of Norfolk Southern in February of this year, 3 years after the process was begun.

Furthermore, numerous Senate hearings have been held on this matter. The Commerce Committee has held 5 days of hearings—1 prior to the selection of Norfolk Southern, 3 of them dealing directly with the selection of Norfolk Southern, and 1 day on the Morgan Stanley public offering proposal which was submitted after the selection of Norfolk Southern. Furthermore, the Judiciary Committee has held 2 days of hearings. Voluminous testimony has been submitted from representatives of the administration, shippers, affected railroads, rail labor, and investment bankers.

In addition to the efforts of the Department of Transportation and the testimony received, substantial information has been compiled on the various issues relating to the proposed sale. We have numerous studies on the viability of Conrail as a stand-alone entity, including analyses by the Department of Transportation, various parties who bid for Conrail, and the U.S. Railway Association. We have for our review various studies on the tax aspects of a sale to Norfolk Southern, including analyses by the Treasury Department and the Congressional Budget Office. We have numerous studies of the competitive impacts of a sale to Norfolk Southern, including an analysis by the Department of Justice and studies of traffic diversions impacting other railroads by staff at the Interstate Commerce Commission and the U.S. Railway Association. The questions have been asked and numerous answers given.

Opponents of the motion to proceed, however, will argue that because the Department of Justice has not yet given formal approval of the sale to Norfolk Southern, the Senate should not act at this time. I do not agree with this conclusion.

First of all, I might remind my colleagues that S. 638 as reported provides that no sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern shall be consummated until the Justice Department has approved the sale.

Furthermore, the Justice Department has recently said that the sale as now structured seems to meet the anticompetitive objections it raised previously. This statement comes as a result of many months of negotiation which began late last year when the Secretary of Transportation asked the Department of Justice to review the proposed sale to Norfolk Southern. In response to the Secretary's request, the Department of Justice conducted what it has termed a most extensive review and concluded that a sale to Norfolk Southern would not pose competitive problems if certain line divestitures and joint operations were provided to other carriers in the region.

In accordance with this conclusion, Norfolk Southern proceeded to negotiate certain arrangements with Guilford Transportation and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad. The Justice Department raised concerns that these arrangements as originally negotiated did not adequately respond to its objections, and, in response to that, the parties made a number of revisions, resulting in the package which the Justice Department recently announced seemed to satisfy its concerns.

The proposed sale to Norfolk Southern has indeed received close scrutiny by the Justice Department. It is clear that the Justice Department has played an active role in ensuring that the sale is not anticompetitive. The Senate need not wait any longer to act.

Finally, those opposed to Senate consideration of this bill will argue that there will be nothing lost by waiting, that perhaps better offers to purchase Conrail might be made in the interim, and that maybe Conrail should not be sold at all. I want to stress to my colleagues that there is harm in waiting. Conrail should be sold, and now is the time to act. The Norfolk Southern offer is the result of many months of bid solicitation assessment and negotiation. After such extensive preparation and study, should we take the risk that waiting will produce a new buyer and a better offer? Furthermore, Conrail shippers and employees need certainty about the future of rail service in the Northeast region. Delay can only create more uncertainty and perhaps frustrate a responsible sale of Conrail.

I cosponsored S. 638 because I believe that a sale to Norfolk Southern represents the strongest alternative to ensuring a more certain future for the Conrail system. Much time and effort has been spent to bring this proposal before the Senate today, and I urge my colleagues to consider its merits.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this 2d session of the 99th Congress is just a few hours old, and yet we are already entangled in extended debate. We will have, as our first vote in 1986, a vote not on a substantive issue, but a procedural vote on cloture relating to the Conrail bill. This is not an encouraging beginning, given the seriousness and urgency of the many issues we must resolve this year. I will vote to invoke cloture on the motion to proceed to the Conrail bill. I will do so not as a merit judgment on the Norfolk-Southern position versus the Morgan Stanley position, but in the belief that we must expedite the business of the Senate. The issues raised by the proposed sale of Conrail are many and complex. I want the privilege of hearing the debate. My mind is not yet made up.

Mr. DOLE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I will vote against the motion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must suspend.

One hour having elapsed since the Senate convened, the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose does the Senator address the Chair?

Mr. METZENBAUM. For the purpose of propounding a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. PRESSLER. I want to put a speech in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his request.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Dakota may be heard, that immediately thereafter the Senate revert to the quorum call that was occurring, and that the Senate not be in a different posture than it was prior to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Dakota.

THE MOTION TO PROCEED WITH CONRAIL

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I will vote against the motion to proceed to consideration of S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act, later today. I expect the Senate will vote to go forward on this issue. Indeed, I expect that many who agree with me on the merits of this issue will vote to proceed with debate. I cannot in good conscience vote to go forward at this time. This is a very unusual vote for me, so I wanted to explain my reasons for voting this way.

There are many reasons we should not go forward with debate on Conrail at this time. I will highlight just a few which I believe to be of particular importance.

LACK OF ANTITRUST INFORMATION

First, as a number of Senators have pointed out, we simply do not have adequate information on the anticompetitive impacts of this unprecedented rail merger. If we allow this merger to go forward, we will be creating the largest transportation conglomerate in the United States, indeed probably the largest in the free world, without having answered the very fundamental questions that are required to be answered in any rail merger. We do not have any study of the impact this will have on my part of the country, much less the normally detailed study of its impact on the immediate Conrail-Norfolk Southern region. The Department of Justice has explicitly refused even to consider the problems this merger will have on the Midwest, the West, and other parts of the country.

And believe me, as a member of the Commerce Committee who has been working on the Conrail issue for some time, this absence of information is not for lack of trying on our part. I, along with a number of other Senators, have been asking for this information from the start.

We discovered that the Justice Department is applying a double standard in their railroad merger analyses. They have used two very different methods in analyzing the two big railroad merger cases presently being considered in this country. In a merger case being considered in the South and Western part of the country—Santa Fe-Southern Pacific—the Department is using a fairly rigorous analysis known as the Pittman method. Justice is opposing that merger.

But in the Norfolk Southern/Conrail merger, one that is roughly twice the size of the merger they oppose in the South and West, the Department has used a much less rigorous analysis. Justice seemingly supports this merger.

I am not sure which decision was made first—whether to support the merger or whether to use a much less rigorous analysis. But I do know that this double standard approach is dangerously misleading and very unfair to the parties involved.

We have asked the Justice Department to explain. In addition to a number of earlier informal and committee inquiries, I formally asked the Department of Justice to provide me with this information as early as May 15, 1985. Nearly 5 months later, on October 3, after repeated phone calls and an editorial published in the September 25 edition of the Chicago Tribune, I received a 10-page letter from the Department of Justice dated August 30 which was long on words but short on substance. In essence it said:

> While there were minor differences in the manner in which the guidelines were applied to each transaction, the same fundamental analytical principles were followed in both cases. The differences arose largely because of the differences in the nature of the two mergers and the contexts in which the Department reviewed them and, to a lesser degree, simply because two different economic experts were involved in the two matters.

The letter goes on to state that:

> Although the amount of so-called "problem revenues" identified in the NS/Conrail merger might have been somewhat larger under Dr. Pittman's application of the guidelines, our conclusions and recommendations would not have differed under either approach.

Mr. President, I must give the Department of Justice credit in that they at least admitted there were "minor differences" between the two methodologies. But let me explain just briefly some of these "minor" differences:

First, in the Department's NS/CR analysis they came up with a 6-page printout identifying anticompetitive market points; applying the Pittman analysis to the exact same transaction we get over 500 pages of printouts identifying anticompetitive points!

Second, as the Department admitted in its letter, they applied a host of "screens" in their original NS/CR study that they did not apply in the Pittman methodology. The result of these screens was to simply factor out thousands upon thousands of problem tons which made the merger look much less anticompetitive.

Third, they did not even bother to consider affected tonnage outside the immediate NS/CR region. Indeed, under the Pittman methodology, over one-half of the problem tonnage identified was outside the NS/CR region or unaffected in any way by the proposed divestiture plan. It is this aspect of the study which upsets me the most because that tonnage is in places like the Midwest or the West, which has been ignored throughout this entire process.

There were other differences, but I think I have made my point. The point is that these differences were anything but "minor," and I have a hard time believing that the Justice Department could in good faith say that they believe their "recommendations would not have differed" when they did not even bother to check the other approach. One of the reasons given for not bothering with the Pittman methodology was that it would be too time consuming and expensive. Well, it took us 3 days using the exact same program to run these numbers through the computers. If a transaction of this magnitude is not worth 3 days of a Justice Department economist's time, I do not understand why 100 Senators should spend our time on it now. Let us get these answers and come back here when we have something to argue about.

NO PROTECTION FOR THE MIDWEST

Conrail originally became a ward of the Federal Government because of the large number of railroad failures in the Northeast. Because this merger would give Norfolk Southern a virtual monopoly east of the Mississippi, it would effectively give them control over transcontinental traffic originating and terminating in the East. This will, I am quite confident, lead to a number of railroad failures in other parts of the country. Unfortunately, I am not alone in my belief.

The various railroads around the country which face extinction agree. Despite the Department of Transportation's optimistic predictions to the contrary, we will have railroad failures as a result of this megamerger. And I for one do not like the idea of having those failures begin in my backyard. It would be ironic indeed if, as a result of turning Conrail back to the private sector and getting the Federal Government out of the railroad business in the Northeast, we unwittingly set the wheels in motion for larger railroad failures in other parts of the country, thereby starting the process all over again.

There has been a lot of talk about the viability of a "stand-alone" Conrail. Today, I will leave that issue to my other colleagues. It is not Conrail's viability that worries me. It is the viability of the many railroads throughout the country which worries me. It worries me a great deal, and it should worry many of my colleagues when they take a hard look at this proposal. I urge you to check in your own backyards and ask where this will bring us in a decade or two.

I could not help but chuckle when I found on my desk recently a copy of an impressive looking binder prepared by the Department of Transportation, full of information about how this merger will help South Dakota. I might make just a few suggestions to the Department: Call the railroads in South Dakota. Call the shippers in South Dakota. Call the transportation officials in South Dakota. Call the railroad employees in South Dakota. Call the elected officials in South Dakota. Call any of these people in South Dakota and tell them this sale will have no adverse effect on our State. Tell them how it will help the State. Better yet, maybe you should save your quarters because I have talked to them all and I think I can tell you what their response would be.

Mr. President, I raise this point because I think it is indicative of the kind of preposterous information we have been receiving from some of the agencies. They have long since lost their credibility on this issue. These are not objective administration information packets, they are lobbyist position papers.

I would urge those Senators who have received the same packet of information to call these same people in your States and ask them these questions. I think you will find a much different picture than the rosy one painted by the Department of Transportation in the optimistic binders we all found on our desks.

CONCLUSION

I could go on and on with reasons why we should not go forward with this bill at this time. If we do, and I suspect that will be the case, I will have an amendment to offer which addresses some of the concerns I have raised, so I am prepared to go forward with that amendment if we must proceed with this bill.

We all want to see Conrail turned back to the private sector, but I hope we can find a way to do it that will not threaten the transportation system in the rest of the country, and I hope we can do it in a forum where we have all the information needed to fully debate and understand the implications of this transaction.

In conclusion, I would say my concern is for the regional railroads of America, those railroads that will have to deal with a monopoly east of the Mississippi. We are in a situation where if we create a monopoly east of the Mississippi, that railroad can engage in predatory practices with any railroad or truck line that feeds into it. Across the West and Midwest of this country small regional railroads have expressed much concern about what will happen at the gateways in terms of rates, in terms of rolling stock, and in terms of other issues that face those railroads. We are on the brink of creating the most monopolistic railroad since the late 19th century. Our entire transportation system will suffer.

I hope the Congress does not approve the Conrail plan as proposed.

Mr. President, I yield back my time.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, before I make this request, I wish to indicate that it has been cleared with the distinguished minority leader.

I ask unanimous consent that the live quorum call under rule XXII be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent that the cloture vote occur at 1:30 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate we have been discussing this matter with the distinguished Senators from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and others, and the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator DANFORTH. It is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania was going to suggest that we vitiate the vote on cloture. I indicated that many Members wanted to vote on the motion to proceed and have returned to Washington for that purpose. So we will have that vote.

At this time I yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania for further remarks.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

I would like to state the substance of our conversation and my own inclination to vitiate the vote on cloture, but I understand the concern of the majority leader and the concern of my colleagues who have come back for this vote.

I had suggested vitiating the vote on cloture because it is my view that it is the sense of this body to proceed to consideration of the bill. It is also my view that any vote on cloture would not be representative of the very strong support which exists for the Morgan Stanley offer, and the very substantial opposition which exists against Norfolk Southern.

For a number of reasons, I intend to vote in favor of cloture and I would urge all those who oppose the sale to Norfolk Southern to do the same for tactical reasons, as has been the practice from time to time for everyone to vote on one side so that there is no inference as to the strength of the underlying position.

There are some important considerations which will come before this body next week. The issue that the distinguished Senator from South Dakota has raised about antitrust matters will be the subject of a motion to recommit the bill or to send the bill to the Judiciary Committee so that there can be consideration of this issue.

There may be a motion to recommit to the Commerce Committee so that the Morgan Stanley matter can be considered.

There will be an amendment as a substitute for the Morgan Stanley offer.

I have discussed with the distinguished manager of the bill, the chairman of the Commerce Committee, the possibility of some time agreements on some of those amendments. There are others of us who will reserve our rights after the cloture vote next week to take whatever action we believe to be appropriate by way of postcloture filibuster, if that should be indicated.

The distinguished majority leader has stated that he would not file a cloture motion until at least Tuesday of next week so that there will not be a vote on that cloture motion until Thursday of next week. That accommodates some of the considerations which are important to this Senator.

It seems to this Senator that it is not necessary to have extended discussion on Friday or Monday on this matter, and that all of the considerations can be accommodated when we reach the important issues next week as the matter is called again before this body. For those reasons, I would urge all those who are opposed to Norfolk Southern, and who favor Morgan Stanley, to vote in favor of cloture at this time for those tactical reasons mentioned. I thank the Chair.

Mr. DOLE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have heard the discussion between the majority leader and the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have no fault to find with it. I understand that to have abbreviated sessions in this body on Friday and Monday for the purpose of dragging out the issues does not serve the parties to this debate nor the image of the U.S. Senate. I think the indication of the majority leader that if he fails with respect to the motion to proceed and cloture in connection therewith he would not file another cloture motion on the bill itself until Tuesday, which accommodates the concerns of the Senator from Ohio.

It is my feeling that part of the purpose of this discussion which has been taking place on the floor of the Senate is to highlight the issues so that people understand the antitrust issues which have not been resolved; to make it clear that there is an offer out there of $200 million in excess of the present offer; that there is another offer that has some question about it which is $400 million higher.

I think those issues have been discussed adequately and there is no secret as to the concerns those of us who are opposed to this matter are feeling.

Having said that, I am not going to take a position contrary to the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to see my colleagues vote for cloture and then, as I understand it, have an oral vote with respect to the motion to proceed.

I shall go along with that, but I want to make it eminently clear that my going along with it does not indicate in any way that I have slackened my opposition, that I have any less opposition to the pending legislation. But I think that all of my rights will be preserved, that there will be adequate time to get into those, to offer amendments in connection with the pending legislation. Therefore, I urge those who have a position on this matter, whether for or against, to go along with the cloture motion, which I shall vote for. Then I have no objection if the leader wishes to vote without a rollcall on the motion to proceed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate that I appreciate the remarks of both Senators. I hope that if cloture is invoked, the motion to proceed would be approved on a voice vote. I know a number of Senators have asked whether there will be additional votes. I am prepared to indicate at this time that unless there is a request for a rollcall on the motion to proceed, there will be no further rollcall votes today.

It is my hope that the managers of the bill might continue to discuss the bill today. I understand there will be a substitute offered, but there will be no cloture motion filed on the bill itself until next Tuesday, as the Senator from Pennsylvania pointed out. If there are discussions that can occur today, that will be fine. There will be no session tomorrow. We will be in on Monday. There may be some controversial amendments that can be taken up at that time.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1:30 having arrived, the clerk will read the motion to invoke cloture.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the Dole motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 638.

Bob Dole, Jack Danforth, Mack Mattingly, John H. Chafee, Ted Stevens, Don Nickles, Strom Thurmond, Al Simpson, Jake Garn, Bob Packwood, Phil Gramm, Warren B. Rudman, Malcolm Wallop, Pete V. Domenici, Pete Wilson, Dan Quayle, and Dave Durenberger.

VOTE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the motion to proceed to consideration of S. 638, a bill to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes, shall be brought to a close? The yeas and nays are mandatory under the rule. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] are necessarily absent.

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 90, nays 7—as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 1 Leg.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 90, the nays are 7. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn having voted in the affirmative, the motion is agreed to.

The question is on the motion to proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 638) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

(The parts of the bill intended to be stricken are shown in boldface brackets, and the parts of the bill intended to be inserted are shown in italic.)

S. 638

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.) provided for an orderly return of Conrail freight service to the private sector;

(2) the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 were successful in removing Conrail's obligations beyond railroad freight service and in otherwise preparing Conrail for an orderly return to the private sector;

(3) acting under section 403 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 763), the Board of Directors of the United States Railway Association twice found Conrail to be a profitable corporation;

(4) acting under section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761), the Secretary [of Transportation] engaged an investment banker and arranged, through open competitive bidding and negotiation, to sell the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail;

(5) the Secretary's Plan for the sale of Conrail provides for sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation;

(6) the Secretary [of Transportation] found that sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation [(A)] best meets the sale criteria of (A) leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, (B) preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves, and (C) maximizing return to the Federal Government consistent with the criteria specified in clauses (A) and (B);

(7) amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 701 et seq.) and related laws are needed to permit the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation and to permit cancellation of the interest of the United States in Conrail debt and preferred stock; and

(8) the Secretary's Plan satisfies the requirements of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, including the intent, goals, and objectives relating to the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the requirements of section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(e)).

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. It is therefore declared to be the purpose of the Congress in this Act to return Conrail to the private sector by directing and facilitating implementation of the Secretary's Plan for the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. (a) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term—

(1) "Conrail" means the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(2) "Definitive Agreements" means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph (4)(A);

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Transportation; and

(4) "Secretary's Plan" means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, [in accordance with] and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E.

(b) Section 102 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 702) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6) through (18) as paragraphs (7) through (19), and paragraphs (19) through (21) as paragraphs (21) through (23), respectively;

(2) by inserting after [paragraphs] paragraph (5) the following paragraph:

"(6) 'Definitive Agreements' means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph [(20)(A);"] (20)(A);"; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (19), as so redesignated, the following paragraph:

"(20) 'Secretary's Plan' means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, [in accordance with] and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E;".

(c) Section 1135(a) of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1104(a)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) as paragraphs (7), (8), and (10), respectively;

(2) by inserting after paragraph (5) the following paragraph:

"(6) 'Definitive Agreements' means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph [(9)(A);"] (9)(A);"; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (8), as so redesignated, the following paragraph:

"(9) 'Secretary's Plan' means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, [in accordance with] and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E;".

TITLE I—AMENDMENTS TO THE REGIONAL RAIL REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1973 AND THE NORTHEAST RAIL SERVICE ACT OF 1981

Subtitle A—Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 Amendments

LIMIT ON AUTHORITY TO PURCHASE STOCK

SEC. 101. Section 216(b) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(b)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"(5) The authority of the Association to purchase debentures or series A preferred stock of the Corporation under this section shall terminate upon the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation under the terms of the Secretary's Plan.".

RESPONSIBILITY OF CONRAIL DIRECTORS

SEC. 102. Section 301(i) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 741(i)) is amended by inserting immediately after "required by law" the following: ", taken to implement the Secretary's Plan,".

APPLICABILITY OF REGIONAL RAIL REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1973 TO CONRAIL AFTER SALE

SEC. 103. Section 301 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 741) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(k) GOVERNING PROVISIONS AFTER SALE.—The provisions of this Act shall not apply to the Corporation and to activities and other actions and responsibilities of the Corporation and its directors after consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation under the terms of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985, other than with regard to—

"(1) section 102 of this Act;

"(2) section 201(d) of this Act;

"(3) section 203 of this Act, but only with respect to information relating to proceedings before the special court established under section 209(b);

"(4) section 216(f)(8) of this Act, but only as such authority applies to activities related to the employee stock ownership plan and related trusts prior to or in connection with consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation, including activities related to the sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition of the assets of the employee stock ownership plan and related trusts, or of Conrail Equity Corporation, in connection with the Secretary's Plan;

"(5) sections 216(f)(11) and 216(f)(12) of this Act, as amended by the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985;

"(6) section 217(e) of this Act;

"(7) subsection (i) of this section, but only as such authority applies to service as a director of the Corporation prior to consummation or in connection with implementation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation;

"(8) section 305 of this Act, but only as to the effect, and continuing administration, of supplemental transactions consummated prior to consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation;

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

SEC. 104. (a) Section 401(a)(3) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)(3)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Secretary is authorized and directed to implement the Secretary's Plan, in accordance with paragraph (4) of this subsection. Such implementation of the Secretary's Plan and the coordinated operation of the Corporation's properties with those of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliates as a single rail system is deemed approved by the Commission under chapter 113 of title 49, United States Code.".

(b) Section 401(a) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(4) The Secretary shall implement the Secretary's Plan by negotiating, executing, delivering, and performing the Definitive Agreements, which [shall, in the Secretary's judgment,] shall conform [substantially] to the Memorandum of Intent described in section [102(2)(A)] 102(20)(A) of this Act. The Secretary shall, 45 calendar days before the date on which the Secretary anticipates that the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation will be sold to Norfolk Southern Corporation, transmit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a notification of any alteration from Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act which will be made in the Definitive Agreements. After the date of such sale, the Secretary shall transmit to such Committees notification of any intent to waive compliance with any substantive covenant, agreement or obligation contained in the Definitive Agreements, and the Secretary may not waive such compliance until a period of 45 calendar days has expired after the date of such transmittal.

"(5) The Secretary shall not transfer the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation except concurrently with a divestiture by Norfolk Southern Corporation of rail assets and rights approved by the Attorney General.

[(5)] "(6) The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation shall be deemed to be consummated at the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.".

RAILROAD PURCHASERS AND OFFER FOR SALE OF SHARES TO EMPLOYEES

SEC. 105. Subsections (d) and (e) of section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(d) and (e)) are repealed.

CANCELLATION OF DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

SEC. 106. Section 402 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 762) is amended to read as follows:

"DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

"SEC. 402. (a) RECAPITALIZATION.—In connection with the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation under section 401 of this Act, and consistent with the Secretary's Plan, the Secretary may take all action necessary to cause the Corporation to be recapitalized such that the interest of the United States, or any agent or instrumentality thereof, and all other commitments or obligations of the Corporation to the United States or any agent or instrumentality thereof arising out of such interest, in any debt (including accrued interest and contingent interest thereon) and preferred stock (including accrued and unpaid dividends thereon) of the Corporation shall be cancelled or retired, and contributed to the capital of the Corporation. The Secretary shall cause the recapitalization authorized by this section to be effective as of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation.

"(b) BREACH OF REPRESENTATIONS.—(1) Norfolk Southern Corporation or any successor corporation thereto may bring suit for any breach of representations contained in paragraph 6(e) of the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act (hereinafter referred to as the 'Representations') in the United States Claims Court or a district court of the United States. If such an action is brought, the Claims Court or district court shall determine the amount by which the United States income tax (including interest and penalties whether or not such penalties are assessed as a tax under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) assessable against the Corporation or against Norfolk Southern Corporation for any year exceeds the amount of such tax which would have been assessable for such year had such Representations not been breached (hereinafter referred to as the [''Offset Amount'').] 'Offset Amount').

"(2) The Representations shall be considered breached and Norfolk Southern Corporation shall be entitled to bring suit upon the first occurrence of any of the following that is inconsistent with the Representations: (A) the issuance by the Internal Revenue Service of a statutory notice of deficiency (90-day letter), (B) the assessment of the United States income tax, or (C) any claim by the United States in a suit or other judicial proceeding against Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation.

"(3) The right to bring suit pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any waiting period applicable to tax proceedings or to any requirements for payment of any tax as a condition to instituting any suit based on a breach of the Representations.

"(4) Any judgment for money damages relating to breach of the Representations shall only be awarded as an offset in any court or administrative proceeding against the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both, to which such breach relates; except that if any such tax liability resulting from such breach has been paid, the judgment shall to that extent be an offset against any United States income tax liability of the Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both. If any portion of the tax resulting from a breach of the Representations has been paid, then the Offset Amount shall include interest on such payment from the date paid at the rate from time to time specified in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for interest payable on refund claims.

"(5) It shall not be a defense to an action brought under this section that Norfolk Southern Corporation knew, or should have known, of the falsity of the Representations or that there exists no carryover basis procedure as contemplated by the last sentence of the Representations.

"(6) For purposes of this section, tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation shall include the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliated group, within the meaning of section 1504 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.".

APPLICABILITY OF CERTAIN LAWS TO SALE OF CONRAIL

SEC. 107. Section 408 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 768) is amended—

(b)(1) Title VII of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following section:

"PROTECTION AFTER SALE

"SEC. 715. After consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation pursuant to the Secretary's Plan, any employee of Norfolk Southern Corporation, the Corporation, any rail affiliate of either company, and any transferee of the rail tracks, rights, and facilities divested in accordance with the Secretary's Plan, who is adversely affected in his employment by the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall receive from his employer protection under the labor protective conditions set forth in New York Dock Railway—Control—Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal (354 ICC 399 (1978), modified upon further consideration, 360 ICC 60 (1979)). The arbitration provisions of section 4 of New York Dock shall apply to the formation of any implementing agreements that may be necessary in connection with the implementation of the Secretary's Plan, including any resulting coordinations.".

(2) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 714 the following item:

"Sec. 715. Protection after sale.".

PREFERENTIAL HIRING

SEC. 109. Section 703 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797b) is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c); and

(2) by inserting immediately after subsection (a) the following subsection:

"(b) IMPLEMENTATION OF SECRETARY'S PLAN.—Any employee of any railroad who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for a vacancy for which he is qualified on any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, except where such vacancy is covered by (1) an affirmative action plan, or a hiring plan designated to eliminate discrimination, that is required by Federal or State statute, regulation, or Executive order, or by the order of a Federal court or agency, or (2) a permissible voluntary affirmative action plan. For purposes of this subsection, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

CROSS CRAFT EMPLOYMENT

SEC. 110. (a) Title VII of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797 et seq.) is amended by inserting immediately after section 703 the following section:

"CROSS CRAFT EMPLOYMENT

SEC. 703A. Any employee of Norfolk and Western Railway Company, Southern Railway Company, or the Corporation who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for any vacancy for which such employee is qualified at the entry level of any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, without regard to craft or class or the provisions of section 703 of this Act. Such employee shall retain his seniority rights to return to his original craft or class whenever a vacancy occurs. For purposes of this section, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

(b) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 703 the following item:

"Sec. 703A. Cross craft employment.".

Subtitle B—Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 Amendments

SPECIAL COURT JURISDICTION

SEC. 121. (a) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended—

(1) by inserting "or the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985" immediately after "subtitle" wherever it appears;

(2) in subsection (a), by striking "or" at the end of paragraph (3), by striking the period at the end of paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(5) brought by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(6) brought by Norfolk Southern Corporation seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(7) brought by a party who filed a complaint with the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section, and who is aggrieved by (A) a determination of the Secretary under paragraph (1) of such subsection that the party has not suffered direct economic injury, or (B) a decision of the Secretary under paragraph (2) of such subsection that a covenant has not been violated;

[''(7)] "(8) brought by a party which is a signatory to an ancillary agreement entered into in accordance with the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements and which is seeking to enforce such ancillary agreement; or

[''(8)] "(9) brought to determine the value of the interest of the employee stock ownership plan and related trusts, or of the beneficiaries thereof, in the preferred stock of the Conrail Equity Corporation.

For purposes of any action brought under paragraph (5) of this subsection, a violation of any covenant contained in the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements shall be deemed to constitute immediate and irreparable harm for purposes of awarding injunctive relief to the United States.".

(b) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(e)(1) Any party who suffers direct economic injury as a result of an alleged violation of a covenant contained in the Definitive Agreements may file a complaint with the Secretary seeking enforcement of such covenant. If the Secretary determines that the complainant has demonstrated to the Secretary that it has suffered direct economic injury, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint.

"(2) If the Secretary decides to investigate a complaint under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall give reasonable notice of such decision to investigate to the alleged violator of such covenant and the complainant, and shall make a final decision on such complaint within 60 days after the date on which it was filed.

"(3) If the Secretary finds that (A) the covenant in question has been violated, and (B) the complainant suffered direct economic injury as a result of such violation, the Secretary shall enter an order directing the violator of such covenant to comply with such covenant.

"(4) On appeal, any decision by the Secretary under this subsection shall be upheld, unless such decision is found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.".

APPLICABILITY OF OTHER LAWS

SEC. 122. Section 1168(a) of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1116(a)) is amended by striking "service transfers" and inserting in lieu thereof "sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail or transfer of the rail properties and freight service responsibilities of Conrail".

Subtitle C—Employee Stock Ownership Plan

RESPONSIBILITY OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN FIDUCIARIES

SEC. 131. (a) Section 216(f)(8)(A) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)(8)(A)) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" at the end of clause (ii);

(2) by striking the period at the end of clause (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following clause:

"(iv) for or in connection with any action taken to implement the Secretary's Plan, including any sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition of the plan and related trust assets, or the assets of Conrail Equity Corporation, in connection with implementation of the Secretary's Plan and any determination of the terms on which any such sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition is effected.".

QUALIFICATION, REVIEW, AND VALUATION OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLANS

SEC. 132. Section 2illegible of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(11)[(A)] The employee stock [illegible]nership plans of the Corporation and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall be deemed to meet the qualification requirements of sections 401 and 501, respectively, of the Internal Revenue Code of [1954] 1954, notwithstanding [(i)] (A) that such plans may not meet the requirements of section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, or [(ii)] (B) that participants in such plans may be entitled to withdraw a portion of the shares allocated to their accounts prior to the expiration of the period generally imposed by the Internal Revenue Service for qualified plans. Such qualification shall relate only to the contributions, allocations, and withdrawals of shares provided for in the Secretary's Plan with respect to the plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan. Such contributions and allocations shall in no event be treated as having exceeded the maximum annual addition permitted under section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (but not for purposes of applying section 404(j) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) for purposes of calculating any limitation under section 415 with respect to contributions and allocations not described in the Secretary's Plan, including contributions and allocations to plans and related trusts of the Corporation and any affiliated corporation. The continued qualification of such plans with respect to all other contributions, allocations, and withdrawals shall be subject to all provisions of existing law, as amended from time to time. No inference shall be drawn from this paragraph as to whether an amount is a contribution deductible under section 404 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 rather than a non-deductible capital expenditure.

"(12) Except as provided in section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105), the issuance and sale or contribution of securities by Norfolk Southern Corporation to fulfill arrangements with the Corporation's employees in implementing the Secretary's Plan and the distribution of shares from the Corporation's employee stock ownership plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall not be subject to the registration and prospectus delivery requirements of the Securities Act of 1933, any approval requirement under subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, or the laws of any State with respect to the issuance and sale of securities.".

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

COMMON CARRIER STATUS OF CONRAIL AFTER SALE

SEC. 301. [conrail's] (a) Conrail's status as a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code, shall not be affected by virtue of sale of the interest of the United States in Conrail's common stock. Purchase of Conrail stock shall not alone be the basis of a determination that the acquiring entity has become a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code.

(b) The Definitive Agreements shall contain a binding commitment by Norfolk Southern Corporation to continue to operate Conrail in full compliance with the provisions of section 10731(e) of title 49, United States Code.

CONSUMMATION OF SALE

SEC. 302. The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail shall be deemed to be consummated on the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 303. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall affect—

(1) Conrail's obligation to carry out its transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements, in accordance with their terms; and

(2) the obligation of any transferee of divested assets to carry out transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements to which such assets are subject, in accordance with their terms.

(b) If a divestiture carried out pursuant to the Secretary's Plan precludes Conrail from providing a transportation service for which it has contracted without a right of termination that may be exercised in the event of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the divestiture will result in a change or modification in the movement of the traffic involved, the transferee of the divested rights and properties and Conrail shall provide the contracted-for service on terms and conditions which, to the maximum extent possible, conform to the terms and conditions in the contract.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT OF COMPLIANCE

SEC. 304. The Secretary shall, no later than January 31 of each year, submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a report setting forth each certificate which Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail provided to the Secretary, during the preceding year, certifying compliance with the covenants contained in the Definitive Agreements.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. [303.] 305. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. [304.] 306. (a) Except as provided in subsection [(b),] (b) of this section, the provisions of and amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Sections 108(a), 201 and 202 of this Act shall take effect on the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

AMENDMENT NO. 1437

(Purpose: To make an amendment in the nature of a substitute)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on behalf of the Commerce Committee, I withdraw the committee's amendments, and I send an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH] proposes an amendment numbered 1437.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.) provided for an orderly return of Conrail freight service to the private sector;

(2) the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 were successful in removing Conrail's obligations beyond railroad freight service and in otherwise preparing Conrail for an orderly return to the private sector;

(3) acting under section 403 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 763), the Board of Directors of the United States Railway Association twice found Conrail to be a profitable corporation;

(4) acting under section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761), the Secretary engaged an investment banker and arranged, through open competitive bidding and negotiation, to sell the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail;

(5) the Secretary's Plan for the sale of Conrail provides for sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation;

(6) the Secretary found that sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation best meets the sale criteria of (A) leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, (B) preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves, and (C) maximizing return to the Federal Government consistent with the criteria specified in clauses (A) and (B);

(7) amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 701 et seq.) and related laws are needed to permit the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation and to permit cancellation of the interest of the United States in Conrail debt and preferred stock; and

(8) the Secretary's Plan satisfies the requirements of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, including the intent, goals, and objectives relating to the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the requirements of section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(e)).

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. It is therefore declared to be the purpose of the Congress in this Act to return Conrail to the private sector by directing and facilitating implementation of the Secretary's Plan for the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. (a) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term—

(1) "Conrail" means the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(2) "Definitive Agreements" means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph (4)(A);

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Transportation; and

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

SEC. 104. (a) Section 401(a)(3) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)(3)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Secretary is authorized and directed to implement the Secretary's Plan, in accordance with paragraph (4) of this subsection. Such implementation of the Secretary's Plan and the coordinated operation of the Corporation's properties with those of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliates as a single rail system is deemed approved by the Commission under chapter 113 of title 49, United States Code.".

(b) Section 401(a) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(4) The Secretary shall implement the Secretary's Plan by negotiating, executing, delivering, and performing the Definitive Agreements, which shall conform to the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act. The Secretary shall, 45 calendar days before the date on which the Secretary anticipates that the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation will be sold to Norfolk Southern Corporation, transmit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a notification of any alteration from the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act which will be made in the Definitive Agreements. After the date of such sale, the Secretary shall transmit to such Committees notification of any intent to waive compliance with any substantive covenant, agreement or obligation contained in the Definitive Agreements, and the Secretary may not waive such compliance until a period of 45 calendar days has expired after the date of such transmittal.

"(5) The Secretary shall not transfer the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation except concurrently with a divestiture by Norfolk Southern Corporation of rail assets and rights approved by the Attorney General.

"(6) The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation shall be deemed to be consummated at the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.".

RAILROAD PURCHASERS AND OFFER FOR SALE OF SHARES TO EMPLOYEES

SEC. 105. Subsections (d) and (e) of section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(d) and (e)) are repealed.

CANCELLATION OF DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

SEC. 106. Section 402 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 762) is amended to read as follows:

"DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

"SEC. 402. (a) RECAPITALIZATION.—In connection with the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation under section 401 of this Act, and consistent with the Secretary's Plan, the Secretary may take all action necessary to cause the Corporation to be recapitalized such that the interest of the United States, or any agent or instrumentality thereof, and all other commitments or obligations of the Corporation to the United States or any agent or instrumentality thereof arising out of such interest, in any debt (including accrued interest and contingent interest thereon) and preferred stock (including accrued and unpaid dividends thereon) of the Corporation shall be cancelled or retired, and contributed to the capital of the Corporation. The Secretary shall cause the recapitalization authorized by this section to be effective as of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation.

"(b) BREACH OF REPRESENTATIONS.—(1) Norfolk Southern Corporation or any successor corporation thereto may bring suit for any breach of representations contained in paragraph 6(e) of the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act (hereinafter referred to as the 'Representations') in the United States Claims Court or a district court of the United States. If such an action is brought, the Claims Court or district court shall determine the amount by which the United States income tax (including interest and penalties whether or not such penalties are assessed as a tax under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) assessable against the Corporation or against Norfolk Southern Corporation for any year exceeds the amount of such tax which would have been assessable for such year had such Representations not been breached (hereinafter referred to as the 'Offset Amount').

"(2) The Representations shall be considered breached and Norfolk Southern Corporation shall be entitled to bring suit upon the first occurrence of any of the following that is inconsistent with the Representations: (A) the issuance by the Internal Revenue Service of a statutory notice of deficiency (90-day letter), (B) the assessment of the United States income tax, or (C) any claim by the United States in a suit or other judicial proceeding against Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation.

"(3) The right to bring suit pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any waiting period applicable to tax proceedings or to any requirements for payment of any tax as a condition to instituting any suit based on a breach of the Representations.

"(4) Any judgment for money damages relating to breach of the Representations shall only be awarded as an offset in any court or administrative proceeding against the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both, to which such breach relates; except that if any such tax liability resulting from such breach has been paid, the judgment shall to that extent be an offset against any United States income tax liability of the Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both. If any portion of the tax resulting from a breach of the Representations has been paid, then the Offset Amount shall include interest on such payment from the date paid at the rate from time to time specified in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for interest payable on refund claims.

"(5) It shall not be a defense to an action brought under this section that Norfolk Southern Corporation knew, or should have known, of the falsity of the Representations or that there exists no carryover basis procedure as contemplated by the last sentence of the Representations.

"(6) For purposes of this section, tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation shall include the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliated group, within the meaning of section 1504 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.".

"PROTECTION AFTER SALE

"SEC. 715. After consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation pursuant to the Secretary's Plan, any employee of Norfolk Southern Corporation, the Corporation, any rail affiliate of either company, and any transferee of the rail tracks, rights, and facilities divested in accordance with the Secretary's Plan, who is adversely affected in his employment by the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall receive from his employer protection under the labor protective conditions set forth in New York Dock Railway—Control—Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal (354 ICC 399 (1978), modified upon further consideration, 360 ICC 60 (1979)). The arbitration provisions of section 4 of New York Dock shall apply to the formation of any implementing agreements that may be necessary in connection with the implementation of the Secretary's Plan, including any resulting coordinations.".

(2) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 714 the following item:

"Sec. 715. Protection after sale.".

PREFERENTIAL HIRING

SEC. 109. Section 703 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797b) is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c); and

(2) by inserting immediately after subsection (a) the following subsection:

"(b) IMPLEMENTATION OF SECRETARY'S PLAN.—Any employee of any railroad who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for a vacancy for which he is qualified on any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, except where such vacancy is covered by (1) an affirmative action plan, or a hiring plan designated to eliminate discrimination, that is required by Federal or State statute, regulation, or Executive order, or by the order of a Federal court or agency, or (2) a permissible voluntary affirmative action plan. For purposes of this subsection, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

CROSS CRAFT EMPLOYMENT

SEC. 110. (a) Title VII of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797 et seq.) is amended by inserting immediately after section 703 the following section:

"CROSS CRAFT EMPLOYMENT

"SEC. 703A. Any employee of Norfolk and Western Railway Company, Southern Railway Company, or the Corporation who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for any vacancy for which such employee is qualified at the entry level of any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, without regard to craft or class or the provisions of section 703 of this Act. Such employee shall retain his seniority rights to return to his original craft or class whenever a vacancy occurs. For purposes of this section, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

(b) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 703 the following item:

"Sec. 703A. Cross craft employment.".

Subtitle B—Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 Amendments

SPECIAL COURT JURISDICTION

SEC. 121. (a) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended—

(1) by inserting "or the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985" immediately after "subtitle" wherever it appears;

(2) in subsection (a), by striking "or" at the end of paragraph (3), by striking the period at the end of paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(5) brought by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(6) brought by Norfolk Southern Corporation seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(7) brought by a party who filed a complaint with the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section, and who is aggrieved by (A) a determination of the Secretary under paragraph (1) of such subsection that the party has not suffered direct economic injury, or (B) a decision of the Secretary under paragraph (2) of such subsection that a covenant has not been violated;

"(8) brought by a party which is a signatory to an ancillary agreement entered into in accordance with the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements and which is seeking to enforce such ancillary agreement; or

"(9) brought to determine the value of the interest of the employee stock ownership plan and related trusts, or of the beneficiaries thereof, in the preferred stock of the Conrail Equity Corporation.

For purposes of any action brought under paragraph (5) of this subsection, a violation of any covenant contained in the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements shall be deemed to constitute immediate and irreparable harm for purposes of awarding injunctive relief to the United States.".

(b) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(e)(1) Any party who suffers direct economic injury as a result of an alleged violation of a covenant contained in the Definitive Agreements may file a complaint with the Secretary seeking enforcement of such covenant. If the Secretary determines that the complainant has demonstrated to the Secretary that it has suffered direct economic injury, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint.

"(2) If the Secretary decides to investigate a complaint under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall give reasonable notice of such decision to investigate to the alleged violator of such covenant and the complainant, and shall make a final decision on such complaint within 60 days after the date on which it was filed.

"(3) If the Secretary finds that (A) the covenant in question has been violated, and (B) the complainant suffered direct economic injury as a result of such violation, the Secretary shall enter an order directing the violator of such covenant to comply with such covenant.

"(4) On appeal, any decision by the Secretary under this subsection shall be upheld, unless such decision is found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.".

APPLICABILITY OF OTHER LAWS

SEC. 122. Section 1168(a) of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1116(a)) is amended by striking "service transfers" and inserting in lieu thereof "sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail or transfer of the rail properties and freight service responsibilities of Conrail".

Subtitle C—Employee Stock Ownership Plan

RESPONSIBILITY OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN FIDUCIARIES

SEC. 131. (a) Section 216(f)(8)(A) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)(8)(A)) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" at the end of clause (ii);

(2) by striking the period at the end of clause (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following clause:

"(iv) for or in connection with any action taken to implement the Secretary's Plan, including any sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition of the plan and related trust assets, or the assets of Conrail Equity Corporation, in connection with implementation of the Secretary's Plan and any determination of the terms on which any such sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition is effected.".

QUALIFICATION, REVIEW, AND VALUATION OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLANS

SEC. 132. Section 216(f) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(11) The employee stock ownership plans of the Corporation and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall be deemed to meet the qualification requirements of sections 401 and 501, respectively, of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, notwithstanding (A) that such plans may not meet the requirements of section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, or (B) that participants in such plans may be entitled to withdraw a portion of the shares allocated to their accounts prior to the expiration of the period generally imposed by the Internal Revenue Service for qualified plans. Such qualification shall relate only to the contributions, allocations, and withdrawals of shares provided for in the Secretary's Plan with respect to the plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan. Such contributions and allocations shall in no event be treated as having exceeded the maximum annual addition permitted under section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (but not for purposes of applying section 404(j) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) for purposes of calculating any limitation under section 415 with respect to contributions and allocations not described in the Secretary's Plan, including contributions and allocations to plans and related trusts of the Corporation and any affiliated corporation. The continued qualification of such plans with respect to all other contributions, allocations, and withdrawals shall be subject to all provisions of existing law, as amended from time to time. No inference shall be drawn from this paragraph as to whether an amount is a contribution deductible under section 404 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 rather than a non-deductible capital expenditure.

"(12) Except as provided in section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105), the issuance and sale or contribution of securities by Norfolk Southern Corporation to fulfill arrangements with the Corporation's employees in implementing the Secretary's Plan and the distribution of shares from the Corporation's employee stock ownership plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall not be subject to the registration and prospectus delivery requirements of the Securities Act of 1933, any approval requirement under subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, or the laws of any State with respect to the issuance and sale of securities.".

(13) Section 332(d) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking ", the Consolidated Rail Corporation,".

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

COMMON CARRIER STATUS OF CONRAIL AFTER SALE

SEC. 301. (a) Conrail's status as a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code, shall not be affected by virtue of sale of the interest of the United States in Conrail's common stock. Purchase of Conrail stock shall not alone be the basis of a determination that the acquiring entity has become a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code.

(b) The Definitive Agreements shall contain a binding commitment by Norfolk Southern Corporation to continue to operate Conrail in full compliance with the provisions of section 10731(e) of title 49, United States Code.

CONSUMMATION OF SALE

SEC. 302. The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Con-rail shall be deemed to be consummated on the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 303. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall affect—

(1) Conrail's obligation to carry out its transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements, in accordance with their terms; and

(2) the obligation of any transferee of divested assets to carry out transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements to which such assets are subject, in accordance with their terms.

(b) If a divestiture carried out pursuant to the Secretary's Plan precludes Conrail from providing a transportation service for which it has contracted without a right of termination that may be exercised in the event of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the divestiture will result in a change or modification in the movement of the traffic involved, the transferee of the divested rights and properties and Conrail shall provide the contracted-for service on terms and conditions which, to the maximum extent possible, conform to the terms and conditions in the contract.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT OF COMPLIANCE

SEC. 304. The Secretary shall, no later than January 31 of each year, submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a report setting forth each certificate which Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail provided to the Secretary, during the preceding year, certifying compliance with the covenants contained in the Definitive Agreements.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 305. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 306. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the provisions of and amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Sections 108(a), 201 and 202 of this Act shall take effect on the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

(c) Any provision of this Act which, pursuant to Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, provides for raising revenue shall only be effective upon the enactment into law of a bill which has originated in the House of Representatives enacting such provision.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will suggest the absence of a quorum until we can have a member of the committee to take this seat. I hope it will be a very short quorum call.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCONNELL). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, there will be no session of the Senate on tomorrow. We will be in session on Monday.

I do not anticipate any additional rollcall votes today.

We will have some discussion of the bill today, because Senator DANFORTH has offered a substitute.

On Monday, I hope we can take up amendments to the bill which are not controversial, so that they may be accepted. The distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON] will be in a position to argue his motion to recommit.

But that vote, if a rollcall is requested, will occur on Tuesday. Then, as I have pledged to both Senator SPECTER, from Pennsylvania, and Senator METZENBAUM, from Ohio, we will not file cloture until Tuesday on the bill itself.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, some time ago I made an inquiry to the Treasury Department as to the effects on tax revenue to the Federal Government of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. Clearly, as has been recognized by everybody, there is a tax consequence. The fact of the matter is that the proposal that was made by Norfolk Southern to the Department of Transportation forgoes loss carry forward, net operating loss carry forwards and the carry forward of investment tax credit unused from prior years because Conrail has not been paying taxes. These carry forwards would otherwise be available. However, it was agreed by Norfolk Southern to forgo carry forwards of the net operating losses and of the investment tax credit.

However, there are some tax consequences to any business transaction. Why? Because anytime a corporation that generates tax losses files a consolidated tax return with a business that is making money and paying taxes, one offsets the other. So, in the future, there are tax consequences.

The Treasury Department, along with a lot of other people, including Morgan Stanley and the Joint Committee on Taxation and the Congressional Budget Office, have made analyses of what happens to tax revenues by virtue of the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern. The Treasury Department has written me. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter that I have received from J. Roger Mentz, Acting Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, DC.

Hon. JOHN C. DANFORTH,
Chairman, Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request for an analysis of the Federal income tax revenue effects of the proposed sale of Consolidated Rail Corporation (Conrail) to the Norfolk Southern Corporation (Norfolk Southern). Our analysis is based on the proposed sale transaction as reflected in S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments of 1985, and in the Memorandum of Intent signed on February 8, 1985, by Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation. Pursuant to your further request, we also have analyzed the tax revenue effects of an alternative proposal for a sale of Conrail to a syndicate of investors organized and headed by Morgan Stanley & Co., Incorporated (Morgan Stanley). We have relied for the details of a sale of Conrail to the Morgan Stanley syndicate upon Morgan Stanley's written description of the proposal dated May 14, 1985, as subsequently amended.

OVERVIEW

Subject to the uncertainties and qualifications noted below, we estimate that a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern, in comparison with a continuation of the Federal government's ownership of Conrail, would result in a present value revenue loss of $125 million for the 1986-1990 budget period. Without adjustment for the time value of money, the nominal loss in Federal tax revenues over this period is $174 million. Alternatively, we estimate that a sale of Conrail to the Morgan Stanley syndicate, again in comparison to continuation of Conrail's current ownership, would result in a present value increase in revenue of $18 million over the same 1986-1990 period. This positive revenue effect represents a nominal revenue gain of $24 million.

As discussed in further detail below, the difference in estimated revenue effects of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern and a sale to the Morgan Stanley syndicate is attributable primarily to differences in the rate at which losses and credits generated by Conrail after the sale would be utilized under the alternative sale proposals.[1] Thus, our estimates reflect period and present value differences in the revenue effects of the alternative proposals, even though their revenue effects on a long-run, undiscounted basis would be very similar.

In addition, we must emphasize that the difference in estimated revenue effects of the alternative proposals in highly sensitive to a number of legal and factual issues as to which there is substantial uncertainty. We have, for purposes of our estimates, attempted to resolve these issues on a basis that reasonably reflects the comparative revenue effects of the sale proposals. Alternative assumptions concerning a number of these issues would have been defensible, however, and could have significantly altered the absolute and relative revenue effects of the proposals. We also must emphasize that our revenue estimates do not represent an analysis of the relative merits of selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate. In particular, we have made no attempt to evaluate non-tax budgetary effects of either sale proposal, or to weigh the effects of either proposal on the future health of Conrail.

[1] Both the Norfolk Southern and Morgan Stanley proposals contemplate that existing Conrail loss and credit carryovers would be extinguished in the sale transaction.

EFFECT OF TAX REFORM

The difference in estimated revenue effects between a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern and a sale to the Morgan Stanley syndicate is attributable primarily to the fact that a Conrail owned by Norfolk Southern would be included in Norfolk Southern's consolidated group of corporations and would thus be able currently to pass through all or some portion of the benefit of net operating losses and unused tax credits to Norfolk Southern. It is important to recognize that the extent to which Conrail generates future net operating losses and tax credits that could be passed through to Norfolk Southern is heavily dependent on the cost recovery rules that apply to future Conrail investment. As a matter of convention, our estimates assume that current law cost recovery rules will remain in effect.

The House of Representatives, however, recently passed H.R. 3838, the Tax Reform Act of 1985, and the Senate is expected to consider tax reform legislation early this year. H.R. 3838, like a number of tax reform proposals, including "The President's Tax Proposals to the Congress for Fairness, Growth and Simplicity," would repeal the investment tax credit and extend the period over which the cost of depreciable investment is recovered for tax purposes. Enactment of these or similar proposals altering current tax incentives for depreciable investment would substantially reduce or perhaps eliminate the excess tax benefits generated by Conrail over the period of the revenue estimate. This would reduce correspondingly the benefit to Norfolk Southern of tax consolidation between it and Conrail, and thus the absolute and relative revenue costs of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. In addition, H.R. 3838 would impose new limitations on the use of certain losses following corporate acquisitions. This too would affect the tax treatment of Conrail and could change substantially the revenue effects of the alternative proposals.

CONRAIL OPERATING PROJECTIONS

Net Income. Our estimates assume that Conrail's net book income for the period 1986-1989 will be as projected in the June 7, 1985 report of Conrail management, with income for 1990 increased by four percent over 1989. These projections update and significantly alter prior Conrail projections that formed the basis for the April 1985 United States Railway Association analysis of Conrail's future operations.

In order to provide a consistent basis for comparison, we have not adjusted the Conrail projections to reflect possible differences in operating results depending upon whether Conrail is sold to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate, or is instead retained by the Federal government. In addition, we have not conformed the macroeconomic assumptions underlying the Conrail projections to the Administration's economic forecasts.

Capital Investment. We also have followed Conrail management's June 7, 1985 report in estimating Conrail's levels of capital investment for 1986-1989, with investment for 1990 again increased by four percent over the 1989 level. Moreover, we have assumed the same levels of capital investment regardless of whether Conrail is sold to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate. This assumption is consistent with our assumptions about Conrail income, and is useful in comparing the revenue effects of the alternative means of returning Conrail to the private sector. At the same time, the assumption of equivalent levels of capital investment disregards the effect on such investment of Conrail's ability to use currently the associated tax deductions and credits. As discussed below, a Conrail owned by the Morgan Stanley syndicate may have a relatively limited ability to transfer the benefit of excess deductions and credits. Although this translates to a present value revenue saving to the Federal government, it also produces a higher after-tax cost of additional capital investment for a Conrail owned by the Morgan Stanley syndicate than a Norfolk Southern-owned Conrail.

UTILIZATION OF CONRAIL TAX BENEFITS

Present Value of Revenue Effects. Based on our assumptions concerning its future earnings and capital investment, Conrail will over the next several years generate deductions and credits well in excess of its ability to use them currently. In general, the varying tax revenue effects of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate turn on Conrail's relative capacity to utilize these excess deductions and tax credits or alternatively to transfer them to other taxpayers. For the most part, this resolves to a question of the rate at which Conrail's excess deductions and credits would be utilized, since it is likely that all of Conrail's losses and credits would eventually be utilized regardless of whether it is owned by Norfolk Southern or by the Morgan Stanley syndicate. Thus, the estimated revenue effects of the alternative sale proposals would be very similar on a long-run, undiscounted basis. There are, however, significant potential differences in the rate at which Conrail's excess deductions and credits would be utilized depending on whether it was owned by Norfolk Southern or the Morgan Stanley syndicate. Of course, the more rapidly Conrail's excess deductions and credits are used, the greater the revenue cost to the government in present value terms.

Consolidation vs. Leasing. Under current law, there are two principal strategies by which utilization of Conrail's deductions and credits could be accelerated. Conrail could consolidate its net operating losses and unused credits with the income of another taxpayer by acquiring or being acquired by a tax-paying corporation. In addition, Conrail could transfer a portion of its excess deductions and credits to other taxpayers by leasing rather than purchasing its new depreciable property.

If Conrail were sold to Norfolk Southern, Conrail would be included in the Norfolk Southern consolidated group, and thus its losses and credits would generally be available to offset income and tax liability of Norfolk Southern. For purposes of our estimates, we assumed that Norfolk Southern's taxable income would be as reflected in its most recent annual report, and would grow at an annual rate of four percent through 1990. We further assumed that Norfolk Southern's level of capital investment would be consistent with its recent historical experience, and would similarly grow at a four percent annual rate through the five-year budget period.[2] On this basis, Norfolk Southern would have sufficient taxable income during the budget period to absorb all projected Conrail losses on a current basis, but its use of Conrail investment tax credits would be limited in four of the five years by the 85 percent of tax liability ceiling imposed under current law.

A Conrail owned by the Morgan Stanley syndicate would not be able to pass through its losses and credits to its owners, and would thus be left to pursue leasing or the purchase of a tax-paying business as a means to accelerate utilization of its losses and excess credits. In this regard, Conrail at the present time engages in leasing transactions, and our estimates assume that it would continue to do so if it were sold to the Morgan Stanley syndicate or retained by the Federal government.[3] Much of the depreciable property acquired by Conrail is not eligible to be leased under current law, however, and thus a Conrail owned by the Morgan Stanley syndicate would have excess losses and credits even if it pursued an aggressive leasing strategy. Our estimates assume that such excess losses and credits would be carried over to future taxable years of Conrail, to be used as Conrail begins eventually to generate taxable income. This deferral of Conrail tax benefits to later years produces a relative savings in revenue from a sale of Conrail to the Morgan Stanley syndicate as compared to a sale to Norfolk Southern.[4]

Implicit in the revenue estimate for each sale proposal is the assumption that Conrail would not attempt to accelerate utilization of excess deductions and/or credits by acquiring a tax-paying business. Although a contrary assumption might be supportable, it would require wholesale speculation as to the terms of the acquisition and the characteristics of the business acquired. The "no-acquisition" assumption reduces the estimated revenue cost of each sale proposal; it has greater significance, however, with respect to the Morgan Stanley proposal because of the greater portion of Conrail tax benefits that would be unused currently. The assumption may thus overstate the rel-

[2] Our estimates assume that Norfolk Southern would have taxable income of $438 million in 1986 (before adjustment for certain interest costs incurred to purchase Conrail), which is based on Norfolk Southern's 1984 annual report and the assumption of 4 percent annual growth for 1984-1986. Our estimates further assume that Norfolk Southern's capital investment in 1986 would be $600 million, which is consistent with its average levels of investment (adjusted for inflation) over the recent past. Although an averaging approach would perhaps have been appropriate with regard to the assumed level of Norfolk Southern taxable income, the result would be unduly influenced by certain extraordinary tax deductions available to Norfolk Southern in recent years. In 1984, the base year for our income forecast, the effect of such deductions was relatively small and Norfolk Southern's book income was consistent with recent historical levels.

[3] In contrast, we have assumed that a Norfolk Southern-owned Conrail would not engage in leasing transactions, despite the fact that it would generate investment tax credits that could not be used by Conrail or Norfolk Southern during the budget period. This assumption reflects the much shorter period over which excess tax benefits would be deferred in the case of a Norfolk Southern-owned Conrail.

[4] Our estimates indicate that a sale of Conrail to the Morgan Stanley syndicate would actually increase revenues over the budget period. This positive revenue effect is attributable to the use of Conrail funds, under the Morgan Stanley proposal, to make certain payments to Conrail employees. The use of Conrail funds for this purpose effectively transfers income-earning assets from an entity not currently paying taxes to individual taxpayers, i.e., from Conrail to Conrail employees, with a corresponding positive effect on revenues. We did not consider the effects of such transfer on the financial health of Conrail.

ative revenue loss resulting from a sale to Norfolk Southern.

Built-In Deduction Limitations. As described above, the tax revenue costs of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern reflect that Conrail, as a member of Norfolk Southern's consolidated group, would be able to pass net operating losses and credits through to Norfolk Southern. Under current law, however, the benefits of such consolidation may be limited with respect to certain depreciation deductions and losses attributable to Conrail's existing assets. As explained in our letter to you of March 27, 1985, the consolidated return regulations limit the extent to which an acquired corporation's so-called "built-in deductions," including depreciation deductions attributable to basis in excess of the value of depreciable assets, can be utilized by the acquiring corporation. In general, the built-in deduction rules would limit Norfolk Southern's use of Conrail depreciation deductions to the extent the basis in Conrail's existing depreciable assets exceeded the value of those assets.[5]

Information provided to us by the Department of Transportation indicates that Conrail has a total basis in its assets (other than cash) of $4.3 billion, with $3.0 billion of this amount attributable to depreciable assets. Although there is no direct evidence as to the value of Conrail's depreciable assets, a reasonable approximation of their value could in theory be drawn from the proposed purchase price for Conrail's stock. This would require that the cash purchase price be increased to reflect the implicit cost of Conrail's liabilities (and, perhaps, as well of certain covenants to be provided by Norfolk Southern), and adjusted further to account for the value of Conrail's nondepeciable assets, such as cash, receivables, land and rights of way. We have not, for purposes of our estimates, attempted to resolve the uncertainties that would be involved in this process,[6] and have instead assumed that the value of Conrail's depreciable assets is sufficiently high so that the built-in deduction rules would not apply to limit Norfolk Southern's utilization of Conrail depreciation deductions. This assumption does not reflect a judgment about the likely outcome of any judicial or administrative determination on the question of value; rather, it is made in recognition of the uncertainties involved, and tends, in this regard, to produce an upper-bound estimate of the potential loss in tax revenue that would result from a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

Although we have assumed for purposes of our revenue estimates that the built-in deduction rule would not apply to limit Norfolk Southern's use of Conrail's losses, it has been suggested that any authorizing legislation provide expressly that losses attributable to Conrail's existing assets not be available to offset Norfolk Southern's income. Thus, any legislation authorizing the sale could provide that all post-acquisition deductions attributable to existing Conrail assets would be treated as built-in deductions. In effect, the value of Conail's depreciable assets would be deemed to be zero for purposes of the built-in deduction rules, so that the benefit of tax consolidation would be denied to Norfolk Southern to the extent Conrail incurs tax losses attributable to the depreciation of its existing assets. We estimate that inclusion of this provision in the authorizing legislation would reduce the present value revenue cost of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern from $125 million to $83 million, with a corresponding reduction in nominal revenue loss from $174 million to $111 million.

Long-Term Revenue Effects. Our estimates of the revenue effects of the alternative sale proposals reflect only the five-year budget period. We estimate, however, that significant tax benefits generated by Conrail during the budget period would be unused in that period regardless of whether Conrail is owned by Norfolk Southern or by the Morgan Stanley syndicate. Although such unused benefits could add significant long-term revenue costs to either sale proposal, we do not reflect them in our estimates because of the additional uncertainties involved in estimating revenue effects beyond the budget period. Any estimate based on projections and assumptions for such future periods would have very limited reliability or significance.

OTHER ISSUES

Payments to Labor. The proposals for a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate each contemplate certain payments to labor in respect of the employees' interests in Conrail's Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP) and to compensate the employees for past wage concessions. Although the tax consequences of the proposed payments could significantly affect the revenue implications of either sale proposal, such consequences have been disregarded in our estimates for a number of reasons. Most importantly, there are significant factual and legal uncertainties concerning the nature of the proposed payments and the attendant tax consequences. Although the payments would likely generate an ordinary business deduction to the extent treated as satisfying an existing Conrail obligation to compensate its employees, the entire amount could be nondeductible if treated as a cost of acquiring the stock of Conrail. Similarly, depending on the form in which they are made, the payments could create a current tax liability for Conrail employees or instead be taxable only on a deferred basis. The labor payments thus present a matrix of possible outcomes, ranging from deductibility of a significant portion of the payments with no current tax consequences to Conrail employees, to capitalization of the entire amount but full and current taxation to Conrail employees. Resolving which of this range of outcomes should be reflected in a revenue estimate would require not only resolution of significant legal uncertainties, but broad speculation as to the terms of the agreement between labor and any eventual purchaser of Conrail.

Although we have not quantified, for purposes of our estimates, the tax consequences of the labor payments, their likely net effect under either proposal would be to enhance revenues over the budget period. In the case of a Conrail owned by the Morgan Stanley syndicate, deductibility of the labor payments would only increase Conrail losses generated but unused during the budget period. Thus, to whatever extent the labor payments were currently taxable to Conrail employees, tax revenues over the budget period would be increased. A similar net revenue effect is likely in the case of a Norfolk Southern-owned Conrail, although in such case deductibility of any portion of the payments would produce a current tax benefit to Norfolk Southern. The extent of such benefit would depend on what portion, if any, of the labor payments was deductible, but would in any event be limited by a corresponding reduction in Norfolk Southern's ability to utilize investment tax credits during the budget period.[7]

Because of Norfolk Southern's ability to benefit currently from additional Conrail deductions, excluding the labor payments from our estimates may understate, to the extent of such benefit, the relative difference in the revenue effects of the alternative sale proposals. It is our understanding, however, that Norfolk Southern has tentatively agreed to provide additional compensation to labor to reflect any tax savings it receives by virtue of its payments to labor. To the extent such provision were incorporated in any ultimate agreement between Norfolk Southern and labor, Conrail employees rather than Norfolk Southern are the interested parties in the tax treatment of the labor payments. Since the Memorandum of Intent between Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation is silent as to the tax consequences of the labor payments, it is possible to regard them as an issue separable from the other tax consequences of the proposed transaction. In this respect, Congress could, consistently with the Memorandum of Intent, define specifically the tax consequences of the labor payments in any legislation authorizing a sale of Conrail.

Employment Effects. Various parties have asserted that a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern and a consolidation of their operations would have positive or adverse effects on employment within Conrail and Norfolk Southern and, more broadly, within the railroad industry as a whole. We have not attempted to resolve these conflicting assertions for purposes of our estimates, and thus have assumed that railroad employment would not be affected by a sale to Norfolk Southern. If a sale to Norfolk Southern were instead to cause a relative decline or increase in railroad employment, there would be corresponding tax effects, both with respect to income tax revenues and railroad retirement tax revenues.

[5] Under a de minimis exception, the built-in deduction limitations would not apply if the aggregate value of Conrail's assets (other than cash and certain marketable securities) equalled or exceeded 85 percent of Conrail's basis in those aggregate assets.

[6] Norfolk Southern has indicated to us in informal discussions that its estimates of the value of Conrail's depreciable assets, based on the purchase price for Conrail's stock, ranged from $1.5 billion to well over $3.0 billion depending on the weight assigned to certain liabilities and covenants. Norfolk Southern has further indicated that it believes a value toward the higher end of that range, which could leave it unaffected by the built-in deduction limitations, would be legally supportable. Although we have not examined the basis for Norfolk Southern's position in detail, we believe the weight that would be assigned to certain liabilities and covenants under its analysis is open to substantial question.

[7] Because of the 85 percent of tax liability ceiling on investment tax credit utilization, the creation of additional Conrail deductions that would pass through to Norfolk Southern would generate a corresponding reduction in Norfolk Southern's ability to use credits currently. Assuming that the labor payments were currently deductible to the extent not allocable to Conrail's ESOP (on a $48 per share basis), the effect would be to increase the revenue cost of a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern by approximately $11 million over the budget period on a present value basis. Although any such negative revenue effect would very likely be more than offset, in absolute terms, by the revenue gained from taxation of the labor payments to Conrail employees, it would nevertheless increase the revenue cost of a sale to Norfolk Southern relative to the Morgan Stanley proposal.

SUMMARY

The following estimates of the revenue effects resulting from a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern or to the Morgan Stanley syndicate, as compared to the base case of retaining Federal ownership, reflect the assumptions described above.

Fiscal years 1986-90

	Millions
Sale to Norfolk Southern:
1986	−$14
1987	−35
1988	−37
1989	−41
1990	−47
5-year sum:
Nominal	−174
Present value	−125
Sale to Morgan Stanley syndicate:
1986	4
1987	7
1988	3
1989	4
1990	6
5-year sum:
Nominal	24
Present value	18

I would be happy to discuss further with you the details underlying these estimates.

Sincerely,

J. ROGER MENTZ,
Acting Assistant Secretary
(Tax Policy).

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, what the letter shows is that the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would result in a present value revenue loss of $125 million for the 1986-90 budget period; that is, the discounted present value of the future revenue loss would be, for that 5-year period of time, $125 million.

By contrast, if Morgan Stanley were to acquire Conrail, there would be a revenue gain of $18 million. So the net effect over this 5-year period of time, present value net effect over the 5-year period of time, is $143 million.

Mr. President, I would say this: The loss to the Treasury by virtue of the consolidation of Norfolk Southern and Conrail is not unique to the Norfolk Southern transaction. In fact, the merger of Conrail with any taxpaying entity would have precisely the same consequences; that is to say, if Conrail were not to be sold at all or if it were to be sold to Morgan Stanley and then a few years down the road Conrail were to decide or somebody else were to decide to merge with Conrail, the result of that would be exactly the same.

If you have a losing entity and you have a taxpaying entity and they file a consolidated return, the losses of one are available on the other's tax returns.

So, Mr. President, those who object to this transaction on the basis that the acquiring corporation will have available tax losses of the other corporation are really objecting to the fact that Norfolk Southern is successful, that Norfolk Southern pays taxes, that Norfolk Southern is a healthy railroad. That is the point of objection.

Mr. President, I would gladly forgo $125 million of tax revenue over a 5-year period of time to unite Conrail with a winning, successful, strong taxpaying railroad. I believe that Norfolk Southern is one of the few railroads that pays taxes and I know that of all the railroads in the United States, Norfolk Southern pays the lion's share of taxes to the Federal Government. It is, perhaps, the strongest railroad in the United States today.

The issue that will be before the Senate as we proceed with this bill has to do with the future of rail transportation in the United States, not $125 million over a 5-year period of time, not even the difference in cost or the difference in purchase price.

I am sure that the Secretary of Transportation considered purchase price and considered direct economic consequences to the Treasury. But, Mr. President, in all of my conversations with the Secretary of Transportation, as we were proceeding to analyze various potential buyers for Conrail, I stated the position that the exact amount of the purchase price pales in significance to the long-term health of rail transportation in the Northeast corner of our country.

Again, I submit this letter for the RECORD in order to make it clear to Members of the Senate precisely what the consequences are. It would be the $125 million revenue loss projected by the Treasury is far less than what was said to be the revenue loss by Morgan Stanley. But what else could we expect from Morgan Stanley? I do not, in any way, want to cast aspersions on really a wonderful institution, and Morgan Stanley is. But it is an interested party and this is a disinterested projection by the Department of the Treasury.

Again, the question, though, is not how many dollars over a 5-year period of time might flow to the Treasury, but whether we can unite Conrail with a successful, going railroad enterprise or whether the future of Conrail is going to be continually up for grabs as a stand-alone railroad, out there under the Morgan Stanley proposal, all by itself, being bled of cash year after year, with its future constantly in doubt.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRIBUTE TO PAULA FRANCES HADLEY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, no words can truly express my feelings about Paula Hadley, a member of my staff and one of the best friends I ever had—a brave young woman who fought as courageously as anyone has ever fought against the illness that finally took her from us.

Paula was 40 years old when she died—an age which is only half a lifetime in today's world. Yet in that half a lifetime, Paula crowded more into her life than most people who live to be twice her age.

I understand that in her teenage years, she not only led the cheerleaders at Bourne High School, she even advised the athletic director on how to coach the teams.

In her spare time she was known to open a book occasionally, and she walked off with most of the academic honors at graduation—but not before she had arranged the senior prom and decorated the hall.

This same uncommon energy took Paula to the University of Massachusetts. She traveled back and forth in here famous tiny blue Volkswagen, and they seemed the perfect match for each other. The car got the most miles per gallon, and Paula got the most done per minute of any person I have ever met.

Paula always regarded summers and vacations as occasions to do bigger and different things. So she traveled—not to places you and I might know—but to the far corners of this planet, such as Afghanistan, Nepal, and the outback of Australia. She lived for one summer in a Kibbutz in Israel, and they tell me that the Kibbutz doubled that summer in productivity.

Her favorite place on Earth was the land of her ancestors from which her maternal grandparents emigrated. And it was in Italy that she learned to speak Italian like a native, after studying at the Universities of Bologna and Perugia.

One of Paula's favorite presents to her friends were the chocolates made in Perugia. The pollsters didn't know it, but my occasional rise in weight and drop in the polls had more to do with Paula's chocolates than with Presidential politics.

Her fluency in Italian was a great help to Paula when she taught in the Boston public schools. It also was a disciplinary tool. To hear Paula raise her voice in Italian was to believe she could calm the most unruly student.

There was hardly a trip around the city when Paula did not meet a student she had taught in high school. They didn't just remember her—they loved her. More than once I have seen people shake my hand half-heartedly, then watch their eyes light up when they came to Paula in the receiving line.

Paula first entered my life as a volunteer in my 1980 Presidential campaign, helping to organize the New England area.

Two years later, she became an indispensable part of my re-election campaign in Massachusetts, handling all the finances. The campaign workers knew how closely Paula guarded the treasury. Her word was law—no receipt, no reimbursement. I was concerned that she might be overdoing it when I heard that Paula was demanding a receipt even for tunnel toll fares, but she told me:

Senator, unless you want to run on "empty," you stick to the politics and I'll take care of the bookkeeping.

One of the best things to happen to any Kennedy came after that campaign when Paula agreed to come to Washington to manage my household in McLean. What a difference she made. For the first 6 months I thought I was living in a construction zone, because Paula decided that everything needed to be fixed, all at the same time. And, of course, everything got done twice—once by the contractor and then by Paula. I remember coming home from the Senate late one afternoon and walking through the house calling for Paula. I could hear her responding but I had no idea where her voice was coming from. Finally, I stepped outside and there was Paula on the roof—hammering down a losse shingle that the contractor had improperly installed. "I want to make sure that we got what you paid for," was her explanation.

Paula was also a genius at setting up dinners and receptions at my home for visiting dignitaries. One of her greatest frustrations was being in Brigham and Women's Hospital last year during President Reagan's visit to my home. But the phone beside her bed was busy Paula made sure that the staff preparing the event was properly instructed. It was a wonderful evening thanks to Paula, but it was only half complete. President Reagan came to dinner, and Paula wasn't there.

My sons Teddy and Patrick and my daughter Kara not only respected her ability and her loyalty but, more important, they loved her like a member of the family. I learned who really counted most at home on the day Paula warned me: "Don't you use the hot tub without your son's permission. He's got a special date." Paula had the key to the hot tub, and I believe that not even the Holy Father could have used it without a dispensation from Paula.

That's the Paula who was part of our lives—boundless energy, boundless confidence, boundless love. Teacher, counsellor, campaign worker, friend—Paula brought an energy and an intensity to everything she did that left some of us, at times, out of breath. She was always a young woman with great dreams—and so little time to make those dreams come true.

To her parents, Paul and Mary, her brothers Richard and Alan, and her sisters Linda and Barbara, all of us know the sorrow and the emptiness in their hearts. We shall never forget the joy she gave us. To Teddy, Kara, Patrick, and me, Paula was one of the happiest parts of our lives.

Just before Thanksgiving, I was in Rome and I called Paula to tell her that I couldn't find any pasta in all of Rome to equal the pasta she knew how to make. And I am sure that somewhere today, the word is being passed in heaven that Paula is there, and her pasta is the best.

We saw Paula last just before I left 2 weeks ago for Latin America. We went to her room together and sang Christmas carols. We kissed her and she told us to have a safe trip.

We talked about her often on the trip and in the past year. Patrick said she was always so busy asking about him that he seldom had the chance to ask about her—that it took him a year to learn that she had been in Nepal.

Teddy said the thing that was so unique about her was her quality of giving—which never stopped. She taught us all the meaning of love.

I had just returned from Latin America last Friday, safe as she wished, when Paula died. I was calling her, and her mother answered the phone—and I heard the news. I hope her family will not mind if I say she was a precious part of ours. She knew we loved her.

Now her shingles are all nailed down; her schedules are all finished, and her must-do files are all done. Thank you, Paula, not only for what you did—but for the kind of person you were. You were a light in our lives—and in our hearts, that light will never go out.

I will miss her very much.

DON'T DRIVE DRUNK

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, efforts at the local level to raise the national consciousness about the needless slaughter of our citizens resulting from drunk driving are beginning to pay off.

In 1983 the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving recommended reliance on long-term educational and prevention efforts to reduce drunk driving.

As an example that educational activity is taking place and having some impact, I'd like to share with the Senate a powerful poem, written by a young California student, Melissa McCarty. Melissa, whose poem was forwarded to me by her driver education teacher, William Brusin, is a ninth grader at Nevada Union High School in Grass Valley, CA.

I ask unanimous consent that Melissa's poem be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATISTICS

(Written by Melissa McCarty, 1985)

The streets stood scattered with traces of blood, as a tiny child lay in broken glass and mud.

The small, limp body was carried away, never to see the light of another day.

The car sat still, without a scratch, with only some blood stains, and the front window smashed.

A disheveled woman, her head held low, stood watching the scene, unable to go.

A policeman came up, and read her, her rights; he tested her breath, then he tested her sight.

This is the making of another statistic, the facts are depressing, the scene is realistic.

So here is the truth, you've heard, it's not junk. Don't drink if you drive, and PLEASE, Don't Drive Drunk!

JOSEPH KRAFT

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, it is difficult to make a public speech about the death of a personal friend, but friendship comprehends respect and admiration as well as affection. Few people have both earned and received respect and admiration in such full measure as Joseph Kraft. The evidence of the high regard in which he was held is contained in the many statements made at the time of his death.

I shall miss his great, inquiring mind, and his unfailing ability to see clearly through the fog that often covers political Washington. I also shall miss his wit and humor and the breadth of his interests. But most of all, I shall miss his friendship. We spent many hours over the last couple of decades talking about life and politics and human frailty. We did not agree on every issue, but he always brought depth, clarity, and a broader perspective to any subject we discussed. A wise man who cared about the world in which he lived, he cannot be replaced.

Mrs. Mathias joins me in expressing our sympathy to Polly Kraft and her family.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a moving and eloquent editorial about Joseph Kraft that appeared in the Washington Post on January 12, 1986, and his obituary that appeared on January 11.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 12, 1986]

JOSEPH KRAFT

The Romans had a word for it, gravitas—meaning gravity, seriousness, weight. You say it of a serious person. But you do not mean by this a person who is without humor—humor surely goes with seriousness. Rather you say it of a person who knows what really matters and who, consequently, really matters himself. You say it of a person like Joseph Kraft, our columnist of 20 years, who died at the age of 61 on Friday. Above all Joe Kraft had gravitas. He was in the rare, best sense a serious man.

Mr. Kraft had another attribute that, to be both polite and somewhat cryptic about it, perhaps not all his fellow journalists shared. He was amazingly generous to and about his colleagues, especially many of the younger ones whose work he greatly respected and encouraged and who, in turn, were deeply devoted to him. This generosity was not something that existed apart from his work, as a kind of cultivated virtue or side-line human experience. Rather it reflected precisely Joe Kraft's abiding commitment to journalism and his ferocious, even obsessive, pursuit of the excellent in his chosen line of work. He wanted to be better himself and he wanted others to be better too and he did everything in his power to bring about both results. It did not occur to him to be stingy or secretive or acquisitive or self-protective in relation to his colleagues. He gave them everything he could.

It has been said of Joe Kraft repeatedly in the past couple of days that he was a direct descendant of the great political columnists like Joseph Alsop and Walter Lippmann and James Reston who distinguished and dominated the middle years of 20th century American journalism. And in many respects this is true. Mr. Kraft's prodigious work, his mastery of the head-breaking issues of national and international life, his devotion to subject, his horror of the superficiality and exhibitionism of much modern journalism, his insistence on having something more than merely an opinion to offer his readers—all this made him part of a particular honorable tradition.

He didn't do a buck and wing. He worked like a dog and gave you his best analysis. He moved easily among the people who were making the large decisions and also among those in the ranks who often had more to tell than their bosses did. He had some big successes with individual columns; he sometimes made news in that space at the left-hand top of the op-ed page, and, like all good columnists, he was assiduously plagiarized by his pals. It was Mr. Kraft, you may have forgotten, who put the term "middle American" into the journalistic vocabulary, though not he who drove it into the ground.

Our reservation about the insistence on seeing Mr. Kraft in terms of earlier titans of the trade especially seeing him as the man who would or did replace Walter Lippmann, is this: it doesn't acknowledge what Mr. Kraft himself had become in his own right. You will notice we have dwelt on Mr. Kraft's syndicated newspaper column at the expense of his other writings—his books and magazine articles—and his academic enterprises, important as they were. That is because the column was at the core of what Joe Kraft did and because he did it like no other. The question is not: whom did Joseph Kraft replace as a columnist? The question is: who can replace him?

NEWSPAPER COLUMNIST JOSEPH KRAFT, 61, DIES

(By Martin Weil)

Joseph Kraft, a syndicated newspaper columnist whose work appeared in The Washington Post for 20 years and who was admired for his reportorial energy, his intellectual gifts and his broad spectrum of interests, died last night at the Washington Hospital Center. He was 61.

Regarded as a modern Renaissance man among columnists, Mr. Kraft was a seasoned traveler and tireless interviewer who was at home with economics and social issues as well as with foreign and domestic politics.

As a columnist for the Los Angeles Times and for the Los Angeles Times syndicate, Mr. Kraft was published, according to estimates of syndicate officials, in more than 200 newspapers, whose circulation numbered in the many millions.

Known for penetrating analysis rather than partisan attacks, Mr. Kraft was widely considered to be an heir and exemplar of the great tradition of such eminent predecessors as Walter Lippmann.

Mr. Kraft, who lived in Georgetown was admitted to the hospital center shortly after Christmas. He died at 7:10 p.m. yesterday. Hospital officials said the cause of death was not immediately known, but one of his assistants said he died of heart failure.

He had a long history of heart problems and friends said he had suffered three heart attacks.

"I think he was a great columnist," said Meg Greenfield, editorial page editor of The Post.

Calling Mr. Kraft one of the last survivors of "the great tradition of the extremely well informed generalists," Greenfield said "nobody did as much work as Joe in mastering a variety of very tough subjects."

". . . We are going to miss him terribly much," she said. "I think newspapers all over the country will."

Born in South Orange, N.J., on Sept. 4, 1924, Mr. Kraft entered journalism at the age of 14 on a part-time basis when he began to cover high school sports for the old New York World Telegram.

After Army service from 1943 to 1946, he received a bachelor's degree from Columbia University in 1947 and went on to graduate studies at Princeton University, at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, N.J., and at the Sorbonne in Paris.

After a brief stint in the early 1950s as an editorial writer for The Post, Mr. Kraft worked as a writer for the Sunday section of The New York Times from 1953 to 1957, and then published two books, "The Struggle for Algeria" in 1961 and "The Grand Design" in 1962.

For three years, beginning in 1962, he was Washington correspondent for Harper's magazine, and he was writing a column in the old Washington Evening Star in 1965.

When Benjamin C. Bradlee, now The Post's executive editor, joined The Post that year, one of his first moves was to induce Mr. Kraft to change newspapers.

Bradlee called Mr. Kraft a deeply intellectual man who displayed great humor and a breadth of interests that included nuclear policy, French politics and the Washington Redskins.

Among colleagues and peers, Mr. Kraft was known for his refusal to indulge in ivory-tower punditry and for the diligence with which he pursued the information on which his columns were based.

"He worked the phones unbelievably," Bradlee said. ". . . He was no thumbsucker. He was out on the street. He moved around. He talked to lots of people."

With the possible exception of I.F. Stone, "no journalist of his time in Washington studied the official documents more carefully, questioned officials more precisely, or worked so hard, knowing he had so little time, to fight for the facts and against the television pretenses of contemporary politicians," said James Reston of the New York Times.

Mr. Kraft held three awards for distinguished reporting from the Overseas Press Club. He contributed to The New Yorker and was the author of four books in all. The third and fourth were "Profiles in Power," published in 1966 and "The Chinese Difference," published in 1973.

During the 1960 presidential campaign, he wrote speeches for then-Sen. John F. Kennedy, and he was later a Ford fellow at Harvard and a Poynter fellow at Yale. In 1979 he delivered the Jefferson lectures at the University of California at Berkeley. France made him a chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

In describing his own work, he once said, "I try to identify what is important amidst the bewildering variety of events that continually occur."

After the death of Walter Lippmann in 1974, Encounter magazine described Mr. Kraft, in words echoed often last night, as "the only visible replacement for Walter Lippmann."

Anthony Day, editor of the editorial page of the Los Angeles Times, called Mr. Kraft "a fiercely independent and superb and brave journalist."

For many years, despite serious health problems, he produced three columns a week. In recent years, the number was two. His last published column appeared on the page opposite the editorial page of The Post on Dec. 29. It was an optimistic column.

In it, Mr. Kraft called the year that was closing a "turnaround year."

"So my hunch is," he concluded, "that when all the figures come up on the table . . . Americans will find a way to beat the odds. We will balance welfare and defense and investment and social improvement in a rough way that does not blight vast numbers of lives. Both in dealing with the Russians and in dealing with ourselves, we will make good the promise of a turnaround year."

In addition to his wife, Polly, survivors include two stepsons, Mark Stevens, of New York, and David Stevens of Denver, and a brother, Gilman Kraft of Los Angeles.

SOUTH AFRICA—MAMELODI TRAGEDY—PEACEFUL PROTEST, BRUTAL RESPONSE

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I stand in the Senate today angry, a man who is overwhelmed and stunned by what I am about to share with my Senate colleagues. I searched my soul for some way to express my true emotions, but often times, as you know, words simply cannot truly relate what one feels. I wish to appeal to our compassion, sense of justice, and deep value for human life. For what I am about to relate to this body, deeply touches all of those emotions.

Mr. President, earlier this week our country honored and recognized a man whose moral vision, uncommon courage, and passionate concern for social justice stirred the conscience of our Nation, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Last week, I had the honor of meeting with an individual who has the same struggle as that of Dr. King's, a struggle of equality, justice, and freedom in his country of South Africa, Bishop Desmond Tutu. Bishop Tutu is a Nobel laureate, a bishop of one of the largest dioceses in South Africa, and yet, he cannot vote in his land of birth. While the means of peaceful protest became the symbol of the civil rights movement, the seeds for the South African liberation movement was embedded with the same ideals. I want to share with you an incident which occurred on November 21, 1985 in Mamelodi, South Africa, where 19 peaceful protestors were shot and killed by the South African security forces and hundreds of others were injured. Among the dead were two 10-week-old babies and seven people between the ages of 50 and 70.

The Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, a public interest law center which promotes international human rights, released a report on January 9, 1986, examining the tragic deaths of these citizens of Mamelodi. These indiscriminate killings are considered to be one of the "worst incidents in South Africa's history of racial turmoil since the legendary Sharpeville massacre in 1960." The excessive use of force by the South African security forces is often times brutal, as it is unnecessary.

The Mamelodi march was intended to be a peaceful demonstration organized by the women of the township to present specific grievances to the mayor. The demonstrators were protesting a ban on weekend funerals, high rent, and the brutal action of the security forces toward their families. Many of the protestors were carrying signs which read "Do not shoot. We are not fighting" and "This is a peaceful march." Approximately, 50,000 demonstrators, of whom two-thirds were women, marched to the administration boards office with a police escort to address the mayor. Almost without warning, the police began firing teargas into the crowd and started shooting people as they tried to flee. I would like to read to my colleagues some excerpts from the Lawyer's Committee report, detailing many eyewitness accounts of what happened that day.

The report examines the case of Ms. Thoko Malaza, a 24-year-old woman and activist in the women's organization, who was one of the people killed by the South African security forces. Here is how a witness who was near Ms. Malaza describes her death:

> We were all running for cover but we did not have time to get inside a house before they shot her and blew her head open. Part of her forehead was blown off and her brains scattered. Joseph M. (owner of a nearby house) tried to put her body into his car to take it to a mortuary. He was shot at by the police who then picked up her body and threw it into a police van. After they picked up her body, they went and found part of her skull which had been blown off and threw that in the van too. They were laughing as they did so.

The report also details an eyewitness account of a 64-year-old woman who was killed while walking home after she had hidden herself from the police in a shopping center:

> A police van was coming behind her and she was shot in the back. Her lungs were protruding from her chest—she died instantly. Some of her insides spilled out onto the ground where she fell. They tried to clear it up but you can still see the marks. As we tried to approach her, the police threw tear gas at us. Then they went to her, handcuffed the body and threw it into the van.

Moreover, according to the report: The police operation was not only confined to the march itself but was also carried out in areas quite some distance from the march, apparently with equal brutality. Mary, a 20-year-old student, had stayed at home and was sitting outside her house under a tree with her brother and some friends when a police van drove by. The police got out and demanded to see the students' reference books and to know where they lived. Mary told the Lawyers Committee:

> They kicked one of the boys very hard. I was scared and I went into my house. The boys started to run away. Jerry Shikwane Ngwatla, who was 19 years old and one of my friends, took a different direction to the others. As he was running, I saw the police shoot him in the back. He fell to the ground and the policeman walked over to him and roughly dragged Jerry over to the police van using the belt of his trousers. Blood was running out of his mouth as he was loaded into the van.

According to Mary, Jerry's brothers later went to the police station to see the body and have reported that, in addition to the bullet wound in the back, Jerry had also been shot in the chest, groin and head. Mary said, "I do not know when or how this occurred, although it must have been after he was driven away because I only saw him shot from behind before he was put into the van."

Unfortunately, Mamelodi is not an isolated incident. There has been an alarming increase in the amount of violence perpetrated by the South African security forces. In the township of Langa on March 21, 1985, the police opened fire on a funeral procession, killing at least 20 people. I find these indiscriminate killings to be appalling and I am outraged at such blatant violations of people's basic rights.

Another area of grave concern to me is the deliberate attempt by the South African Government to restrict the dissemination of information regarding these repressive acts. Specifically, the South African police have withheld vital information on the whereabouts of seriously injured citizens. In a recent case, a mother of a victim had to petition the Supreme Court to find out where her son was located. As it turned out, he was killed by the South African security forces. This restrictive policy only adds to the pain and suffering the families must endure.

Furthermore, the South African Government has severely restricted press coverage of confrontations between peaceful demonstrators and the South African security forces. The complete story of the Mamelodi incident did not emerge for several days and nearly 3 weeks had elapsed before the final death toll was confirmed. The police report issued on November 21, never mentioned the march, it only stated that one woman had died when the "police opened fire in Mamelodi after a mob of youths attacked a police vehicle."

In addition, the South African broadcasting network briefly mentioned in their late report that two people had died, but did not give information as to how or why it happened. While flying over Mamelodi, a CBS film crew was forced to land and immediately arrested and a British television crew was forcibly escorted out of the township. I believe this is part of the South African Government's draconian approach to shield their actions from public scrutiny and concern. It is an obvious confession of their discrimination, oppressive behavior and brutality. I detest this as a gross violation and massive denial of decent standards of conduct.

Moreover, there have been significant discrepancies between official police reports and eyewitness accounts. For example, in the official police report, Brigadier Hertzog Lerm reported that the police had "feared for the marchers own safety and that he had warned the crowd to disperse within 40 minutes." However, according to the Lawyer's Committee report, none of the eyewitnesses standing in the front of the crowd recalled hearing any such warning. The police public relations division alleged that the demonstrators attacked police vehicles with bricks, stones, and petrol bombs, thus, prompting the police response. Again, none of the eyewitnesses reported seeing anyone carrying a weapon, except the walking canes of the elderly, hardly a threatening weapon.

The Mamelodi incident is another grave tragedy in South Africa, a direct result of the repressive policies of the South African Government. We must do everything in our power to stop the brutality of such policies. The elections of August 1984—the so-called colored elections—were a mockery of the democratic process. They have not brought peace or justice to South Africa for the simple reason that they still deny the right to vote to the majority.

Mr. President, let us again reaffirm our support for the legitimate struggle of the majority of South Africans who want a united, nonracial, and democratic South Africa. As we commemorate the great contributions of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, let us remember the struggle in South Africa and our obligation to do everything we can to allow individuals the basic dignity. In this new year, let us all rededicate ourselves to this goal, a goal which is the lesson of our own history.

Mr. President, I have previously introduced legislation which expresses the sense of Congress that President Reagan should urge the Government of South Africa to implement a system of political representation for all South Africans based on the principle of one person, one vote. Mr. President, I am submitting for the RECORD two letters that were recently sent to the South African Government. These letters were initiated by Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator ROTH and Senator GLENN and signed by many concerned colleagues in the House and Senate.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC, December 5, 1985.

State President P.W. BOTHA,
The Republic of South Africa, Union Buildings, Pretoria, South Africa.

DEAR MR. STATE PRESIDENT: We want to register our strenuous objections to the restrictions on press reporting imposed by the South African government.

Freedom of the press is fundamental to democracy. The restrictions that you have imposed damage South Africa's international image, and lend weight to the arguments of critics that South Africa is a repressive police state.

Reduced press access will make it increasingly difficult for South African and Western audiences to have an informed and accurate perception of what is happening inside the country. This will have a profound impact on South Africa and its relations with the West.

We call on the government of South Africa to protect freedom of the press and to rescind the restrictions.

Sincerely,

Nancy Landon Kassebaum, William V. Roth, Jr., Richard G. Lugar, Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., Claiborne Pell, Paul S. Sarbanes, Alan Cranston, Christopher J. Dodd, Rudy Boschwitz, Larry Pressler.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC, December 18, 1985.

His Excellency HERBERT BEUKES,
Ambassador of South Africa.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: It has recently come to our attention that the Government of South Africa intends, on January 1, 1986, to effect the incorporation of the Moutse area into the so-called "homeland" known as KwaNdebele, which is slated for "independence" in 1986, and that a similar incorporation is planned later for Ekangala. It is also our understanding that this is being done without reference to the wishes of the people of Moutse and Ekangala.

We have long considered the "homeland" policy one of the most inhumane manifestations of apartheid. To transfer the people of Moutse and Ekangala, against their will, to KwaNdebele, and thus deprive them of their South African citizenship is tantamount to a forced removal, and a most telling example of the injustice of the "homeland" policy.

You made a particular effort to bring to the attention of Members of Congress the September 30th policy address by President Botha. Among the key points made by the President "on the agenda for continued political and social reform" were: "the Government is committed to one citizenship and a universal franchise within a united South Africa" and "South African citizenship will be restored to all those who lost it in the creation of the homeland states". A decision to proceed with the forced incorporation of Moutse and Ekangala into KwaNdebele would make a mockery of those stated intentions.

Hence, we urge your government to reconsider the decision to redraw the boundaries of KwaNdebele and, instead, to hold a referendum to determine the will of the residents of Moutse and Ekangala.

Sincerely,

John Glenn, William V. Roth, Jr., Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Mitch McConnell, Christopher J. Dodd, Albert Gore, Howard M. Metzenbaum, Paul S. Sarbanes, George J. Mitchell, William Proxmire.

THE GHOSTS OF DEFICITS FOREVER

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise to put into the RECORD one of the most interesting and provocative articles that has appeared in the Washington Post for many, many months. It is an article written by the chairman of the Budget Committee, PETE DOMENICI. It is a remarkable piece of writing which deals with budgets past, budgets present and looks to the future. He spins a Dickensian tale for the returning Congress. He traces how we got to where we are, where we are, and our options for the future. He explains how bad it could get, but also how we can deal with the problems that are before us if we act decisively and without hesitation.

I have been part of the budget proceeding during the entire period that our colleague PETE DOMENICI traces in this particular tale. I recognize every step of the way and can attest to the fact that we are where we are because of the reasons outlined by Senator DOMENICI.

Also, I think his predictions for the future are most appropriate and give a great deal of hope. But they also warn us that if Congress—the Senate, the leadership—does not take this thing into hand, we could continue to go in the wrong direction. Just as easily, however, if we do move as a unit and if we support a united leadership effort on both sides of the aisle, we can bring this budget into balance, bring interest rates down and have a real upsurge in our economy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GHOSTS OF DEFICIT FOREVER

In less than three weeks the automatic spending cuts of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will be triggered unless a court challenge to the new law succeeds. The papers will be filled with the confusion of federal agencies trying to fulfill the law and the outrage of those program beneficiaries who see their activities threatened. Before the coming public panic consumes us, we should review where we are, how we got here, and where we are likely to end up in our struggle with the deficit.

As a prelude, I should note that I am extremely optimistic about the nation's economic potential. We have solved problems of the highest order. We have created millions of jobs for "Baby Boom" workers. We have embarked on a new era of entrepreneurship and rising per-capita incomes. A leanness and quickness characterizes the private sector.

The only cloud on the horizon, and a cloud of mammoth proportions in my view, is the inability of the government to control deficits. The extraordinary deficits we now face symbolize this impotence and also hold the substantive prospect of plunging the nation into an unprecedented economic recession—ironically, one that could well be avoided. The deficit, simply put, remains the foremost policy and political problem confronting the nation. If I may borrow from Dickens, I will call upon three ghosts to lead us on our budget odyssey: the ghosts of budget past, present and yet to come.

1. BUDGET PAST

Our Ghosts of Budgets Past conjures up a scene of candidate Ronald Reagan speaking in Chicago in September 1980. He explains in some detail his four-part plan for the economy and the federal budget: 1) a 10 percent across-the-board tax cut for individuals in each of the next three years to increase take-home pay and the dismal national savings rate; 2) major changes in the corporate tax code aimed at reviving the staggering American economy; 3) an all-out attack on waste, fraud and abuse in government spending, coupled with a permanent shrinking of the government's programs, directed at saving tens of billions of dollars a year; and 4) a major increase in defense spending.

The president-to-be calmly explains that the increase in defense spending will be "affordable," because his other policies will yield a combination of new revenues to the government (from economic growth) and less domestic spending (from a shrinking of federal domestic programs).

Our ghost next takes us to March 10, 1981. The president releases the details of his 1982 budget, which replaces the budget of former president Jimmy Carter. The budget is truly revolutionary. It calls for domestic spending cuts in fiscal year 1982 alone of $67 billion. Between FY 1981 and FY 1986, the domestic cuts would total $475 billion.

On top of unprecedented domestic spending restraint, the president fulfills his second major campaign promise by requesting the largest single defense increase in the nation's history. For FY 1982, this increase would reach nearly $29 billion and would push defense spending from the FY 1980 level of $146 billion to $226 billion in just two years—an increase of 55 percent.

The budget also keeps the president's promise on taxes. It requests individual and corporate tax cuts of $54 billion in FY 1982 and $718 billion through FY 1986.

Above all, our ghost points to the line in the president's budget that shows that if all his policies were fully implemented, the federal budget would be balanced by FY 1984 and would be running a $28 billion surplus by 1986.

Two major points overlooked by many in that first, fateful budget will come back to haunt the nation. First, almost $75 billion in domestic cuts necessary for achieving a balanced budget in 1984 are not itemized and "will be identified later." Second, the economic projections underlying the budget assume real growth in the economy almost double the historical average for the past 12 years (4.6 percent projected compared to 2.5 percent actual for the 1972-84 time frame).

Finally, our Ghost of Budgets Past takes us to the private conference room of the Senate majority leader, Howard Baker, in early spring of 1981. In the room for an extraordinary meeting is the president, who has left the White House and journeyed to the Hill. The president leans across the table and tells the 12 Republican members of the Senate Budget Committee that he will not support a bipartisan attempt in that committee to freeze cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security recipients as part of a deficit-reduction plan. He asks them to join his opposing effort. In front of the senators is a sheet showing savings from a one-year freeze on the COLAs—$88 billion over five years, and more than $24 billion in the year 1986 alone.

The senators relent. They go back to committee and vote against the move to freeze COLAs. Social Security, although larger than all domestic non-entitlement spending programs put together, is protected in future budget battles; it comprises almost 25 percent of the non-interest spending in the federal budget.

2. BUDGETS PRESENT

Our Ghost of Budgets Present arrives, looking weary and battered. He has watched three years of congressional deadlock; the deficits for the first four years of the Reagan administration have amounted to more than all the deficits accumulated by all other presidents in the nation's lifetime. America is amassing debt—corporate, individual and governmental—at a record pace.

Yet, no perceptible crisis is at hand. Unemployment has subsided below the 7 percent mark; inflation and interest rates are down and dropping further; the economy is perking along at about the historical average growth: 2.5 to 3 percent annually. Everyone thinks the deficit may be a problem, but the political will to tackle it head-on is fading. The short-term pain of policies that would really cut deficits overwhelms the short-term gain of voting to retain Congress' favorite programs.

Our Ghost of Budgets Present reveals an internal congressional staff memo showing that despite public displays of budget-cutting enthusiasm, Congress has allowed large spending increases since FY 1980: an increase of $132 billion (99 percent) in national defense; $169 billion in new spending for domestic entitlement programs (an increase of 60 percent), driven by new Social Security increases; and an additional $26 billion in domestic, discretionary spending (a 17 percent hike).

It turns out that many of the "cuts" were measured from baselines that assumed growth, so even with a cut there was frequently an actual increase in dollars. The memo also shows that revenues have dropped off from those original FY 1982 presidential projections by about $150 billion in FY 1986. Moreover, the gross national product forecast by that FY 1982 budget fell short of reality by $2.4 trillion for FY 1982-86! Almost nothing is "affordable" anymore, in the sense that word was used way back in September 1980.

Even worse, the restraint in spending that has occurred has spared programs that stress present consumption (pensions are a prime example) and hampered programs that stress investment in the future (research in nondefense scientific areas, basic physical infrastructure, education).

Interest payments on this debt are $200 billion annually and are the fastest growing element of federal spending. This means that America cannot make the basic commitment to the future that needs to be made in order to ensure the unparalleled prosperity to which all other indicators point.

We now move to February 1985. The president has emerged from his reelection campaign with one of the most overwhelming victories in America's history. Undeterred deficit-fighters in the administration and in Congress conspire to make one last fight to get deficits under control.

The president's budget asks once again for large domestic spending cuts, $180 billion over three years, with the elimination of more than a dozen major domestic programs as the centerpiece of the plan. The budget also asks for a $30 billion increase in defense spending for FY 1986 alone, and rejects tax increases. It projects a deficit of $144 billion in FY 1988, twice as high as any deficit in the non-Reagan era, but a substantial move toward what economists are now calling "structural budget balance."

The ghost now takes us to a dramatic moment. It is May 9, well past midnight. The Senate has concluded debate on an unprecedented deficit reduction package, incorporating Social Security COLA freezes and eliminating several programs. It not only will meet the president's deficit reduction goal in FY 1986, it will yield substantially lower deficits by FY 1988.

The vote stands at 49-48 against the proposal. Sen. Pete Wilson of California arrives from a hospital, where he underwent emergency appendectomy surgery earlier. Against doctors' recommendations, he has come to the Senate in a wheelchair, an intravenous tube in his arm, to vote. He votes for the proposal. With the vote 49-49, Vice President George Bush, in his capacity as president of the Senate, votes for it. It passes, 50-49.

Although only a few suspect it at the time, that moment in the Senate chamber will be the high point for deficit cutting for the year. Our Ghost of Budgets Present speeds over a troubled summer. The budget finally hammered out between House and Senate falls far short of the Senate-passed version, in large part because the president finally opposes any change in Social Security COLAs. His decision dooms any significant congressional action.

Congress finds it impossible to pass almost any significant bills. Appropriations bills fail to move. Approaching is an autumn vote to extend the federal debt the government has run up. Sens. Gramm, Rudman and Hollings conceive a new deficit-cutting mechanism and attach it to the debt limit bill.

Our ghost now takes us to December 1985. Congress sends the president a farm bill that costs an estimated $50 billion during the next three years, about double what the president requested in his FY 1986 budget of nine months earlier. Congress finds it difficult to comply with even the watered-down budget it passed just four months earlier. Congress staggers through a chaos of short-term continuing appropriations and short-term debt extensions, all of which threaten to shut down the government.

Finally, Congress passes more spending bills, postpones action on a multibillion-dollar deficit reduction measure that the administration threatens to veto, and heads home. The president signs the farm bill into law. He signs all of the spending bills, even though they contain in the aggregate about $40 billion more in domestic spending than he wanted and about $30 billion less for defense. He signs the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill.

Within a fortnight, the Justice Department announces that it will join in attacking the constitutionality of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. The president asks for $4 billion more spending for the Commodity Credit Corporation, sending up his formal request Dec. 23. A year that began with high hopes for deficit reduction fizzles into the winter rain of utter failure. Our Ghost of Budgets Present decides to become a consultant to corporations on the impact of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

3. BUDGETS YET TO COME

Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come offers us a choice. First he takes us to February 1986. The president and Congress have been given the size of the automatic cut order (called a sequester order) mandated by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill for FY 1986. It will take a total of $11.7 billion from federal outlays, equally split between defense and nondefense programs.

This leaves defense spending in March 1986 about $40 billion less than the president's original request for the year. Nondefense programs will be cut in some cases below last year's level. Senators up for reelection later in the year are besieged by interest groups hit by the sequester.

Yet, this tiny cut pales in comparison to what may be necessary later in the year. Our ghost reveals internal staff documents that show deficits of more than $205 billion in FY 1987, a full $60 billion over the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target of $144 billion. The president presents his budget in early February. It contains a request for $20 billion more in defense spending. It terminates scores of federal programs through direct cuts and privatization ideas. It rejects new taxes. It is kept alive by Congress mostly as a vehicle for repudiation.

Here our ghost presents two scenarios. Sadly, one is more likely than the other. The first scenario is the hope of many of us who voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—a comprehensive compromise on the deficit. It goes like this:

1) Late March 1986: the president and Congress, unable to come up with a budget for the 1987 year, agree to a "Grand Summit" on the budget. Tax reform plans in the Senate are temporarily laid aside in order to focus on deficit reduction.

2) April 1986: After weeks of negotiations, Congress and the president agree on a historic deficit-cutting package, including fundamental reforms and reductions in domestic spending, a slowing of the defense buildup, and new revenues.

3) May and June 1986: Congress passes new laws implementing the "summit" agreement and appropriations bills that are consistent with it.

4) August 1986: the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget compare their spending updates and conclude that because of presidential and congressional action, the deficit targets of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will indeed be met.

5) The stock market surges, interest rates drop, and the economy takes off. America soars into the future.

But that scenario may be unlikely for many reasons, so our ghost provides a second scenario, feared by many of us who are familiar with the realities of both the budget and of the politics of 1986:

1) Late March 1986: The president's budget has been rejected in all quarters. Congress tries to devise its own budget and fails. The president vigorously pursues his tax reform plan in the Senate, opposing any tax increase within the plan.

2) April and May 1986: the Senate, with 30 members watching primary results that will select their opponent in the November elections, is stymied. Tax reform is stalled, the budget cannot move, and appropriations bills await some resolution of the deadlock. The House puts off action, claiming it cannot act until some initiative is taken by either the president or the Senate.

3) June 1986: The Supreme Court rules Gramm-Rudman-Hollings constitutional.

4) Summer 1986: As the stock and bond market and most of the rest of the world watch, America's government is nearly paralyzed. The size of the amounts needed to meet the $144 billion deficit target prohibit action: $30 billion from defense and from nondefense spending translate into as much as $75 billion in budget authority from defense spending (or almost one-fourth of all new spending authority for defense) and about $45 billion from nondefense programs (or about one-third of all new budget authority in the appropriated, discretionary accounts).

5) September 1986: Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in the amount of a $60 billion sequester goes into effect, causing grave concern among America's Western allies. Most Senate campaigns are now in the post-Labor Day "hot" period. Groups that participate in federal domestic programs, especially teachers and health professionals, descend on Washington in huge numbers. Many state governments begin to lay off large numbers of employees to try to compensate for cuts in state and local aid.

6) October 1986: One month before the 1986 federal elections, the president decides that his position as commander-in-chief compels him not to sign the final sequester order because it would violate his oath of office to defend the nation's security. Already more than 100 lawsuits have been filed against the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts by potential program beneficiaries.

7) Mid-October 1986: Congress, faced with an unprecedented uproar, coupled with a plummeting stock and bond market, tries to devise a way to cope with the new crisis. Everyone attempts to find a way to get out from under the new law. Someone suggests that we need a budget forecast that shows a recession sometime in the next four quarters. The person who makes the suggestion is widely applauded as a genius, and soon the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill is suspended.

8) November 1986: Huge numbers of incumbent senators and representatives of both parties are defeated at the polls, saddled with explaining their position on Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come concludes his gloomy scenario by revealing an internal staff memo that shows deficits will be $200 billion or more as far as the eye can see.

I conclude this little budget journey through time by saying that the concept behind the second scenario is a real possibility if both the president and Congress refuse to compromise on major deficit-reduction options. The amount of deficit reduction needed to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets, or to make any real dent in deficits regardless of any law, is very large.

If the nation's leadership fails to agree by late spring, especially in a year charged with important elections, the mechanism of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will take effect. To allow that to happen would be a national, and even international, tragedy.

A TRIBUTE TO LUCY DuCHARME

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am proud to have the opportunity to pay tribute to Lucy DuCharme, a distinguished Polk County educator, civic leader, and community advocate, upon her retirement. Dedication is a word often used to describe the career efforts of outstanding leaders. But Lucy's career of service and participation—in the schools, the community, and the State—goes beyond dedication. I think the word that might best describe her particular contribution is "efficacy." It is a good thing to care. It is noble to work hard. It is a greater thing to be effective, to make the world work, so to speak, in those endeavors one undertakes.

For the past several years our Nation has embarked on a quest of excellence in education. The State of Florida has been in the forefront of educational reform. At the heart of this national and statewide effort has been the grassroots, recognizing that what happens at the local level—in the classroom, in the community, in partnership with business—is the key to educational qualty and excellence.

If every one of the nearly 16,000 school districts in the Nation had just one Lucy DuCharme, we could be assured of the quality of education in this country. Lucy has epitomized and acted on the concepts of quality education throughout her entire career.

The research and studies of education tell us, "Good schools must have clear goals and standards." Lucy has been a standard-bearer for Polk County schools with business, civic groups, parents, and the community. She has articulated consistently the policies of the school system to the public.

We know that good schools depend on common dedication and a united plan of action throughout the rank and file of school personnel—from the classroom teacher to the lunchroom worker and the custodian. Lucy has led the way in developing this type of esprit de corps in Polk County school employees.

We are told that school administrators are critical elements in educational excellence—that the leadership, problem-solving, planning, and motivational skills of principals, program supervisors, and superintendents make the difference between good schools and mediocre ones. Lucy not only exemplifies these skills, but she has worked within the Polk County system to inspire her colleagues to achieve these attributes of excellence.

Good elementary and secondary schools do not exist in a vacuum, but are an integral part of a continuum of education from the preschool years through postsecondary education. Lucy has been a dedicated participant in all levels of education, from her leadership of the Southern Scholarship Foundation at Florida State University, to her service on the board of trustees of Polk Community College, to her presidency of the Florida Council for the Social Studies and the Sunshine State School Public Relations Association.

Florida faces the challenge of growth and competition with the rest of the Sun Belt for the industries that bring jobs and the highest standard of living to our future. In Lucy DuCharme we have a model of how dedicated education leaders can attract the best of business to an area and open up the dialog of mutual benefit between the corporations and the schools.

Lucy has found the time and energy to participate and lead a broad range of activities beyond the sphere of education, including her service to the American Association of Women, the Pilot Club, Polk General Hospital Auxiliary, Delta Kappa Gamma, the Women's Club, and Democratic Women's Club. I am particularly grateful for her participation on my Academy Selection Committee and as chairperson of the West Florida Academy Selection Committee.

It is easy to see in Lucy a bright light shining, an ever-enthusiastic, never-tiring leader for the good of children, the community, and the State. But I think what has made her career so exemplary is not only the light that shines from within, but her role as a mirror of the change and aspirations of the people and community she serves. Lucy DuCharme has led and has advocated, yet has never forgotten the importance of being a thoughtful listener. And I trust her retirement will be an active one, in which her willing ears and positive counsel will continue to benefit us all.

STATE OF THE STATE ADDRESS OF GOV. GEORGE R. ARIYOSHI

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, it is with pride that I rise today to submit for the RECORD, the 12th and last state of the State address delivered by the Governor of the State of Hawaii, the Honorable George R. Ariyoshi.

George Ariyoshi became Acting Governor in 1973 and was elected the third chief executive of the State of Hawaii in 1974. He has served our State as Governor longer than any other person: 13 years. His state of the State address, which he delivered to the joint session of the 13th legislature on January 21, 1986, sets forth a distinguished record for his administration. In his remarks, he details some of his accomplishments and outlines his vision for Hawaii's future. Governor Ariyoshi's record inspires pride, hope, and confidence. I feel certain that there are many other Governors who wish they could make the same claims.

Governor Ariyoshi epitomizes the finest qualities that a person can bring to public office. I am certain that my colleagues in the U.S. Senate will join me and the people of Hawaii in wishing him continued success during his last year in office.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Governor's Ariyoshi's 1986 state of the State address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOV. GEORGE R. ARIYOSHI, STATE-OF-THE-STATE ADDRESS

Mr President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Legislature, distinguished guests, and my fellow citizens:

In the summer of 1787—a hundred and ninety-nine years ago—a remarkable document was created in the City of Philadelphia—the Constitution of the United States. Thinking it up and writing it down was perhaps the most creative political act in history. And just over twenty-five years ago, our own State came into being with a similar document.

Our State Constitution's Preamble says:

"We, the people of Hawaii . . . reserve the right to control our destiny, to nurture the integrity of our people and culture, and to preserve the quality of life that we desire."

And in Article Five, the Constitution says:

". . . The Governor shall, at the beginning of each session . . . give to the legislature information concerning the affairs of the State, and recommend to its consideration such measures as the governor shall deem expedient."

For nearly half the life of our State, I have obeyed this mandate each January. This morning I appear before you to recommend—for the last time—what I deem not only expedient, but also what I think is the right thing for us to do.

The details of what our Administration is proposing this year are in the written Message that will be delivered to each of you. I shall touch upon them in my remarks, but will do so in less detail than in earlier years.

I want to invite you now to step back with me and take a look at the broader picture.

Let us look back beyond the past year, beyond my time as Governor, even beyond the past century. For we are the inheritors not only of what was achieved in 1985; we are the inheritors of the entire past. Abraham Lincoln said that we cannot escape history. It is from the past that we can get a sense of our future potential—as a State, an Island economy, an Island society.

I take this approach in my final State-of-the-State Address because I am convinced that all of us—even in the midst of solving the everyday problems of life, even in the midst of surviving and raising a family—all of us must keep in mind each day the special nature of this place we call home—this place which history has prepared for us.

If you drive down Kapiolani Boulevard during the evening rush hour, you might easily think that you are on Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles. For something remarkable has taken place here in the past forty years. The intricate machinery of a complex consumer society has been put together here in our small Islands. We live on the tips of great volcanic mountains that rise up from the floor of the vast Pacific. And we realize more and more that there's not much room here!

The straight-line distance between Kaena Point and Makapuu Point is only 44 miles. And the longest dimension of what we call the Big Island is only 93 miles. There is no place else in the world quite like these fragile Islands. Today they support a resident population of over a million people and welcome five million visitors a year. To make this place work, to make it habitable for future generations as well as for ourselves, we cannot afford to forget that our Island State has limits. On a vast continent, mistakes can be made in the use of land and water. In our Islands, the same mistakes can be fatal. Living together here in the middle of the sea, we need a richer sense of community than is found elsewhere.

The ancient Hawaiian society—a society that had existed for a thousand years before Captain Cook came ashore at the mouth of the Waimea River on Kauai—had such a sense of community. That Polynesian society emphasized ohana, a connectedness, a sharing of resources. Things were not perfect, of course. The common people were controlled by strict laws. The kapu system governed a great portion of everyone's life. And capital punishment was often used in support of that system. But the Hawaiian people were self-sufficient. They provided their own food supply. They were culturally rich and socially stable. Their world was in balance.

Two hundred and eight years ago, when Captain Cook swung open the door to the Sandwich Islands—as he called them—everything changed. He and those who followed him brought a new and strange world to Hawaii, and these Islands would never be the same again. Along with a new religion, they brought the energetic mercantile traditions of Europe and America. And we are still living today with the effects of Cook's arrival.

During the middle of the 19th century, the people of our Islands experienced innovation and confusion, success and failure, and political turmoil. And they faced a basic question:

"How can we survive as part of the modern world?"

Today, we in Hawaii are still facing the same question.

The early solution was to survive on the basis of successive single economies. At first it was sandalwood, and when that ran out, it was whaling, then ranching, then sugar.

By the turn of the century Hawaii's new political, economic, and social structure was well established. It was in the year 1901 that James Dole borrowed the money to plant his first pineapple field out near Wahiawa.

The structure was pretty simple. After Annexation, the plantation economy was based on sugar, and later pineapple. Politics and social status were dominated by the "Big Five" and their families. Old Hawaiian traditions had faded into the background, and the tiny seaport of Honolulu was the center of business and trade.

This was another time of apparent social stability and economic consolidation. But the benefits came at a high price.

The vast majority of Islanders had little political freedom—and little opportunity for economic or social mobility. A handful of people in power made the decisions and reaped the rewards. And that's the way it was for fifty years.

At the end of World War II came the next big change. I was privileged to help in a modest way in contributing to that change. Had it not come, I would not be standing here today.

When Jack Burns urged me to run for the Territorial Legislature back in 1954, it was with the conviction that we could change things for Hawaii's people. With our party gaining in strength, there was a chance not merely to change the political players in the game, but also to bring new opportunities to more people; to build a more decent and equitable society. Indeed, if we took office and did not do these things, we would be guilty of exactly what we were complaining about.

So there it was: a chance to make democracy a reality; a chance for people to realize their best potential in getting a job and getting ahead; a chance for almost everybody to contribute to the well-being of our Islands. We knew that it would not be easy. There are many reasons why people do not get ahead in life at the same rate—why some are more successful than others. But if we could make everyone feel at home here—if we could make the government fair—then we knew we would be on the right track. And for more than 30 years, that's the track we've been on.

No one person, no one administration, and no one political party can take all the credit for the constructive evolution of these years. Once it got started, it gained its own momentum, and the legislative accomplishments between 1954 and the mid-1970's were remarkable.

In addition to establishing the efficient structure of the State Government itself, the Legislature passed bills for tax reform; for critically important land-use reform; for greatly increased support for education at all levels; and for increased home rule for the Counties. It also passed better laws to benefit our working people.

Ralph Waldo Emerson once wrote that "the height of the pinnacle is determined by the breadth of the base." These were the years when, working together, we broadened the base of Hawaiian life.

As I came into office as your Governor, my fundamental aim was to continue this opening-up process. In my Inaugural Address in 1974, I put it this way:

"Whatever the challenge, we will at least try. I would rather try and err honestly than be faulted for failing to meet a challenge. To all those who would join in our endeavors, I want you to dare, to be imaginative, to be creative." But I also said this in the same address: "In this Administration, we will speak of our efforts and our successes. But we will also speak of our disappointments and setbacks."

As in all endeavors, there have been disappointments and setbacks. Some stand out more clearly than others in my mind:

We are today nowhere near as active a place for international trade as we have wanted to become.

The fact that H-3 has not yet been built is a disappointment to this Administration—and to thousands of commuters, as well.

We have worked for years to establish a general aviation airport on Oahu, but it still eludes us.

We have built new correctional facilities in each County in the effort to foster rehabilitation. However, with an inmate population that has grown from 300 to more than 1,800 in the last 12 years, we are hard-pressed just to find room for all these offenders.

Yet over the years there have been many achievements along with the setbacks. Before I touch on them, however, let me say that nobody knows better than I that the achievements have been made by working with the Legislature, not against it.

As I look out across this Chamber, I see my political friends and colleagues of a lifetime. As the issues have come and gone, you have been with me in some and against me on others—but we have remained colleagues. There are 76 of you. You represent your own areas—and each area has its own needs. Yet you work in the end as a whole. Only through the consent of a majority in each House can a bill become law. It is in the Legislature that the tensions between the needs of the individual and the needs of the whole community are addressed and resolved.

When that great Democratic President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, was campaigning for his first re-election exactly fifty years ago, he went home to vote in Hyde Park—a little town on the Hudson River in New York. On the night before the election, he spoke to his neighbors from the front porch of his house, and he said this:

"We Americans have had to put up with a good many things in the course of our history. But the only rule we have ever put up with is the rule of the majority. And that is the only rule we will ever put up with. If we spell the word with a small 'd,' we are all democrats."

Here then are some of the accomplishments that, working together, we have achieved in the past few years in Hawaii:

ALTERNATE ENERGY

We have today a worldwide reputation as a leading center of research, development and use of renewable energy resources. Our pioneering work will be proven even more important whenever our oil supply is cut off for any reason—or when the oil finally dwindles away entirely.

DIVERSIFIED AGRICULTURE

Its growth has been incredible. In ten years, the value of Hawaii's diversified ag products has tripled to more than two hundred million dollars a year. The State's leadership in developing agricultural parks, in supporting research, financing, marketing, and export promotions, has contributed significantly to this growth.

AQUACULTURE

Although we have had some setbacks, aquaculture has come in one decade from being just a dream to being one of our State's fastest-growing and most profitable industries. Today, we have 47 aquafarms, and 18 more are on the drawing boards.

HAWAIIAN HOME LANDS

By the end of 1986 we will have made more awards of Hawaiian home lands in the past 12 years than were made in all of the prior Administrations, beginning with Wallace Rider Farrington's Administration back in the 1920's. The thousand lots distributed in 1985 alone exceeds by far the distribution for any earlier year—and an additional fifteen hundred lots will be offered during this fiscal year.

FRESH WATER SUPPLIES

Like our land, our supplies of fresh water are limited. We have given the highest priority to our search for new water sources, and we have had considerable success. In the future, it is clear that we shall have to turn to the sea and our coastal waters for our drinking water. We are preparing for that. We have done something equally important by conserving the water resources we do have. Some years ago there was a risk of over-pumping the Pearl Harbor aquifer as a short-term solution to increased demand. Your government would not allow the most valuable aquifer on Oahu to be endangered in such a way.

IMPROVEMENTS IN EDUCATION

This Administration has been committed irrevocably to quality in education. Sixty-two percent of the discretionary money of our State General Fund goes to the Department of Education and the University of Hawaii. We are also committed to the goal that very classroom session—at every level of learning—will attain the hghest possible standards. The amount we spend on educaton is certainly important. But how we spend it—and what improvements in quality we get—are issues of equal importance. We want to make sure that every dollar we spend firmly supports the learning process itself.

SUPPORT FOR TOURISM

In 1975, we set up the State Tourism Office thus beginning a decade of unqualified support—both direct and indirect—for our leading industry. We have helped the Hawaii Visitors Bureau expand its capabilities. We have helped increase the number of foreign visitors to Hawaii—and they add impressively to the total number of tourists. In the past year, we welcomed close to five million visitors.

FACILITIES

We have been constantly improving the physical facilities of the State—the infrastructure that makes life easier for everybody.

There is a new campus for Kauai Community College.

The Fort Ruger campus of Kapiolani Community College has also been built.

We renovated and consolidated the colleges in Hilo and made major improvements throughout the University system.

H-2 is complete today.

There are new hospitals in Hilo and Kona, and others elsewhere have been extensively improved.

We established a brand new harbor at Barbers Point, and made major improvements to commercial and recreational harbors across the State.

We have built gymnasiums and new classrooms and libraries, and improved our airports. Our Honolulu International Airport is one of the finest in the world.

NEW STATE PARKS

Since 1974, we have added 8,000 acres to our parks, spending almost one hundred million dollars to secure these priceless lands for our present and future generations.

GOVERNMENT FINANCE

Due to our firm fiscal policy, this Administration has never presided over a State deficit. Federal budget policies of the 1980's meant very difficult times for every State in the Nation. Most States had to increase taxes or make massive expenditure cuts including layoffs, or both. In Hawaii, we have not increased general fund taxes. We were even able to give rebates to our taxpayers. There have been no significant layoffs of civil service workers. We have always stayed within the spending ceiling set by our State Constitution. I share your pride in these accomplishments.

JOBS AND THE ECONOMY

When I became Governor in 1974, Hawaii's unemployment rate was well above the national average. Since then, it has generally been below that average. Even in the 1980's, when our nation suffered its worst recession since the Great Depression, Hawaii's unemployment rate was several percentage points below that of the country as a whole. And this has occurred in a State with a population growth rate significantly higher than those of other States.

Complementing our economic growth, our training programs have produced a quality labor force. Hawaii's workers have taken full advantage of the opportunities available—and have contributed in this way to our low rate of unemployment.

NEW INDUSTRIES

New industries in Hawaii rarely become major ones overnight. Sugar took many years, and tourism took time to reach its present success. But for both of these someone began the work. In the past twelve years, we have either begun work on new industries, or nurtured along some seedlings. Diversified agriculture, biotechnology, aquaculture, film production, and energy resources development have all sprouted and are growing nicely. Even astronomy is now a growth industry in Hawaii, which has become a world leader in this field.

This process of seeding an economic forest should not be undertaken sporadically. It needs to be an ongoing process. In the future, we should continue to foster the development of our ocean resources and of high technology appropriate to Hawaii.

In looking at what we have done, and at the new things we can do in the future, it becomes clear that our citizens have more options than ever before. And where once there may have been, as my predecessor put it, "a subtle sense of inferiority" in our people, we have tried to overcome that, so that all might have the confidence to succeed. The job is not complete, but we are on the right track.

There is a unifying thread that runs through this list of achievements. The word is "improvement." Our Hawaii State Plan encourages each person to strive to improve the conditions of his or her own life. We have wanted to help people help themselves. Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, who ran the wartime Pacific Fleet from his headquarters at Makalapa, once said:

"If you need a helping hand, you can always find one right there at the end of your arm."

There are, of course, those who say that we might have accomplished more. I agree. But no one is prouder of what we have accomplished than I am. And no one is clearer about what yet needs to be done.

Our Administration will bring many issues before you. Let me list just four of them now:

First, right down to our last day in office, industrial diversification and economic growth will be at the top of our list—just as it will be for you this Session. Each of us will be taking action and making decisions on this issue.

We will be counseled by some that our decisions must be to do whatever is necessary to meet today's problems. But let me emphasize that we cannot afford to look simply at the short term. We must always be aware of what impact today's decisions will have on tomorrow's Hawaii.

Economic development does not have to mean that we abandon all restraint. Indeed, in a small Island State such as ours, economic development means we cannot abandon restraint. If we are to control our own destinies, if we are to leave a richer legacy for future generations, we must exercise responsible control and use common sense and the wisdom we have gained through our own experiences, to regulate wisely land use, water, waste, and our limited resources. Our desire to control our own destinies is realized through what I would call "collective self-discipline." If we don't achieve it, these valuable resources will be squandered—and the heritage we leave will be a sad one.

For example, I was disappointed that the Federal government wanted to sell Fort DeRussy to help pay for its operational expenses. What would be gained in the Federal treasury is nothing compared to what would be lost in Hawaii. And for the same reason, I am concerned about the City and County of Honolulu's apparent interest in selling some of its lands for a single year's budget needs.

Let us make decisions that will give us the best use of the resources we have—for today and for the future.

My second issue: In past years, we have become quite adept at marketing Hawaii as a place to visit. Now we must turn these selling skills to making Hawaii more adept at marketing our expanding list of products and services. In addition to agricultural products, we should increase the export of our high-level professional skills, and sophisticated manufactured items. There is much more that we can do.

My third issue: Down to our last day in office, we shall continue to urge participation and leadership in the affairs of the dynamic Pacific Basin.

If you take a globe of the earth and hold it in your hands so that you are looking down directly on Pitcairn Island, you will notice something surprising as you look around the edge of that globe. Except for a sliver of Mexico, you cannot see any continental land at all! All you can see is the vast Pacific—dotted with tiny islands. Viewed from this perspective, the Pacific seems to cover half the earth!

Well, this is our ocean! Not in a legal sense, but it is our ocean in the sense that it presents enormous opportunities to Hawaii.

Over the past few years, the people of Hawaii have become more and more aware of what is happening in the Pacific. There are significant developments in trade, science, and technology. Because of historic and cultural ties to many parts of this vast region, we have a unique mixture of Asian, Polynesian, and Western traditions. Yet to play our larger and rightful role in the region, we must now go beyond being simply a multi-cultural society. We need to become even more international. We need to make a greater effort to speak the languages of the Pacific region, and to supply the goods and services needed by the people of this immense territory.

Even though specific opportunities may not be immediately clear, our Administration will urge expanded Pacific interchange, through organizations like the Pacific Islands Conference, the East-West Center, the Pacific Basin Development Council, and our own non-profit corporation formed last year, PICHTR—the Pacific International Center for High Technology Research. The future of these organizations is bright, and we must offer them continuous support. Hawaii has a head start over other parts of our country in perceiving the potentials of the "New Pacific." We must retain that lead.

My fourth issue: Down to our last day in office, we shall continue to stay in touch with the human side of things—particularly as we work to give our young people the best start in life.

Our responsibility begins with their education. I have indicated that we spend great sums of money on education. How we allocate that money will continue to be critical. Ours is a good system today. More students are learning more than ever. Yet we can do even better. The link between the student and teacher remains pivotal. We must provide new forms of support for the classroom teachers who desire to do an ever better job of teaching. We must also be certain that our schools can open practical doors of opportunity to the working world as well as to the world of higher education.

Our University of Hawaii is a source of learning and a beacon of hope for our young citizens. Even as it trains a student for a specific vocation, it also invites that person to consider the broader spectrum of human experience. At the University, our young people are challenged by history's noblest men and women who have contributed in wonderful ways to our civilization. Our University invites our youth to explore the depths of the human mind and heart, as well as the mysteries of our vast oceans and the infinity of outer space. They must be well prepared to lead Hawaii in this New Pacific Age.

But it is not only in formal education that we have this responsibility to our young people. It also extends to the media, to the business world, and indeed to the very way that we conduct our own lives each day.

If we are responsible, our young people will come to appreciate the past—to appreciate, for example, the immigrant experience that began centuries ago with the original voyages of unknown Polynesian pioneers. Hokule'a's Voyages of Rediscovery, having proved the navigational skills of the distant past, have been an outstanding example of the non-formal educational process.

If we are responsible, our young people will come to understand a citizen's right to constructively criticize his or her community—and also the obligation to pitch in with time and talent and energy on a specific community effort.

If we are responsible, and if we are enthusiastic about our future, then our children will be, too.

Abraham Lincoln said this about children:

"A child is a person who is going to carry on what you have started. You may adopt all the policies you please, but how they are carried out depends on the children. They will assume control of your cities, states, and nations. They will move in and take over your churches, schools, universities, and corporations. The fate of humanity is in their hands."

I realize that this is a formal legislative occasion, but I trust that as I near the end of this address, you will grant me the time to make a few personal reflections about this job that I have held for so long—and about the process of which it is a part.

Over the years, hundreds—thousands—of people have come to me complaining about our political process. They say that—it involves too much argument, it moves too slowly, it interferes too much in their lives, it doesn't do enough, it tries to do too much!

These perceptions are not altogether inaccurate, but I think they may arise because many people do not understand the basic nature of the kind of government we are living under.

Unlike the workings of the private sector of our society, which searches always for a clear, immediate, and hopefully profitable final result, the democratic process never quite arrives at the final result. The give and take of the political system creates a kind of uncertainty. To get the benefits of the freedom it confers, we must live with contributions and criticisms from a thousand sources. And we are always asking the important question:

"Shall we change things or shall we leave things as they are?"

By contrast, from a dictator or tyrant we would always get a clear, quick answer—but we couldn't do anything about it if it wasn't the answer we wanted.

As a public servant, how does one get anything done at all in the midst of so many conflicting ideas? Well, I'll tell you. Our next Governor—whoever he or she may be—may follow a different path, of course, but this has been my way:

When people come to me with a complaint or a proposal, I have been willing to listen carefully. I have always asked questions so their aim or their problem becomes clear to me. I have tried to consider the needs of all who might be affected by what they propose—to think of the whole, rather than just the part.

I have tried to respect the opinions of others, even when they have collided directly with my own. As you know, I have tended to stand firm especially in unpopular decisions, when I have felt that such decisions would clearly benefit the State. In working toward any decision, I have always been more impressed by what I see as the value of an idea than by the number of people supporting it. And finally, I have always tried in this process to envision the future as well as remember the past.

There is, however, a stabilizing factor in the midst of all this dynamic give and take. I have found that most people are good at heart. Most people want to do the right thing—when they can define what it is. And being citizens of Hawaii has helped them to define it, for here we have a political process unique in all the world.

We have the powerful drive of free enterprise.

We have the fairness of democracy.

And we have the tempering, humane note of the Aloha spirit. No other State has this special spirit. And though it has been severely tested at times, it has never been extinguished. It is alive today, just as it was back in 1854 when Kamehameha the Fourth ascended the throne of the Kingdom of Hawaii and said this:

"To be kind and generous to the foreigner, to trust and confide in him, is no new thing in the history of our race. I therefore say to the foreigner that he is welcome. But the duties that we owe to each other are reciprocal."

Thus Hawaii began in generosity, and my feeling—after spending over half my life in public service in my native State—is that Hawaii will continue in generosity. For it is generosity that helps create a sense of community and of shared opportunity. We must continue to create this sense of shared opportunity—as newcomers arrive, as new ideas have their impact, and as the past recedes beyond memory.

If indeed we can find a little time each day to actually do what it says in our Constitution—to control our destiny, to nurture the integrity of our people, to preserve the quality of life that we desire—then all will be well in the Aloha State.

Blessed by Divine Providence and a beautiful nature, we shall have fashioned a decent and durable society—a society that can perhaps exert a modest influence in calming the awful winds of fury that blow each day across so many places in this world.

We will be a useful example—the symbol and the reality of a community that is dynamic and humane—a place of peace and progress, a place of harmony and hope.

Mahalo and Aloha.

SOUTHIE SUCCESS STORY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a recent article in the Boston Globe praises my longtime friend and constituent Tom McIntyre as a man who gets the job done.

Tom, who lives and works in South Boston, is the international vice president of Local No. 3 of the Bricklayers Union. He is known for his "can do" attitude and his direct approach to any issue or problem. But more importantly, he is known for his unflagging support and loyalty to his friends from all walks of life. All you have to do is join him for a sandwich and a beer at Amrhein's on West Broadway and you know that here is a man you want on your side.

For those folks who have grown up on Andrew Square, off Dorchester Street, who have married and raised children there, Tom McIntyre is in their corner. As the Boston Globe story of November 24, 1985, shows, Tom McIntyre has worked to provide affordable housing for many young families during a time when inflation has put housing out of reach. During a time of high unemployment for union members in the construction trades, Tom McIntyre has created jobs. This is a man who gets things done. I am proud to call him my friend.

I ask unanimous consent that David B. Wilson's article from the Boston Globe of November 24, 1985, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Nov. 24, 1985]

BARGAIN HOUSES—NO SPECULATORS NEED APPLY

(David B. Wilson)

SOUTH BOSTON.—New, archtct-dsgn, brick frnt, 2br town houses, Pkng, off Xway 6 mins to Park Street, walk to beach, $68,900, Bricklayers & Laborers Non-Profit Housing Co. Inc.

No such ad will appear in the Globe because, by spring, when the BLNPHC is ready to sell these 18, sunny, special places, the word will be around and they will all be taken.

And if you don't live in the neighborhood—that's the key word—of Andrew Square, forget it. Tom McIntyre didn't lay up all that brick for yuppie speculators. He did it for what he calls "the two-dollar bettors."

You do not mess with Tom McIntyre. He is international vice president of Local No. 3 of the Bricklayers Union. You do not get to be that and stay that by avoiding or losing fights. He is Mission Hill Irish, silver-haired, black-browed, tough, decisive, the kind of man other men will follow. He also is an idealist with a creative imagination, language to which he would no doubt object.

Like the wheel, great ideas are simple. McIntyre's was, is, this: Boston is desperately short of housing. Housing costs too much because land costs too much. People can't afford to live where they grew up, formed families. The city owns a lot of land, abandoned schools, burn-outs, tax-title takings, vacant lots strewn with rubble and broken glass, going to waste.

The way to produce housing that neighborhood people can afford is to build it on city land conveyed for $1 to a nonprofit developer. A bank that enjoyed the union's pension business ought to be interested in financing. Union craftsmen, paid scale, working for a union-backed outfit, could do the work. And the buyers would get a double discount—the land cost and the developer's profit.

This is pretty radical stuff, you know. No federal funds. No limited partnerships. No sales commissions. No syndicated tax shelters. No complex gimmickry, publicity campaign, extended planning procedures, environmentalist tedium, hearings, seminars, workshops, committees, reviews. Just do it. But you need an architect.

Bill Rawn is an architect. Matter of fact, he is The Architect in Tracy Kidder's best seller, "House." Through Ed Lashman, a mutual friend, McIntyre found Rawn. One night last January they had dinner at Amrhein's on West Broadway and discovered that they liked each other's style and ideas.

It helped—a lot—that McIntyre had been with Ray Flynn early in the 1983 election. It helped that Arthur Cola and Pat Walsh of the Laborers Union were willing to get aboard. It helped that Billy Bulger had gone to the Andrew School. It helped that Dave Mirabassi was willing to take charge as general contractor and that attorney Valerie Swett was fascinated by the legal issues.

Bill Rawn delivered plans a month after the Amrhein's dinner. A month later, McIntyre had cost estimates from Mirabassi. In May, the city issued requests for proposals for the old Andrew School site. In June, to the surprise of almost no one, the BLNPHC was chosen. It took title in August and broke ground Sept. 9. In May, people will be living in the houses.

Boston is not supposed to work that way. In Boston, people love to fight, brood upon ancient wrongs, to chew over issues, to debate important principles, to punish and reward old foes and friends, to convene and consult and pick nits. Instead, Tom McIntyre, the Mission Hill kid, and Bill Rawn, the post-modernist 1 Yalie, Harvard Law graduate and oncoming national celebrity, and their friends, went out and built 18 houses.

You can see them today, framed in and rough-plumbed, their bay windows shining out on Dorchester street, with the fine, clean smell of new lumber blending with the sour scent of mortar. It is the fragrance of progress and growth. Thousands of empty lots in this city could use a little of it.

Valerie Swett has written deed restrictions designed to prevent speculation, and she thinks they will work. The houses, of course, are worth on the open market two to three times their expected price.

Tom McIntyre may have discovered a no-lose game. The union gets work and jobs for apprentices and badly needed public relations. The neighborhood gets some protection against gentrification. A development model has been established. Ray Flynn looks great. The city gets taxes and neighborhood stability. Bill Rawn gets an exciting commission. Valerie Swett breaks new ground in her profession. And people get places to live. Each new unit, just about, creates a corresponding vacancy.

If it all does not work out exactly as planned, well, somebody tried. Right away. Now. Tom McIntyre's way.

AN INVITATION TO MR. GORBACHEV

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, sometime this year the leader of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev, will visit

Washington for a summit meeting with President Reagan.

In this regard the senior Senator from West Virginia, our distinguished Democratic leader, has proposed in a speech to the Senate earlier today that Mr. Gorbachev be invited to address a joint meeting of Congress. Such an address, of course, would certainly be carried on all the American networks and would provide Mr. Gorbachev an unparalleled opportunity to take his country's case to the American people.

Senator BYRD would attach two conditions to this invitation; first, that President Reagan be invited to address a joint meeting of Congress prior to, or following, the Gorbachev address; and second, that President Reagan's speech be carried live and in its entirety on Soviet television.

The proposal of the Senator from West Virginia is an innovative and extremely constructive one. The people of each country would get an opportunity to understand the positions and perspectives of the other. I would hope such understanding will lead to a more peaceful environment and will stimulate public pressure in both countries for a prompt and successful conclusion to the arms control negotiations.

Mr. President, I urge the President and the Speaker, in consultation with the rest of the leadership of the two Houses, to move forward with Senator BYRD's proposal.

UPDATE ON RADIATION EXPOSURE ISSUES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as many of my colleagues are aware, the General Accounting Office [GAO] in November 1985 completed a review that I requested be done of certain issues concerning radiation safety measures during the 1946 Pacific nuclear weapons test series, Operation Crossroads. The findings of this study, entitled "Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should be Improved," are both significant and of vital interest not only to the Congress but to the public at large.

THE GAO REPORT ON OPERATION CROSSROADS

I believe that there has been no more important document regarding radiation safety activities of the U.S. Atmospheric Nuclear Weapons Test Program than this November 8, 1985, GAO report. Thus, I want to provide an update on this review and the related followup work.

A consistent theme that has generally punctuated Federal Government statements on the issue of possible exposure to radiation as a result of the Nuclear Test Program has been that there is no need for any action because few if any of the veterans involved in the Atmospheric Nuclear Weapons Test Program or with the occupation of Japan after World War II were exposed to other than very low levels of radiation and such levels are not thought to be a potential cause of harm.

The recent GAO report, although it does not purport to establish or estimate any specific exposure levels for veterans who were present at Operation Crossroads, casts significant doubt on the assertions by the Defense Department that the only exposures were to low-level radiation. This report—produced by an entity with no stake in the underlying issue—creates, I believe, a strong mandate for further action to sort out the question of the actual exposure experience at Operation Crossroads—and to apply the learning from that effort to other nuclear blast exposures.

Pursuing study such as that conducted by the GAO is particularly important because the Veterans' Administration [VA] has relied on the Department of Defense [DOD] radiation exposure estimates, calculated by the DOD's Defense Nuclear Agency [DNA], for denying veterans' compensation claims. According to the VA, approximately 500 veterans have claimed injury due to radiation exposure during Operation Crossroads. None of these claims have been approved.

Altogether, an estimated 220,000 military personnel participated in 19 peacetime atmospheric nuclear weapons test operations in which a total of 235 nuclear bombs were detonated. Operation Crossroads, conducted in the Pacific Bikini Island lagoon, was the first such test. Two nuclear bomb detonations were set off there, Shot Able, an atmospheric test, on July 1 and Shot Baker, which was detonated underwater on July 25, 1946.

After completion of the Operation Crossroads study, GAO officials estimated that 41 percent of the 42,000 Crossroads participants—approximately 17,000 people—probably received heavier radiation dosages than previously assumed. The GAO report concluded that the highest risk for exposure was among military personnel who tried to decontaminate the target ships following Test Baker, along with personnel who retrieved those ships and crews who boarded submarines which had resurfaced through the highly radioactive water. About 70 of the 80 Test Baker target ships were eventually sunk "because they were not considered fit for continued use or decontamination proved unsuccessful."

Among the most significant findings of the GAO's review were that:

First. Only 6,300 of the participants in the Operation Crossroads test series—15 percent of the total—wore film badges designed to detect radiation exposure. To make matters worse, the DNA's radiation exposure estimates "made no allowance for inaccuracies" in the film or its processing. The GAO noted that, while the "DNA acknowledges that the recorded film badge readings would have an overall inaccuracy of approximately 30 percent," tests by the National Bureau of Standards suggest that actual exposure could have been twice the amount indicated.

Second. The DNA's estimate of radiation exposure did not take into account the possibility that "personnel may have retained radioactivity on their bodies and clothes." The GAO believes this possibility exists because decontamination procedures were only evolving at Operation Crossroads. The GAO pointed out, for example, that the earliest evidence it found that military personnel were being required to shower or change clothes after returning from contaminated target ships "was in procedures issued on July 31, 6 days after the second detonation." Moreover, even after comprehensive decontamination guidelines were issued, the GAO found that "some violations were reported. Thus, Crossroads participants were probably exposed to more radiation than accounted for by DNA."

Third. The DNA study did not adequately measure internal radiation exposure. For example, it may have underestimated "by a factor of from 5 to 10" the exposure to alpha rays from inhaling radioactive materials, according to the GAO. The DNA also did not consider the possibility of radiation exposure from ingestion and open wounds. The DNA, "believed, incorrectly, a prohibition against food consumption aboard target ships effectively precluded ingestion," the GAO reported. Additionally, DNA "did not know how to calculate for open wounds."

SPECIFIC FOLLOWUP ACTIONS

In view of the many controversies raised by the GAO study, I have taken or will be taking the following steps regarding radiation exposure in the U.S. nuclear weapons test program:

I requested that the Veterans' Affairs Committee conduct a hearing to investigate the findings of the GAO report and to define more precisely the issued relating to Operations Crossroads which need to be resolved. On December 11, the committee held such a hearing during which the members heard from both GAO and DNA, as well as number of individuals who were at Operation Crossroads.

In a November 16, 1985, letter to the Comptroller General, I have asked GAO to do a followup study, focusing on a later nuclear test, as yet unselected, conducted at the Nevada test site in the midfifties, to address the question of whether there were improvements in the safety, personnel monitoring, and decontamination procedures and practices during the course of the atmospheric nuclear test program after Operation Crossroads and, if so, to what extent and generally at what point did such improvement occur. The Comptroller General has agreed to do this followup and has assigned it for action.

In view of allegations that certain Air Force veterans were exposed to radiation as a result of their being in aircraft that were flown through the mushroom clouds which followed certain nuclear detonations in Operation Redwing, I requested GAO to investigate this issue as well as any other issues that arise in the course of investigation with respect to manned planes flying through post-blast nuclear clouds. Specifically, in my November 15, 1985, letter to the Comptroller General, I asked GAO to provide its views on the extent of exposure to radiation experienced by the Operation Redwing plane and plane maintenance crews, whether other individuals were similarly exposed during other detonations and whether the DOD or other governmental entity or any entity acting for the Federal Government has made any attempt to follow these individuals so as to monitor their health status.

In a December 4, 1985, letter, I requested Defense Secretary Weinberger, in consultation with GAO, to arrange for a new, independent review of Operation Crossroads, taking into account the findings and recommendations in the GAO report. With reference to this request, I do not question the integrity of the individuals involved in the DNA efforts. I do believe, however, that the GAO report raised questions of such a degree about the results of those efforts as to require a new review to be carried out and to be carried out by an entity not connected with DNA or with any other reconstruction effort.

I also asked the President to carry out his statutory responsibility, under section 601(c) of Public Law 98-160, to see that such objective work is done on this issue. Without such a review, we will be left with the DNA's views on the one hand and GAO's on the other with no way to reconcile them. That is not a satisfactory result. So, the ball is now in the President's court to bring about a satisfactory resolution of the impasse.

I will be following up with the VA regarding that agency's plans for handling claims for benefits based on a veteran's presence at Operation Crossroads. I congratulate the VA for the generally constructive views the agency expressed to GAO on a draft of the report.

I will continue to pursue diligently getting the Government to carry out scientifically valid study of the health of veterans exposed to radiation, as was mandated in a 1983 law I authored—section 601 of Public Law 98-160. That decision is now pending with VA Administrator Walters. Among other alternatives, one option I have raised with Administrator Walters in a July 24, 1985, letter, and again in a letter of January 21, 1986, was the possibility of making a specific study of veterans who are present of Crossroads. In light of the GAO report, I am pressing ahead with that suggestion.

In January 21, 1986, letters to Dr. Frank Press, Chairman of the National Research Council [NRC], and to Administrator Walters, I have urged follow-up study with regard to the NRC's May 1985 report, entitled "Mortality of Nuclear Weapons Test Participants." Specificially, I urged that, in order to validate the NRC's findings: First, the accuracy of data from the VA's beneficiary identification and records locator subsystem [BIRLS], which was used for identifying deceased veterans for this study, should be verified in light of 1981 changes in veterans' entitlement to VA burial allowances; and second, the NRC should consider the need for comparing the mortality data for nuclear weapons test participants with a similar cohort of other former military personnel, rather than with the general U.S. population which includes individuals whose basic health status may have excluded them from entry into military service, so as to control the results for the so-called healthy soldier effect in the NRC study.

I will continue to assist individual veterans and their survivors who are seeking VA benefits, either from exposure at Operation Crossroads or from some other nuclear blast. On this point, I note that the extension which I proposed, in introducing S. 6 a year ago, of the Public Law 97-72 healthcare eligibility for veterans exposed to radiation has now been enacted in Public Law 99-166. That authority will now run through September 30, 1989, the end of fiscal year 1989.

MANY VALUABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. President, in closing, I want to congratulate the GAO for a job well done on this report, especially the very thorough and careful work of Mr. Robert J. Baney, the project manager for this review.

I also want to note the work of many others who, in one way or another, contributed to bringing Operation Crossroads to the fore for a reexamination, beginning with the late Dr. Stafford Warren whose papers were the starting point for the inquiry. As an Army colonel, Dr. Warren headed a team of 400 physicians, nurses, paramedics, and technicians who were responsible for monitoring safety precautions and radiation exposure at Operation Crossroads. Earlier, Dr. Warren had been in charge of radiation safety on the Manhattan project, which developed the atomic bomb, and it was he who recommended the sudden halt to Operation Crossroads before all planned actions were complete. I note also the work of Dr. Robert Ruffvold, who called attention to the presence of Dr. Warren's papers at the UCLA Library, Dr. Dorothy Legarreta of the National Association of Radiation Survivors, who traveled to Los Angeles to review the material, Anthony Guarisco, who, with his wife, Mary, spent a number of weeks at UCLA cataloging the material, and Dr. Arjun Makhijani and David Albright, who prepared an analysis of Operation Crossroads based on the Warren papers.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I believe very strongly that this past year has brought to light some highly significant findings and developments in the effort to better understand the possible adverse health effects from veterans' exposure to ionizing radiation in the Atmospheric Nuclear Weapons Test Program. Many questions remain to be answered, and I look forward to working together to resolve some of these questions with the chairman, Senator MURKOWSKI, and other members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, as well as with my good friend from Illinois, Senator SIMON, whose bill, S. 707—the proposed Atomic Veterans Relief Act of 1985—is now pending before the committee. I also look forward to continuing my efforts, in cooperation with my other colleagues here in the Senate, Members of the House of Representatives, the scientific community, veterans' organizations, and the many concerned veterans and other individuals across the Nation, to gain this greater understanding and effectively address these important issues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my November 15 letter to the Comptroller General, as well as my December 4 letters to Secretary Weinberger, President Reagan, and VA Administrator Walters, all regarding followup study to the GAO's findings, along with my July 24 letter to Administrator Walters, and his August 26 response, and my January 21, 1986, letters to him and Dr. Frank Press, Chairman of the National Research Council, all regarding health-effect studies on nuclear test participants, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, November 15, 1985.

Hon. CHARLES A. BOWSHER,
Comptroller General of the United States, General Accounting Office, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHARLES: As the Ranking Minority Member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am writing to you in connection with the GAO report—Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should Be Improved (GAO/RCED-86-15)—which you recently completed and transmitted to me.

First, I want to express my appreciation for the high quality of the report—it is in the best traditions of GAO. The project manager responsible for this report, Mr. Robert J. Baney, should be highly commended for the very thorough, very professional job that he did on this project. I ask that you convey to Mr. Baney and the other GAO employees who worked on this report my sincere congratulations for a job very well done and that a copy of this letter be placed in Mr. Baney's personnel file.

As you know, this report concludes that there are many significant questions about the adequacy of the safety procedures which were in place during Operation Crossroads and also about the degree to which the Defense Nuclear Agency (DNA) has estimated that personnel participating in that operation were exposed to radiation. In view of these important questions and DNA's disagreement with many of the findings in the report, I believe that there is a need for follow-up activity. Therefore, in my Committee capacity, I am requesting that you assign appropriate personnel to continue this project so as to provide me with a report or reports in response to the following questions:

1. Is there a basis for concluding that the safety precautions improved during the course of the atmospheric nuclear test program and, if so, to what extent and generally at what point? In addressing these questions, please select for study and evaluation a nuclear test that was carried out at the Nevada Test Site at a time sufficiently removed from Operation Crossroads so that the changes in safety procedures, if any, would be in place. (Specifically, please consider the possibility of studying Shot HOOD or Shot SMOKY in 1957.) Also in answering this question, please comment specifically on any changes in personnel monitoring procedures and decontamination procedures.

2. In view of the findings in your report, do you recommend that the regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration in accordance with Public Law 98-542 be changed in any way, either with reference to Operation Crossroads or to all nuclear tests or otherwise?

3. In further view of those findings, do you recommend that the regulations issued by the Department of Defense in accordance with section 7 of Public Law 98-542 be changed in any way?

4. A. What do you estimate would be the cost if DNA were to implement fully your recommendation that the "Crossroads participants exposure estimates" be adjusted so as to take into account the various exposure factors identified in the report (on pages 55 and 56).

B. In this regard, the VA, in its advance comments on this report, which were set out in an August 26, 1985, letter from Deputy Administrator of Veterans' Affairs Everett Alvarez (reprinted on pages 68 and 69 of the report), noted that "[w]hile GAO recommends revised methods of calculating radiation exposure levels for Crossroads participants, it appears that this new methodology should also be applied to participants in all atmospheric nuclear tests." What do you estimate would be the cost of such a global effort?

C. Is there any feasible way that an entity other than DNA could be the agent for applying the new methodology, in order to lend the appearance of greater objectivity given DNA's adamant resistance to the GAO analysis and recommendations?

5. In light of all the information gathered in the course of preparing your report, please prepare a series of "worst-case scenarios" in terms of possible levels of exposure for service personnel who were present at Operation Crossroads throughout the operation and who participated in decontamination efforts on target ships?

In a related matter, a report was made public last week concerning certain Air Force veterans' exposure to radiation as a result of their being in aircraft that were flown through the mushroom clouds which followed certain nuclear detonations in Operation Redwing. I am enclosing a copy of that report which also includes a Department of Defense document—Preliminary Report, Operation Redwing, Early Cloud Penetrations, issued by Headquarters Field Command, Armed Forces Special Weapons Project, Sandia Base, Albuquerque, N.M.—on this matter. As part of your response to this followup letter, I request that your office investigate this issue, as well as any issues that arise in the course of this investigation with respect to manned planes flying through post-blast nuclear clouds, and report your findings to me. I am particularly interested in learning your views on the extent of the exposure to radiation experienced by the Operation Redwing plane crews, whether other individuals were similarly exposed during other detonations, and whether the Department of Defense or other governmental entity or any entity acting for the Federal Government has made any attempt to follow these individuals so as to monitor their health status.

Finally, in view of his excellent work on the November report and the great expertise he has now acquired in this field, I would greatly appreciate that all the work I am requesting in this letter be carried out under Mr. Baney's supervision if that can appropriately and feasibly be done.

As always, I deeply appreciate your cooperation and assistance.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, December 4, 1985.

Hon. CASPAR W. WEINBERGER,
Secretary of Defense,
The Pentagon, Washington, DC.

DEAR CAP: I am writing with reference to the recently completed General Accounting Office (GAO) report, dated November 8, 1985, "Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should Be Improved" (GAO/RCED-86-15).

This report raises major questions about the conclusions of the Defense Nuclear Agency, as set forth in the May 1984 DNA historical report on Operation Crossroads and elsewhere, that none of the participants at that operation were exposed to other than low levels of radiation. Although I realize that the DNA has rejected GAO's analysis, I believe that that analysis and GAO's point-by-point rebuttal of DNA's official response published in the final report fairly raise the question whether some portion of the 42,000 personnel (GAO has suggested up to 17,000) who participated in the operation were actually exposed to radiation at levels higher than the levels accounted for by DNA.

In view of GAO's analysis and the weight of the evidence on which it is based, I believe that it is incumbent on the Federal Government to take further steps to study this operation to resolve this stark difference of opinion. Thus, I request that, in consultation with the Comptroller General, you arrange for a new, independent review of Operation Crossroads to be carried out with a specific focus on determining the degree to which participants there were or may have been exposed to higher levels of radiation than DNA has calculated. Such a review should take into account all findings and recommendations in the GAO report, including GAO's findings regarding the accuracy of the film badges used, the safety procedures that were prescribed and the extent to which they were followed, the decontamination activities that were carried out by participants, and the possibilities for exposure through inhalation, ingestion, and open wounds.

In order to ensure that such a review will have the credibility necessary to be accepted by veterans who participated in Operation Crossroads, others with an interest in this issue, and the general public, I believe that such a review must be carried out other than by or under the auspices of DNA, which has rejected the report of the GAO. Accordingly, I ask that you have such a review conducted by an entity not previously connected with the Operation Crossroads reconstruction effort or with any other DNA reconstruction of a nuclear test activity.

I look forward to hearing from you in response to this request at your earliest convenience.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, December 4, 1985.

Hon. RONALD W. REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to call to your personal attention the enclosed letter that I am today sending to Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger.

In this letter, I note a recent report from the General Accounting Office—"Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should Be Improved" (GAO/RCED-86-15)—which casts serious doubt on prior Department of Defense estimates of the degree to which service personnel who participated in the Operation Crossroads nuclear test were exposed to radiation. In light of this GAO report, I urge that Secretary Weinberger have a new, independent review carried out of that operation, applying the GAO findings and recommendations. In order to attempt to ensure that any such review is credible to those most concerned about Operation Crossroads—the veterans who participated in that operation, their families, and their survivors—as well as the general public, I further urge that the review be carried out by an entity outside of DNA which has no previous involvement with any atomic-test reconstructions.

In this regard, section 601(c) of Public Law 98-160 charges the President with responsibilities for the purpose of ensuring that activities of the Federal Government with respect to adverse health effects in humans from exposure to radiation are scientifically valid and conducted with efficiency and objectivity. Further effort by the Department of Defense with respect to Operation Crossroads clearly is such activity, and I believe that it is vital that such effort be carried out with objectivity, effectiveness, and credibility. Certainly, a review that has little or no credibility would be ineffective. Hence, I respectfully request that, in fulfillment of your section 601(c) statutory responsibility, you direct that Secretary Weinberger provide for the new review I have recommended and that the review be carried out by an independent entity.

Thank you for your attention to this request.

With warm regards,

Cordially

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

Enclosure.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, December 4, 1985.

Hon. HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs,
Washington, DC.

DEAR HARRY: I have today written Secretary Weinberger (a copy of my letter is enclosed) in connection with the recent GAO report "Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should Be Improved" (GAO/RCED-86-15), dated November 8, 1985. You reviewed an advanced text of this report earlier this year and submitted your views on it to the GAO on August 26.

I have urged Secretary Weinberger to have a new, independent review of Operation Crossroads carried out, as recommended by GAO, in order to determine the levels of exposure to which participants at that operation were exposed. I believe that such a new review is absolutely vital for many purposes, including, of course, giving veterans and survivors with claims for VA benefits based on participation in Operation Crossroads confidence that the information regarding veterans' exposure on which the VA will base its decisions is as accurate as possible.

In light of your appreciation of the importance of having an investigation of a highly controversial issue carried out by an entity with no preconceived notion about or stake in the result—as evidenced by your decision to assign to CDC the responsibility for conducting the Agent Orange study—I urge you to express to Secretary Weinberger your support for such a new, independent review of Operation Crossroads.

Such a statement of support from you would be both particularly valuable—because the principal beneficiaries of such a new review would, of course, be the veterans who participated in that operation—and fully appropriate as an exercise of your statutory responsibility, set forth in section 220 of title 38, United States Code, to promote the maximum effectiveness of all governmental activity relating to veterans.

Thank you, Harry, for your ongoing cooperation and assistance and for your attention to this request.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, July 24, 1985.

Hon. HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs,
Washington, DC.

DEAR HARRY: I have recently received and reviewed a copy of the July 1985 Office of Technology Assessment Staff Memorandum entitled "An Evaluation of the Feasibility of Studying Long-Term Health Effects in Atomic Veterans", which was prepared in response to your December 19, 1984, request that OTA review a proposed protocol for a study of veterans exposed to radiation and advise you as to the feasibility of such a study. I am writing to express my views on this issue in light of the mandate in section 601 of Public Law 98-160 that such study be carried out.

The OTA staff memorandum appears to me to be very well done and quite comprehensive, and I have no basis for disagreeing with the OTA staff conclusions that, first, a study "carried out in accordance with the outlines of the VA plan would not produce meaningful scientific results" and, second, that "a study of the group of 1200 atomic veterans with more than 5 rem exposure [an option OTA considered on its own initiative] would be even less powerful than would the study of the entire cohort."

Notwithstanding these conclusions regarding the likely merits of comprehensive studies, however, I continue to believe that valid study, within the context of section 601, of the adverse health effects of exposure to radiation among veterans exposed during the nuclear test program or in connection with the occupation of Japan following World War II can be carried out. Therefore, I urge you to consider, prior to making any final decision that such study is infeasible, the feasibility of study approaches other than those reviewed by OTA. In this regard, I believe that it is important to note that the study mandate clearly contemplates, in section 601(a)(1)(B) of P.L. 98-160, that, even if it is determined that it is not feasible to carry out some elements of the mandated study, other elements as to which a determination of infeasibility cannot be made would continue to be required.

Among the possible study approaches that I urge you to consider before making any final decision are two that are discussed in the OTA staff memo—namely, periodic follow-up studies of the veterans who witnessed the SMOKY shot and a study of the veterans who were present at the tests carried out during Operation Crossroads (with comparisons being made between the health status of these veterans with an appropriately designed control group of veterans who were not exposed to radiation during the test program). This latter study would appear to be particularly important in light of the concerns about the level of exposure and safety precautions at Crossroads which were raised by the Operations Radiological Safety Officer at the shots, the late Colonel Stanford Warren, in various memoranda and letters which were presented to the Congress in 1983 and which have been the subject of a nearly completed GAO study. (I understand that your staff has already reviewed this study in draft.) In addition to these two studies, there may be others focusing on particular shots or series of shots or some other subset of the total population of veterans exposed to radiation that could be the subject of valid study, and I urge you to look for such options before reaching any final decision regarding the infeasibility of carrying out any study under section 601 of P.L. 98-160.

In addition, I urge you to have members of your staff contact appropriate staff at the National Research Council (NRC) to discuss with them the possibility of the VA providing funding support for a further analysis, using a properly constituted control group of veterans, of the information gathered by the NRC in connection with the recently reported study entitled "Mortality of Nuclear Weapons Test Participants". Such an analysis, which members of the Committee staff have already discussed with NRC, would be a valuable addition to the body of information available at present on the health status of veterans exposed to radiation.

Thank you for your continued cooperation.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, DC, August 26, 1985.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR ALAN: Thank you for your letter of July 24, 1985, concerning whether it is feasible to conduct a scientifically valid study of veterans who participated in nuclear weapons testing programs or who served in Hiroshima or Nagasaki, Japan, following World War II. I agree with you that the Office of Technology Assessment has done a commendable job in reviewing the Veterans Administration's proposed "Assessment of Veterans With Military Service at Sites of Temporarily Augmented Ionizing Radiation." I have asked the Chief Medical Director to review and comment upon the suggestion that the Veterans Administration undertake mortality studies of those veterans who participated in Shot Smokey or in Operation Crossroads. I will report to you the recommendations of the Chief Medical Director as soon as they become available.

Sincerely,

HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 21, 1986.

Hon. HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs,
Washington, DC.

DEAR HARRY: I am writing in follow-up to your August 26, 1985, letter (which responded to mine of July 24) regarding the Veterans' Administration's efforts in response to the mandate in section 601 of Public Law 98-160 to carry out study of veterans exposed to radiation from nuclear detonations.

As you know, the General Accounting Office recently released a report, entitled "Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should Be Improved", on its review of various issues regarding safety procedures and radiation exposure at that first post-World War II nuclear test operation. In light of the GAO report findings which cast significant doubt on the assertions by the Department of Defense that the only exposures at Operation Crossroads were to low levels of radiation, I am renewing the suggestion in my July 24 letter that the VA consider a study focusing specifically on veterans at Operation Crossroads. I would appreciate learning your views on this suggestion.

I would also appreciate your views on the suggestion in my July 24 letter that the VA consider the possibility of providing funding support for a further analysis, using a properly constituted control group of veterans, of the information gathered by the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences in connection with the NRC study entitled "Mortality of Nuclear Weapons Test Participants". Enclosed is a copy of my recent letter to Dr. Frank Press, Chairman of the National Research Council, which addresses the same issue.

Thank you, Harry, for your cooperation and assistance.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 21, 1986.

Dr. FRANK PRESS,
Chairman, National Research Council, Washington, DC.

DEAR FRANK: I am writing in connection with the study carried out by the National Research Council—"Mortality of Nuclear Weapons Test Participants"—which was released last year.

As the Ranking Minority Member of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have long been concerned about the search for answers to the many questions about the health status of veterans exposed to ionizing radiation from nuclear detonations. Specifically regarding this NRC study, I am concerned about certain assumptions which were made relating to it.

First, in light of the 1981 changes in the entitlement to VA burial allowances, it is not clear to me what level of confidence can or should be given to the reporting of veterans' deaths to the VA Beneficiary Identification and Records Locator Subsystem (BIRLS) in 1981 to 1982, information that was assumed to be accurate in calculating the results in the mortality study. Because of the importance of data from BIRLS—not only with reference to this study but for any study which would rely on that system—I believe a verification of the current accuracy and completeness of the data in BIRLS should be undertaken. In this regard, I believe that the NRC should consider requesting financing for such research and would appreciate your views on the need for such an effort, its cost, and likely duration.

Second, I am concerned that the NRC study compared mortality data for former military personnel with mortality data for the general U.S. population, thereby ignoring the so-called "healthy soldier" effect. As the principal investigator for the 1985 report, Mr. Seymour Jablon, wrote in "Effects of Selection on Mortality", American Journal of Epidemiology, in 1974:

It is apparent that the selection process for admission to military service has exerted a profound effect on mortality rates of Army veterans after separation from service. Generally, the mortality rates within the first few years of discharge are considerably lower than those of the general population, but the rates gradually approach those of the parent population over succeeding years. The effect of the bias of selection on subsequent mortality is not short but on the contrary quite prolonged and may persist even after 23 years from Army discharge.

* * * * *

Two conclusions appear to follow: First, the evident lesson that mortality comparisons cannot be made between cohorts that have been screened unequally, or between a screened cohort and the general population; and second, since, in the absence of randomization, "survey" cohorts that differ as to some feature that we wish to study will also differ in other ways, some known to us, but others unknown, we cannot rely on the mere passage of a few years to overcome the unwanted, confounding, distinctions. Initial characteristics may cast long shadows.

In view of the above and questions that have been raised in connection with the validity of the NRC study, I hope that the NRC will seek funding to make a mortality comparison for that study using an appropriate cohort of veterans. Such a further effort seems particularly important in light of the November 8, 1985, General Accounting Office report entitled "Operation Crossroads: Personnel Radiation Exposure Estimates Should be Improved" (GAO/RCED-86-15), which casts significant doubt on the notion that few if any military personnel were exposed to other than low levels of radiation as a result of nuclear detonations. A copy of that report is enclosed.

Thank you for your cooperation.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 1:56 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, without amendment:

S. 2013. An act to delay the referendum with respect to the 1986 through 1988 crops of Flue-cured tobacco and to delay the proclamation of national marketing quotas for the 1986 through 1988 crops of burley tobacco.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2250. A communication from the Attorney General of the United States transmitting a notice of litigation challenging the constitutionality of portions of "Gramm-Rudman", and advising of the position of the Department of Justice in the litigation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2251. A communication from the General Counsel of the Department of the Treasury transmitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to firearms and explosives; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2252. A communication from the Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on prevention activities undertaken by the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2253. A communication from the Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the health consequences of smoking; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2254. A communication from the Acting Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report on NASA's industrial application centers; to the Committee on Small Business.

EC-2255. A communication from the Clerk of the U.S. Claims Court transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of the Court's judgment order for the plaintiffs in the matter of the Navajo Tribe of Indians versus the U.S.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2256. A communication from the Executive Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the reapportionment of an appropriation on a basis necessitating a supplemental appropriation for the American Battle Monuments Commission; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2257. A communication from the Director of the Office of Management and Budget transmitting, pursuant to law, notification of the President's intent to exempt $63.1 billion of the military personnel appropriations from sequestration under Gramm-Rudman; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EC-2258. A communication from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense transmitting, pursuant to law, notice of the intention of the Navy to exclude from examination by the Comptroller General records of a contract with a Turkish shipyard; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2259. A communication from an Assistant to the President transmitting, pursuant to law, a report relative to the military implications of Soviet treaty violations; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2260. A communication from the Acting Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, a waiver of certain requirements of law involving certain technology transfers and NASA's alternative plans for conducting transfers of technology; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-2261. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the administration of the Marine Mammal Protection Act; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-2262. A communication from the Acting Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on impacts on competition and on small business of agreements and plans carrying out provisions of the International Energy Program; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-2263. A communication from the Secretary of Energy transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on actions taken under the Uranium Tailings Radiation Control Act; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-2264. A communication from the Acting Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the progress of the Upper Atmospheric Research Program; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-2265. A communication from the Acting Fiscal Assistant Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the Liabilities and Other Financial Commitments of the U.S. Government as of September 30, 1985; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-2266. A communication from the Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, Department of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the U.S. within the 60 days previous to January 10, 1986; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-2267. A communication from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the system of internal accounting and financial management of the Commission; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2268. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a new Privacy Act system of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2269. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a new Privacy Act system of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2270. A communication from the Chairman of the U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board transmitting, pursuant to law, the 1984 annual report of the Board; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2271. A communication from the Acting Director of the National Park Service transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the disposal of surplus Federal real property for parks and recreation purposes under the public benefit discount program; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2272. A communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on donations received and allocations made from the fund for the advancement of the Indian race; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

EC-2273. A communication from the Executive Director of the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on its compliance with the Freedom of Information Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2274. A communication from the Chairman of the Copyright Royalty Tribunal transmitting, pursuant to law, the Tribunal's annual report for FY 1985; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2275. A communication from the Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Advisory Council; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2276. A communication from the Secretary of Health and Human Services transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report on the status of handicapped children in Head Start Programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2277. A communication from the Secretary of Education transmitting, pursuant to law, a notice of final funding priority—Handicapped Special Studies Program; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2278. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of Defense transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the feasibility of DOD issuing food stamp coupons to overseas households of members stationed outside the U.S.; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EC-2279. A communication from the Under Secretary of Agriculture transmitting, pursuant to law, the quarterly commodity and country allocation table for food assistance; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EC-2280. A communication from the Director of the Office of Management and Budget transmitting, pursuant to law, the cumulative report on rescissions and deferrals as of January 1, 1986; jointly, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Budget.

EC-2281. A communication from the President of the United States transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on his issuance of an Executive Order blocking all property and property interests of the Government of Libya and the Central Bank of Libya within or under the control of the U.S.; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-2282. A communication from the President and Chairman of the Export-Import Bank of the U.S. transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on guarantee and insurance transactions supported by the Bank during November 1985 with Communist countries; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-2283. A communication from the Secretary of Transportation transmitting, pursuant to law, a report and inventory of State practices relative to overweight vehicles, penalties and permits; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-2284. A communication from the Secretary of Commerce transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the extension of certain export controls for foreign policy; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-2285. A communication from the Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, Department of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the U.S. during the 60 days previous to January 7, 1986; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-2286. A communication from the Attorney General of the United States transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the Department of Justice's internal accounting and administrative control systems; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-545. A resolution adopted by the Undergraduate Student Organization of Southern Illinois University at Carbondale favoring corrections in Federal food stamp policies; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

POM-546. A resolution adopted by the Governing Body of the Tribal Council of the Penobscot Nation forbidding the establishment of any nuclear waste repositories on Penobscot lands; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-547. A resolution adopted by the Fourth Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"FEDERATRED STATES OF MICRONESIA—RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the social, political, and economic development of our Nation will be imperiled if our citizens do not have sufficient access to post-secondary education to enable them to acquire essential knowledge and skills; and

"Whereas, Pell grants have made it financially possible for many of our citizens to have access to post-secondary education; and

"Whereas, the continued availability of Pell grants is essential if citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia are to continue to have adequate access to post-secondary education; and

"Whereas, Pell grants may not continue to be available to our citizens unless the Government of the Federated States of Micronesia and the Commission on Future Political Status and Transition are able to reach an agreement with the Government of the United States regarding their continued availability; Now, therefore,

Be it Resolved by the Fourth Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia, Second Regular Session, 1985, That it is the sense of the Congress that Pell grants are valuable and necessary to the future of our Nation and must be preserved; and

Be it Further "Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Chairman of the Commission on Future Political Status and Transition, the President of the United States of America, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President Pro Tempore of the United States Senate, Ambassador Fred M. Zeder II, and the Honorable Clairborne Pell of the United States Senate."

POM-548. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 209

"Whereas, The Environmental Protection Agency recently proposed to permit the incineration of PCB waste materials in special ships in the Atlantic Ocean off the New Jersey coast; and

"Whereas, The potential for serious environmental hazards has not been eliminated and there is the possibility of ocean contamination or rain-carried contamination reaching from Virginia to Ohio, Maine and Canada, thereby affecting large numbers of individuals; and

"Whereas, PCB is a well-known and well-documented carcinogen; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memorialize the Congress of the United States and the Environmental Protection Agency to prohibit the incineration of PCB waste materials in the Atlantic Ocean; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each House of Congress, to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania and to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency."

POM-549. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Finance:

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas at the present time under the United States Social Security Act, individuals who became eligible for benefits in or after 1979 receive reduced benefit levels compared to individuals who became eligible prior to 1979, due to changes made in 1977 in the benefit computation formula; and

"Whereas this disparity in benefit levels has been referred to as the "notch" and has resulted in the award of reduced benefits to approximately 1.3 million persons; and

"Whereas any remedy for narrowing the gap in benefits is complicated because the notch has been in use since 1979; and

"Whereas H.R. 4093 has been introduced in the 98th session of the United States Congress by Representative Roybal, the Chairman of the House Committee on Aging, in an effort to eliminate the notch; and

"Whereas it is appropriate that the Legislature of the State of Maine take a stand in support of this legislation to protect the rights of the citizens of our State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, do hereby respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to adopt H.R. 4093 or similar legislation to eliminate the disparity in benefit levels awarded under the United States Social Security Act with respect to benefits awarded prior to 1979 and in and after 1979, so as to provide equitable benefits for retirees; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Honorable Ronald W. Reagan, President of the United States; the President of the Senate; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States and to each Member of the Maine Congressional Delegation."

POM-550. A resolution adopted by the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Monmouth, New Jersey favoring the adoption of policies and programs concerning nuclear weapons; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-551. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

"SENATE OF PENNSYLVANIA—RESOLUTION

"Whereas, As the name Piper is synonymous with "Cub," so "Cub" is synonymous with Lock Haven, and the late industrialist William T. Piper left an impact on aviation still known around the world to this day; and

"Whereas, William Thomas Piper, Sr. (1881-1970), the "grand old man of private flying," has often been called the "Henry Ford of Aviation" because of his efforts to bring the airplane within the financial reach of hundreds of thousands of pilots around the world interested in private flying; and

"Whereas, The year 1987 will mark 50 years of contribution to the general aviation industry by the Piper Aircraft Corporation and William Thomas Piper, Sr., the man and his "Cub"; and

"Whereas, From the christening of his newly relocated manufacturing plant at Lock Haven in November 1937 as the "Piper Aircraft Corporation" to the state-of-the-art corporate aircraft produced today, W. T. Piper and his Piper Aircraft Corporation made advancements that were destined to bring aviation recognition to the town of Lock Haven, the State of Pennsylvania and the United States; and

"Whereas, During World War II, the "Cub," also called the "Grasshopper," served revolutionary new roles in military liaison and directing field artillery and tactical warfare as well as ambulance service. Between Pearl Harbor and V-J Day, Mr. Piper supplied the armed forces with nearly 6,000 of what GI's called the "flying jeeps." After the war, Piper helped provide the general aviation aircraft that have now become a vital part of our modern transportation system. He envisioned an airport in every town, with the light plane serving as a link to the larger commercial airports; and

"Whereas, The "Cub" has been ranked with the DC-3 as one of the world's most significant airplanes, since over 75% of the United States World War II pilots received their first training in a "Cub"; and

"Whereas, The foresight and "imagineering" of W. T. Piper has caused more J-3 Cubs to be produced than any other airplane in aviation history. More pilots, private and commercial, learned to fly in the "Cub" than in any other aircraft. The "Cub" has created a larger following of devoted afficianados who own, restore and fly these historic planes than any other plane in aviation history. The list of owners and operators of the fabric-covered rag-wing Piper aircraft represents a true cross-section of the American population who fly them for business and recreation; and

"Whereas, With Lock Haven, Pennsylvania, being the "home" of the Piper Cub, the year 1987 being the 50th anniversary of the Piper name, and a large extensive, international celebration already being planned to honor this event, it seems proper that the Post Office in Lock Haven, Pennsylvania, have the privilege of presenting a first-day issue of a W. T. Piper and "Cub" memorial stamp; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of Pennsylvania recognize the great contributions made to aviation history by William Thomas Piper, Sr., and his remarkable "Cub" airplane, and urge the citizen Stamp Advisory Committee of the United States Postal Service to issue a W. T. Piper and "Cub" memorial stamp; and further request that the Post Office in Lock Haven, Pennsylvania, be designated as the place of presenting the first-day issue of the memorial stamp; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of each house of Congress, to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania, and to Mr. Belmont Faries, Chairman, Citizen Stamp Advisory Committee of the United States Postal Service."

POM-552. A petition from a citizen of Salem, Massachusetts, praying for a redress of grievances; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-553. A resolution adopted by the Board of Education of the Carlsbad Municipal School District, Carlsbad, New Mexico, favoring the rejection of H.R. 1523 and S. 415; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. LUGAR (by request):

S. 2015. A bill to provide for the security of U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities and operations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. DIXON:

DIPLOMATIC SECURITY ACT

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the security of U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities, and operations.

This proposed legislation has been requested by the Department of State and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with a section-by-section analysis of the bill and the letter from the Under Secretary of State for Management to the President of the Senate dated December 19, 1985.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR M. NAGEMENT
Washington, December 19, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for consideration by the Congress is a draft bill to provide for the security of United States diplomatic personnel, facilities and operations, and for other purposes.

In June of this year the Secretary of State's Advisory Panel on Overseas Security, chaired by Admiral Bobby R. Inman, concluded its work and issued its Report. The Report contained 91 recommendations designed to strengthen the Department of State's security program to meet the difficult challenges posed by terrorism directed at diplomatic personnel, facilities and operations. This draft bill is based upon the Report and recommendations of the Advisory Panel.

The proposed legislation contains three principal features.

First, it sets forth the responsibility of the Secretary of State with respect to the security of diplomatic operations at home and abroad. It also provides for the Bureau of Diplomatic Security of the Department of State to be headed by an Assistant Secretary of State and sets forth certain provisions relating to the Diplomatic Security Service of the Department of State.

Second, the proposed legislation calls for the Secretary of State to convene Accountability Review Boards to investigate incidents involving serious injury, loss of life or significant destruction of property at or related to United States Government missions abroad (other than military installations). As part of the accountability review process, the board convened in response to an incident would not only make findings and recommendations relating to security generally; it would also determine whether, and in what ways, a breach of duty by an individual employee contributed to the incident, and it would make appropriate disciplinary recommendations.

Third, the proposed legislation provides an authorization of appropriations for Fiscal Year 1986 and for Fiscal Year 1987, to enable the Department to fulfill its security-related responsibilities. In addition, the bill authorizes appropriations for Fiscal Year 1986 for counter-terrorism research and development.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that from the standpoint of the Administration's program there is no objection to the submission of this legislation, and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

RONALD I. SPIERS.

Enclosures: Bill and Analysis.

S. 2015

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Diplomatic Security Act."

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the United States has a crucial stake in the presence of United States Government employees representing United States interests abroad; and

(2) conditions confronting United States Government employees and missions abroad are fraught with security concerns which will continue for the foreseeable future.

(3) the resources now available to counter acts of terrorism and protect and secure United States Government employees and missions abroad, as well as foreign officials and missions in the United States, are inadequate to meet the mounting threat to such personnel and facilities.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to set forth the responsibility of the Secretary of State with respect to the security of diplomatic operations in the United States and abroad;

(2) to provide for an Assistant Secretary of State to head the Bureau of Diplomatic Security of the Department of State, and to set forth certain provisions relating to the Diplomatic Security Service of the Department of State;

(3) to maximize coordination by the Department of State with Federal, State, and local agencies and agencies of foreign governments in order to enhance security programs;

(4) to promote strengthened security measures and to provide for the accountability of United States Government employees with security-related responsibilities; and

(5) to provide authorization of appropriations for the Department of State to carry out its responsibilities in the area of security and counterterrorism, and in particular to finance the acquisition and improvements of United States Government missions abroad, including real property, buildings, facilities, and communications, information and security systems.

TITLE I—DIPLOMATIC SECURITY

SEC. 101. RESPONSIBILITY OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

(c) SECURITY FUNCTIONS.—The Secretary of State shall develop and implement in consultation with other agencies having personnel or missions abroad, within the scope of the resources made available, policies and programs, including funding levels and standards to provide for the security of United States Government operations of a diplomatic nature and foreign government operations of a diplomatic nature in the United States, to include—

(1) protection of all United States Government employees on official duty abroad, other than those under the command of a United States area military commander, and their accompanying dependents;

(2) establishment and operation of security functions at all United States Government missions abroad, other than facilities or installations subject to the control of a United States area military commander;

(3) establishment and operation of security functions at all Department of State facilities in the United States; and

(4) protection of foreign missions, international organizations and foreign officials and other foreign persons in the United States, as authorized by law.

(b) ASSISTANCE.—Other Federal agencies through agreements shall cooperate to the maximum extent possible with the Department of State and may—with or without reimbursement—provide assistance to the Department, perform security inspections and provide logistical support relating to the differing missions and facilities of other agencies, and perform other overseas security functions as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, to facilitate fulfillment of the responsibilities described herein. Specifically, the Secretary of State may agree to delegate operational control of overseas security functions of other Federal agencies to the heads of such agencies, subject to the Secretary's authority as set forth in subsection (a) and provided that the agency head receiving such delegated authority shall be responsible to the Secretary of State in the exercise of the delegated operational control. Upon request and with or without reimbursement, the Department of State may provide training assistance and related equipment to host government personnel assigned to protect United States Government employees and missions abroad.

(c) CHIEF OF MISSION.—Nothing contained herein shall be construed to limit or impair the authority or responsibility of a chief of mission under section 207 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, as amended (22 U.S.C. 3927).

(d) OTHER AGENCIES.—Nothing contained herein shall be construed to limit or impair the authority or responsibility of any other Federal, State or local agency with respect to law enforcement or domestic security operations, as confirmed by Sections 125 and 126 of Public Law 99-93 (99 Stat. 416-418) or with respect to intelligence activities as defined in Executive Order 12333, or successor orders, and intelligence personnel and information associated therewith.

(e) CERTAIN LEASE ARRANGEMENTS.—The Administrator of General Services is authorized to lease up to 250,000 square feet in the United States for the Department of State to accommodate the personnel required to carry out the purposes of this Act. The Department of State shall pay for such space at the rate established by the Administrator of General Services for space and related services.

SEC. 102. BUREAU OF DIPLOMATIC SECURITY.

(a) ASSISTANT SECRETARY.—The Bureau of Diplomatic Security of the Department of State shall be headed by an Assistant Secretary of State.

(b) NUMBER OF ASSISTANT SECRETARIES.—The first section of the Act entitled "An Act to strengthen and improve the organization and administration of the Department of State, and for other purposes," approved May 26, 1949 (22 U.S.C. 2652), is amended by striking out "fourteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "fifteen".

(c) POSITIONS AT LEVEL IV OF THE EXECUTIVE SCHEDULE.—Section 5315 of title 5,

United States Code, is amended by striking out "(14)" following "Assistant Secretaries of State" and inserting in lieu thereof "(15)".

SEC. 103. DIPLOMATIC SECURITY SERVICE.

(a) DIRECTOR.—The Diplomatic Security Service of the Department of State shall be headed by a Director designated by the Secretary of State. The Director shall be a member of the Senior Foreign Service or the Senior Executive Service and shall be qualified for the position by virtue of demonstrated ability in the area of security, law enforcement, management or public administration. Experience in management or operations at overseas diplomatic posts shall be considered an affirmative factor in the selection of the Director. The Director shall act under the supervision and direction of an Assistant Secretary of State.

(b) ASSIGNMENT AND APPOINTMENT.—Positions in the Diplomatic Security Service shall be filled in accordance with the provisions of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, as amended (22 U.S.C. 3901 et seq.), and title 5, United States Code. The Secretary of State shall prescribe the qualifications required for assignment or appointment to such positions. In the case of positions designated for special agents, the qualifications may include minimum and maximum entry age restrictions and other physical standards, and shall incorporate such standards as may be required by law in order to perform security functions, to bear arms and to exercise investigatory, warrant, arrest and such other authorities as are available by law to special agents of the Department of State and the Foreign Service. The regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary with respect to such special agents, pursuant to section 37 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2709), may provide for such special disciplinary procedures as are deemed necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(c) FUNCTIONS.—The Diplomatic Security Service shall perform such functions as may be assigned to it by the Secretary of State.

TITLE II—PERFORMANCE AND ACCOUNTABILITY

SEC. 201. ACCOUNTABILITY REVIEW.

In any case of serious injury, loss of life or significant destruction of property at or related to a United States Government mission abroad which is covered by the provisions of this Act (other than a facility or installation subject to the control of a United States area military commander), the Secretary of State shall convene an Accountability Review Board (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Board"); provided, however, that no such Board shall be convened where the Secretary determines that a case clearly involves only causes unrelated to security, or that a case clearly involves no breach of duty by a United States Government employee.

SEC. 202. ACCOUNTABILITY REVIEW BOARD.

(a) MEMBERSHIP.—The Board shall consist of not less than three nor more than five members, including a Chairperson, designated or appointed by the Secretary of State. The Director of Central Intelligence is authorized to designate a member. In cases where intelligence sources and methods are involved, the Secretary of State and the Director of Central Intelligence shall jointly designate the members of the Board.

(b) FACILITIES, SERVICES, SUPPLIES AND STAFF.—

(1) SUPPLIED BY DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The Board shall obtain facilities, services and supplies through the Department of State. All expenses of the Board, including necessary costs of travel, shall be paid by the Department of State. Travel expenses authorized under this subsection shall be paid in accordance with subchapter 1 of chapter 57, title 5 of the United States Code, or other applicable law.

(2) DETAIL.—At the request of the Board, employees of the Department of State or other Federal agencies, members of the Foreign Service or uniformed members of the military services may be temporarily assigned, with or without reimbursement, as staff employees for the Board. Upon request, an inspector general of the Department of State may provide assistance to the Board.

(3) EMPLOYEES, EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS.—The Board may appoint and fix the pay of such other employees and may employ and compensate experts and consultants in accordance with section 3109 of title 5 of the United States Code, who shall be responsible solely to the Board, as the Board considers necessary to carry out its functions.

SEC. 203. PROCEDURES.

(a) EVIDENCE.—The Board is authorized to administer oaths and affirmations and require that depositions be given and interrogatories answered. The Board may issue or authorize the issuance of a subpoena for the attendance and testimony of witnesses, who are not employees of Federal agencies, and the production of documentary or other evidence from any person, who is not an employee of a Federal agency, or entity in such instances where the Board finds that such a subpoena is necessary in the interests of justice for the development of relevant, admissible evidence. In the case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued under this section a court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which a person is directed to appear or produce information, or within the jurisdiction of which the person is found, resides, or transacts business, may upon application of the Attorney General, issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Board to give testimony or produce information as required by the subpoena. Supoenaed witnesses shall be paid the same fee and mileage allowances which are paid supoenaed witnesses in the courts of the United States. Nothing contained herein shall be construed to require that the Attorney General release any information to the Board unless the Attorney General determines that such release will not seriously impair any pending criminal investigation or prosecution.

(b) CONFIDENTIALITY.—The Board shall adopt for administrative proceedings under this title such procedures with respect to confidentiality as may be deemed necessary, including procedures relating to the conduct of closed proceedings or the submission and use of evidence in camera, to ensure in particular the protection of classified information relating to national defense, foreign policy or intelligence matters. The Director of Central Intelligence shall establish the level of protection required for intelligence information and for information relating to intelligence personnel, including standards for secure storage.

(c) RECORDS.—Records pertaining to administrative proceedings under this title shall be separated from all other records of the Department of State, and shall be maintained under appropriate safeguards to preserve confidentiality and classification of information. Such records shall be prohibited from disclosure to the public until such time as the Board completes its work and is dismissed. The Department of State shall turn over to the Director of Central Intelligence intelligence information and information relating to intelligence personnel which shall then become records of the Central Intelligence Agency. After that time, only such exemptions as apply to other records of the Department of State under said section 552(b) shall be available for the remaining records of the Board.

(d) STATUS OF BOARD.—The provisions of sections 1-14 of title 5 Appendix of the United States Code and section 552b of title 5 of the United States Code shall not apply to an Accountability Review Board.

SEC. 204. FINDINGS.

The Board convened in any case shall make written findings determining—

(1) whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the injury, loss of life or destruction of property with respect to which the Board was convened was security-related; and

(2) whether there is reasonable cause to believe that a breach of duty by a United States Government employee contributed to such injury, loss of life or destruction of property.

In making its findings, the Board shall take into account such standards of conduct, statutes, rules, regulations, instructions and other sources as may have been pertinent to the performance of work and official duties.

SEC. 205. PROGRAM RECOMMENDATIONS.

The Board shall make recommendations as appropriate to improve the efficiency, economy, suitability or security of any program or operation subject to this Act which the Board has reviewed. In particular, the Board shall make recommendations as appropriate to promote security awareness and individual accountability for security programs.

SEC. 206. DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS.

(a) NOTICE.—In any case in which the Board makes an affirmative finding of reasonable cause under section 204, it shall promptly notify the employee concerned. The Board at the same time shall notify the head of the employing agency or the military service involved and recommend that an appropriate investigatory or disciplinary proceeding be initiated.

(b) RECORD.—The Board shall transmit to the Secretary, head of other employing agency or head of military service as the case may be a certified copy of the record of the proceeding, which shall be part of the official record for all purposes of any disciplinary action against the employee concerned.

SEC. 207. CERTAIN AGENCY ACTIONS.

(a) ADMINISTRATIVE LEAVE.—Following notification to an employee of an affirmative finding of reasonable cause under section 204, that employee may be placed on administrative leave for such period or periods as the Secretary of State, the head of the employing agency if other than the Department of State, or head of military service determines to be consistent with the interests of the United States.

(b) DISCIPLINARY ACTION.—Not later than 30 days after a disciplinary recommendation is made by the Board pursuant to section 206, the Secretary of State, the head of the employing agency if other than the Department of State, or head of military service shall initiate or take such action as is deemed appropriate and shall report to the Board on such action.

SEC. 208. TRANSMISSION OF REPORTS.

The Board shall promptly transmit to the Secretary of State all findings, decisions and recommendations made pursuant to sections 204 through 206 and reports received under section 207(b). The Secretary of State shall promptly report to the appropriate committees of the Congress on all recommendations of the Board, as well as on any action taken with respect to such recommendations.

SEC. 209. RELATION TO OTHER PROCEEDINGS.

(a) FOREIGN SERVICE GRIEVANCES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no action taken with respect to a member of the Foreign Service in accordance with this title shall be considered grounds for a grievance action under chapter 11 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, as amended (22 U.S.C. 4131-4140).

(b) REVIEW ABILITY.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed to create administrative or judicial review remedies or rights of action. Determinations by the Secretary of State under section 201 of this Act shall not be reviewable in any court.

TITLE III—AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 301. AUTHORIZATION.

(a) SECURITY ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM.—In addition to amounts otherwise authorized to be appropriated, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of State for "Administration of Foreign Affairs" for the purposes of this Act such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1986, and for fiscal year 1987. Within the scope of total funds available for security, the Department of State shall ensure that equitable funding levels are provided and that, where appropriate, specific amounts are identified for the overseas security of other foreign affairs agencies on an annual basis.

(b) COUNTERTERRORISM RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of State for antiterrorism research and development such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1986.

SEC. 302. FOREIGN BUILDINGS PROGRAM.

In the implementation of any foreign buildings program funded from amounts authorized by section 301, the Foreign Buildings Office of the Department of State shall utilize, to the maximum extent possible, American contractors from the private sector.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

(An act to provide for the security of U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities and operations, and for other purposes)

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

The Act may be cited as the "Diplomatic Security Act."

SECTION 2—FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

The Diplomatic Security Act is a response to the new and profoundly difficult security-related challenges confronting United States Government employees and missions abroad, as well as foreign officials and missions within the United States. The Act is based on the recommendations of the Advisory Panel on Overseas Security formed by the Secretary of State in July 1984. The Panel consisted of Admiral Bobby R. Inman (Chairman), Senator Warren B. Rudman, Congressman Daniel A. Mica, Ambassador Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Ambassador Anne L. Armstrong, Lieutenant General D'Wayne Gray and Messrs. Robert J. McGuire and Victor H. Dikeos (Executive Secretary).

The Act creates a comprehensive new framework for the enhanced security of official personnel and facilities. The framework consists of three complementary facets. The Act sets forth the responsibility of the Secretary of State with respect to the security of diplomatic operations at home and abroad, and additionally sets forth certain provisions relating to the Bureau of Diplomatic Security and the Diplomatic Security Service of the Department of State; it provides for the convening of boards of inquiry to examine issues of accountability in cases involving terrorist or security-related attacks against United States Government personnel or facilities abroad; and it provides authorization of appropriations necessary for the Department of State to carry out its responsibilities in the area of security and counterterrorism, and in particular to finance the acquisition of new missions overseas as recommended by the Advisory Panel on Overseas Security.

TITLE I—DIPLOMATIC SECURITY

SECTION 101—RESPONSIBILITY OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Subsection (a) of section 101 requires the Secretary of State to develop and implement, within the scope of resources made available, policies and programs, including funding levels and standards, to provide for the security of United States Government operations overseas of a diplomatic nature and foreign government operations of a diplomatic nature in the United States. The subsection provides specific content to the formulation "operations of a diplomatic nature" by listing certain overseas and domestic security functions which are encompassed by the Secretary's responsibility.

With respect to overseas security, under paragraph (1) of this subsection the responsibility of the Secretary of State extends to the protection of all United States Government employees who are overseas on official duty (and their accompanying dependents), other than those under the command of a United States area military commander. The formulation used to describe the persons covered derives generally from section 207 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, as amended (22 U.S.C. 3927), which specifies the persons who are under the direction and supervision of a United States chief of mission. Similarly, under paragraph (2) the Secretary's responsibility extends to the establishment and operation of security functions at all United States Government missions abroad, other than facilities or installations subject to the control of a United States area military commander.

On the domestic side, under paragraph (3) the responsibility of the Secretary of State embraces the establishment and operation of security functions at all Department of State facilities in the United States. It also extends, under paragraph (4), to the protection of foreign missions, international organizations and foreign officials and certain other foreign persons in the United States. As the phrase "as authorized by law" in paragraph (4) makes clear, the precise scope of the latter function is defined by other provisions of law on the subject, in particular section 37 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2709), which was recently enacted by section 125 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987 (Public Law 99-93).

Section 101 also contains certain other provisions which are closely related to the matters described in subsection (a). Subsection (b) imposes an obligation on other Federal agencies through agreements to cooperate to the maximum extent possible with the Department of State to facilitate fulfillment of its security responsibilities. It also provides that for these purposes such agencies through agreements may render assistance, with or without reimbursement, to the Department of State. It is expressly provided that such agencies may perform security inspections, provide logistic support, and perform other overseas security functions as authorized by the Secretary of State. Assistance of this kind would be appropriate in circumstances, for example, involving the facilities of other agencies abroad and provision is made for delegation of operational control, subject to the Secretary's overall responsibility. Subsection (b) also provides that the Department of State may furnish training assistance and related equipment, upon request and with or without reimbursement to host government personnel assigned to provide security for United States Government employees and missions abroad. Such assistance would be independent of existing programs for antiterrorism assistance under chapter 8 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended (22 U.S.C. 2349aa et seq.).

Subsection (c) makes clear that this Act does not limit on impair the authority or responsibility of a chief mission as set forth in section 207 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, as amended (22 U.S.C. 3927). Similarly, subsection (d) makes clear that this Act does not limit or impair the authority or responsibility of any other Federal, State or local agency with respect to law enforcement or domestic security operations as confirmed by Sections 125 and 126 of P.L. 99-93, or with respect to intelligence activities (as defined by Executive Order), intelligence personnel and associated information. This language protects, for example, CIA's existing security responsibilities for CIA personnel, information and activities so that it may effectively carry out its assigned responsibilities and mission, and excludes from the Act CIA facilities not colocated with missions of a diplomatic nature. The language also protects the provision of protective services by the Secret Service pursuant to 3 U.S.C. Section 202 and 18 U.S.C. Section 3056.

The specific approval contained in subsection (e) for a lease of up to 250,000 square feet in this country by the Administrator of General Services serves to expedite the process of accommodating the personnel needed by the Department of State to carry out its security-related responsibilities. The Public Buildings Amendments of 1972 require the Administrator to charge commercially comparable rates for space and services.

SECTION 102—BUREAU OF DIPLOMATIC SECURITY

Subsection (a) of section 102 provides for the Bureau of Diplomatic Security of the Department of State to be headed by an Assistant Secretary of State. The appointment of the Assistant Secretary for Diplomatic Security would be made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, as is the case with the other Assistant Secretaries of State. Subsections (b) and (c) provide for technical conforming changes in the law made necessary by the increase in the number of Assistant Secretaries at the Department of State.

SECTION 103—DIPLOMATIC SECURITY SERVICE

Under subsection (a) of section 103, the Diplomatic Security Service of the Department of State is to be headed by a Director who shall: 1) be chosen by the Secretary of State, 2) be a member of the Senior Foreign Service or the Senior Executive Service, 3) have qualifications appropriate for the position, and 4) act under the supervision and direction of an Assistant Secretary of State.

Subsection (b) makes clear that the Diplomatic Security Service is to be staffed by drawing upon the existing Foreign Service and Civil Service personnel systems. Qualifications required for assignment or appointment to positions in the Diplomatic Security Service are to be prescribed by the Secretary of State. In the case of "Special Agents," the position qualifications may include minimum and maximum entry age limitations (e.g., 21 years minimum and 35 years maximum). Such limitations are commonly found in organizations having security-related responsibilities. In addition, the position qualifications for Special Agents must incorporate the standards required by law in order to carry out security functions and to exercise the law enforcement authorities available to such Special Agents. Section 37 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2709) provides for the Secretary to issue regulations governing activities of the Special Agents. In view of the fact that Special Agents perform a unique function—they are directly involved in protecting lives and carry firearms in certain situations—subsection (b) authorizes the Secretary to include in such regulations provisions for special disciplinary procedures to apply to Special Agents. Such procedures might, for example, pertain to the use of administrative leave (a common element of practice among organizations having security-related responsibilities).

Subsection (c) provides that the Diplomatic Security Service shall perform such functions as the Secretary of State may assign to it.

TITLE II—PERFORMANCE AND ACCOUNTABILITY

SECTION 201—ACCOUNTABILITY REVIEW

Section 201 instructs the Secretary of State to convene a board of inquiry, referred to as an Accountability Review Board (the "Board"), in any case involving serious injury, loss of life or significant destruction of property at or related to a United States Government mission abroad covered by the provisions of the Act (other than a facility or installation subject to the control of a United States area military commander). The requirement does not, however, pertain to cases which the Secretary of State determines to clearly involve only natural or other causes not related to security. It also does not pertain to cases in which the Secretary determines that there was clearly no breach of duty by a United States Government employee that contributed to such injury, loss of life or destruction of property.

SECTION 202—ACCOUNTABILITY REVIEW BOARD

Under subsection (a) of section 202, a Board shall consist of three to five members designated by the Secretary of State, who also chooses the Chairperson of the Board. The Director of CIA is authorized to designate a member, and, in cases involving intelligence sources and methods, jointly with the Secretary of State designate all members of the Board. Board members appointed from outside the Government would be special Government employees for conflict of interest purposes. Travel expenses authorized under this Section shall be paid in accordance with 5 U.S.C. subchapter 57, or other applicable law (i.e. the Foreign Service Act).

Subsection (b) deals with the issue of support services for the Board. The Board is to obtain all necessary facilities, services and supplies through the Department of State. The Board's expenses are also to be paid by the Department. In addition, the Board may retain the services of employees, experts and consultants who shall be responsible to the Board, may request that employees of other agencies be detailed to the Board, and may request assistance from an inspector general of the Department of State.

SECTION 203—PROCEDURES

Section 203 empowers the Board to make use of certain authorities of a procedural nature. In particular, under subsection (a) of this section, the Board may issue or authorize the issuance of a subpoena to obtain the testimony of witnesses (who are not employees of executive agencies of the Federal Government) and the production of documentary or other evidence from any such person or from an entity other than a Federal executive agency. In the event of refusal to obey such a subpoena, the Board may apply to the Attorney General to request enforcement by an appropriate United States court. The Attorney General may withhold information if disclosure would prejudice a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Under subsection (b), the Board shall adopt for administrative proceedings under this title such procedures with respect to confidentiality as it deems necessary, to ensure in particular the protection of classified information relating to national defense, foreign policy or intelligence. Those procedures may pertain to the conduct of closed proceedings, for example, or to the submission and use of evidence in camera. The Director of CIA prescribes the level of safeguards for intelligence information, including secure storage requirements.

Subsection (c) provides that the records relating to administrative proceedings under this title (including any hearing under section 206) must be maintained separately from all other records of the Department of State and that they must be adequately protected. This subsection creates a (b)(3) exemption under the Freedom of Information Act. Affected employees, however, would have such access to records concerning them as is authorized under the Privacy Act (5 U.S.C. 552a). Upon completion of a Board's work intelligence records would be turned over to CIA and other records to State. Only those Freedom of Information Act exemptions applicable to Department records generally would be available for records in its custody. Subsection (d) exempts Accountability Review Boards from the Government in the Sunshine Act and Federal Advisory Act.

SECTION 204—FINDINGS

Section 204 requires the Board inquiring into an incident to make written findings of two kinds. First, the Board must determine whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the injury, loss of life or destruction of property with respect to which the Board was convened was security-related. Second, the Board must determine whether there is reasonable cause to believe that a breach of duty by an individual employee of the United States Government contributed to such injury, loss of life or destruction of property. The section specifies that in making its findings the Board is to consult and take into account all sources (such as statutes, regulations and instructions) relevant to the issue of work performance and official duty.

It should be noted that not all inquiries would present a Board with complicated factual circumstances or difficult judgments to make. In a case involving relatively few or relatively easy issues, the Board can—and it is fully expected that it would—move with correspondingly greater speed to complete the inquiry called for by this title.

SECTION 205—PROGRAM RECOMMENDATIONS

When an Accountability Review Board is convened to investigate an incident involving injury, loss of life or destruction of property at a United States Government mission overseas, a principal purpose of its inquiry must be to enable the Department of State to take corrective action to avoid any such incident in the future. Accordingly, section 205 contemplates that the Board shall draw the necessary conclusions from its investigation and make appropriate recommendations to improve security and promote security awareness of missions and personnel subject to this Act.

SECTION 206—DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

There may be many cases in which a Board finds no probable cause to believe that any breach of duty by an employee contributed to the injury, loss of life or destruction of property involved in an incident. In such cases, the Board's inquiry ends with its written findings and program recommendations under the preceding two sections. However, in any case in which the Board makes an affirmative reasonable cause finding with respect to an individual employee, the Board's inquiry leads to a second phase, which is the subject of this section.

Under subsection (a) of section 206, the Board must promptly notify any employee with respect to whom it has made an affirmative reasonable cause finding. The Board also must notify the head of the employing agency or military service concerned with a recommedation that an appropriate investigatory or disciplinary proceeding be initiated.

Subsection (b) requires the Board to draw conclusions from its decision in the case and recommend to the Secretary of State or other agency head concerned disciplinary action as appropriate. In connection with its recommendation, the Board must also transmit a certified copy of the record of the proceeding. That record becomes part of the official record for purposes of any subsequent disciplinary action.

SECTION 207—CERTAIN AGENCY ACTIONS

Under subsection (a) of section 207, an employee who receives notification of an affirmative reasonable cause finding may be placed on administrative leave for such period or periods as is determined by the head of employing agency or head of military service concerned to be consistent with the national interest. Such leave could be granted, for example, in a case in which the employee's continuing presence on the job was considered to constitute a risk to security. Subsection (b) provides that within thirty days after a disciplinary recommendation is made by the Board, the Secretary or agency head must initiate or take action as deemed appropriate and inform the Board of such action. It should be noted that nothing in this title would preclude an agency from taking action with respect to an employee (e.g, a reassignment or suspension without pay) under authorities other than this Act.

SECTION 208—TRANSMISSION OF REPORTS

Section 208 requires the Board to transmit promptly to the Secretary of State all of its findings, decisions and recommendations. The section also requires the Secretary to report promptly to the appropriate committees of Congress on all recommendations of the Board and on any action taken with respect to those recommendations, including reports received under Section 207(b).

SECTION 209—RELATION TO OTHER PROCEEDINGS

Section 209(a) makes clear that a member of the Foreign Service with respect to whom action is taken in accordance with this title may not utilize Foreign Service grievance procedures, to challenge such action.

Section 209(b) makes clear that this Act creates no administrative or judicial review remedies or rights of action. No findings, decisions, or recommendations made under this title may be used in civil actions as res judicata or otherwise. Of particular concern are attempts to hold personally liable those who participate as members or witnesses under Sections 201 through 205 of the Act. Determinations by the Secretary of State not to convene a Board under Section 201 are not subject to judicial review.

TITLE III—AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SECTION 301—AUTHORIZATION

Security enhancement

The additional amounts authorized to be appropriated by section 301(a) will be used by the Department of State to carry out the purposes of this Act. The Department is required to assure that, within amounts actually made available, equitable funding levels are provided and specific amounts identified for security needs of other foreign affairs agencies.

Counter-terrorism research and development

Subsection (b) authorizes appropriation of such sums as maybe necessary in Fiscal Year 1986 for counter-terrorism research and development.

SECTION 302—FOREIGN BUILDINGS PROGRAM

Section 302 requires the Foreign Buildings Office of the Department of State, in its implementation of the Act, to make maximum possible use of American contractors from the private sector to carry out the multiyear foreign buildings program to be funded from amounts authorized by section 301. The services to be provided by such contractors could include, for example, project management and control to ensure that individual projects are completed on schedule and within budget, as well as construction management inspection, testing and review.●

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 2016. A bill to provide for public financing of Federal elections for the U.S. Senate, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

SENATE GENERAL ELECTION REFORM ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have on several occasions discussed the matter of campaign finance and the escalating costs of elections during our deliberations in this Chamber.

My concern has been that a scandal relating to campaign finance is just waiting to happen. We don't know when or where, but we can predict that one of these days a major catastrophe is going to be upon us. Our reaction, unfortunately, will not be rational or reasonable. We will rush into some kind of quick fix that may well turn out to be a mistake, because it will be overly restrictive, punitive and altogether unwise.

In order to avoid such an eventuality, I have advocated public financing for Senate campaigns. This approach to financing elections is something that will ultimately come to pass. We should take this step in an orderly, deliberate fashion, rather than wait until a scandal is upon us, forcing us to react in the heat of the moment.

As a means of forestalling such an eventuality, I introduced S. 85 in the last Congress. This bill was the subject of oversight hearings by the Rules Committee. Today I again offer this bill for consideration by my colleagues since we intend to embark upon a thorough review of campaign finance.

Although this is a complex matter, there are several basic concerns confronting us in relation to how we finance election campaigns.

First and foremost, the costs of campaigns have gotten out of hand. My proposed legislation copes with this problem by placing a limit on spending for Senate campaigns based on a formula related to the voting age population in each State.

A second disturbing development is the decline in small contributions to Federal election campaigns. My response to this alarming situation is to provide matching funds from the Presidential checkoff fund to encourage small contributors to return to the election process. My plan envisions Federal matching of contributions from individuals up to $100. It is absolutely essential to take steps to restore the confidence of small contributors in our Federal elections, so that they will once again contribute to the candidates of their choice.

If we can limit campaign spending in Senate races, and if we can successfully encourage small contributors to return to the Federal election process, we will have solved the bulk of the difficulties now facing us in each succeeding election cycle.

A third element which contributes greatly toward deterring campaign financing abuse is public disclosure. This requirement for campaign contributions is already on the law books, and the public and all interested parties can pore over these records to determine the sources and amounts of campaign contributions. I have always supported full disclosure of campaign contributions. As a matter of fact, I was the first Democratic statewide official in Illinois to make available not only all of my campaign contributions, but also my net worth statement. This complete public record allows anyone to determine the sources of my campaign contributions and my personal income. I emphasize, Mr. President, my strong support of full disclosure.

I am pleased that the Senate plans to focus its attention on the problem of campaign finance. The financing of elections must be looked at in its totality. Public financing and limits on campaign spending must be key elements in whatever solution and whatever plan we adopt. A comprehensive approach, not a piecemeal step, is what is required.

I urge my colleagues to consider the importance of campaign spending limits and the return of the small contributor to Federal election races as the essential keys to the dilemma of massive campaign spending in our Nation.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of my bill be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Senate General Election Reform Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER III—PUBLIC FINANCING OF SENATE GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 501. For purposes of this subchapter—

"(1) the definitions set forth in section 301 of this Act apply to this subchapter;

"(2) 'general election' means any regularly scheduled or special election held for the purpose of electing a candidate to the United States Senate;

"(3) 'eligible candidate' means a candidate who is eligible, under section 502, for payments under this subchapter;

"(4) 'account' means the Senate General Election Campaign Account maintained by the Secretary of the Treasury in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 9006(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; and

"(5) 'authorized committee' means, with respect to any candidate for election to the United States Senate, any political committee which is authorized in writing by such candidate to accept contributions or to make expenditures on behalf of such candidate to further the election of such candidate.

"ELIGIBILITY FOR PAYMENTS

"SEC. 502. (a) To be eligible to receive payments under this subchapter, a candidate shall agree—

"(1) to obtain and to furnish to the Commission any evidence it may request about the campaign expenditures and contributions of such candidate;

"(2) to keep and to furnish to the Commission any records, books, and other information it may request; and

"(3) to an audit and examination by the Commission under section 507 and to pay any amounts required under such section.

"(b) To be eligible to receive payments under this subchapter, a candidate shall certify to the Commission that—

"(1) the candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate will not make campaign expenditures greater than the limitations set forth in section 315(j) of this Act;

"(2) no contributions will be accepted by the candidate or the authorized committees of such candidate in violation of section 315(a) of this Act;

"(3) the candidate is seeking election to the United States Senate, and such candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate have received contributions for that campaign in a total amount of not less than the smaller of—

"(A) 20 per centum of the amount of expenditures the candidate may make in connection with the campaign under section 315(j) of this Act, or

"(B) $200,000; and

"(4) at least two candidates have qualified for the election ballot for election to the same seat in the United States Senate under the law of the State involved.

"(c) Agreements, certifications, and declarations under this section shall be filed with the Commission at the time required by the Commission.

"ENTITLEMENT TO PAYMENTS

"SEC. 503. (a) Every candidate who meets the eligibility requirements in section 502 is entitled to payments for use in such candidate's general election campaign in an amount equal to the amount of contributions such candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate receive for that campaign.

"(b) A candidate entitled to payments under subsection (a) shall be entitled to—

"(1) an initial payment in an amount equal to the contributions certified under section 502(b)(3); and

"(2) additional payments to be paid in—

"(A) multiples of $10,000 under section 506, if, with respect to each such payment, the eligible candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate have received contributions aggregating $10,000; and

"(B) a final payment under section 506 (designated as such by the candidate involved) of the balance of the entitlement of the candidate under this section.

"(c) In determining the amount of contributions received by a candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate for the purposes of subsection (a) of this section and section 502(b)(3)—

"(1) no contribution received by the candidate or any of the authorized committees of such candidate as a subscription, loan, advance, deposit, or as a contribution of products or services, shall be taken into account;

"(2) no contribution received from a political committee or any other organization shall be taken into account;

"(3) no contribution received from any individual shall be taken into account to the extent that such contribution exceeds $100 when added to the amount of all other contributions made by that individual to or for the benefit of such candidate in connection with the general election campaign of such candidate;

"(4) no contribution received from any individual who resides in a State other than the State in which the election is held shall be taken into account to the extent that such contribution when added to all other contributions received from such individuals exceeds 20 per centum of the aggregate of contributions otherwise taken into account;

"(5) no contribution (A) which is received before September 1 of the year immediately preceding the year in which any general election is held and (B) which is not maintained in a separate account until the date on which such candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election, shall be taken into account;

"(6) no contribution maintained in such a separate account shall be used to make any expenditure until the date on which the candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election to the Senate; and

"(7) no contribution received after the date on which the election is held shall be taken into account.

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), no candidate is entitled to the payment of any amount under this section which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by such candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate and any other payments made to the candidate under this subchapter for such candidate's general election campaign, exceeds the amount of the expenditures limitation applicable to such candidate for that campaign under section 315(j)(1) of this Act.

"WAIVER OF OVERALL EXPENDITURE LIMITATION; ADDITIONAL PUBLIC FINANCING FOR CERTAIN CANDIDATES

"SEC. 504. (a)(1) Not later than the date on which a candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election to the Senate of the United States, or ninety days before the date of any general election, whichever is earlier, each candidate for election to the Senate of the United States shall file with the Commission a declaration of whether such candidate intends to make expenditures in excess of the limitations on expenditures under section 315(j) of this Act.

"(2) Not later than sixty days before the date of such general election, each candidate who has reason to believe that he may make expenditures in excess of such limitations shall notify the Commission to that effect, unless such candidate filed with the Commission a timely declaration that he intended to exceed such limitations, as provided in paragraph (1).

"(3) Each candidate for election to the Senate of the United States shall notify the Commission and each other candidate for the same election within forty-eight hours after such candidate, or any of the authorized committees of such candidate—

"(A) makes any expenditure, or incurs any obligation to make an expenditure, in excess of the limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(j) of this Act; or

"(B) receives any contribution which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by such candidate and the authorized committees of such candidate, exceeds the amount of the limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(j)(1) of this Act.

"(4) The Commission is authorized to determine, upon its own initiative or upon the request of any candidate for election to the Senate of the United States, whether any candidate has made expenditures or incurred obligations to make expenditures in excess of the limitations contained in section 315(j) of the Act, or has received contributions in excess of the limitation contained in section 315(j)(1) of this Act.

"(b) The limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(j)(1) of this Act shall not apply to any candidate for election to the Senate of the United States if any other candidate in the same election—

"(1) fails to file with the Commission a timely declaration as provided in paragraph (1) of subsection (a); or

"(2) files with the Commission a notice as provided in paragraph (2) of subsection (a); or

"(3) is required to notify the Commission in connection with the making of expenditures or the receipt of contributions as provided in paragraph (3) of subsection (a).

"(c)(1) Any person who makes independent expenditures, as defined in section 301(17) of this Act, or incurs costs of communication, required to be reported under section 301(9)(B)(iii) of this Act, shall notify the Commission not later than forty-eight hours after such person first makes such independent expenditures or incurs such costs of communication aggregating more than $5,000, and thereafter shall so notify the Commission each time such person makes any additional independent expenditure, or incurs any such additional costs of communication, aggregating $5,000 or more.

"(2) If, with respect to an election, independent expenditures, as defined in section 301(17) of this Act, are made, or costs of communication, required to be reported under section 301(9)(B)(iii) of this Act, are incurred, aggregating more than one-third of the limitation on expenditures in section 315(j)(1) of this Act, the Commission shall, with respect to such election, suspend the limitation on expenditures established in such section 315(j)(1) at the request of any candidate in such election who is eligible to receive payments under section 502, and who has received the benefit of no more than one-third of such independent expenditures or costs of communication.

"(d)(1) The provisions of section 503(d) shall not apply to a candidate who elects to receive payments under this subchapter if the expenditure limitation contained in section 315(j)(1) of this Act is made inapplicable to such candidate under subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section.

"(2) The additional amount to which a candidate is entitled under this subsection shall be based only upon the amount of contributions received after the date on which such expenditure limitation is made inapplicable, except that any contribution which is received from an individual after the date on which the limitation on expenditures is made inapplicable shall be considered as a contribution from an individual who has not previously made a contribution to such candidate.

"(3) The additional amount to which a candidate is entitled under this subsection shall not exceed 50 per centum of the amount of the expenditure limitation under section 315(j)(1) of this Act which would otherwise apply to such candidate.

"CERTIFICATIONS BY COMMISSION

"SEC. 505. (a) No later than forty-eight hours after a candidate files a request with the Commission to receive payments under section 506, the Commission shall certify the eligibility of such candidate to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment in full of the amount to which such candidate is entitled. The request referred to in the preceding sentence shall contain—

"(1) such information and be made in accordance with such procedures as the Commission may provide by regulation; and

"(2) a verification signed by the candidate and the treasurer of the principal campaign committee of such candidate stating that the information furnished in support of the request, to the best of their knowledge, is correct and fully satisfies the requirements of this subchapter.

"(b) Initial certifications by the Commission under subsection (a), and all determinations made by it under this subchapter, shall be final and conclusive, except to the extent that they are subject to examination and audit by the Commission under section 507 and judicial review under section 511.

"(c) Any candidate who knowingly and willfully submits false information to the Commission under this section shall be punished as provided in section 512.

"PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE CANDIDATES

"SEC. 506. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 9006(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, in addition to any other accounts he maintains under such section, a separate account to be known as the Senate General Election Campaign Account. The Secretary shall deposit into the account, for use by candidates eligible for payments under this subchapter, the amount available after the Secretary determines that amounts in the fund necessary for payments under subtitle H of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 are adequate. The moneys in the account shall remain available without fiscal year limitation.

"(b) Upon receipt of a certification from the Commission under section 505, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount certified by such Commission out of the account to the candidate to whom the certification relates.

"(c) Payments received under this section shall be used only to defray election campaign expenses incurred with respect to the period beginning on the day after the date on which the candidate qualifies for the election ballot under the law of the State involved, and ending on the date of the election, or the date on which the candidate withdraws from the campaign or otherwise ceases actively to seek election, whichever occurs first. Such payments shall not be used (1) to repay any loan to any person, or (2) to make any payments, directly or indirectly, to such candidate or to any member of the immediate family (as defined in section 315(j)) of such candidate.

"(d)(1) If the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the moneys in the account are not, or may not be, sufficient to pay the full amount of entitlement to all candidates eligible to receive payments, he shall reduce the amount to which each candidate is entitled under section 503 by a percentage equal to the percentage obtained by dividing (A) the amount of money remaining in the account at the time of such determination by (B) the total amount which all candidates eligible to receive payments are entitled to receive under section 503. If additional candidates become eligible under section 502 after the Secretary determines there are insufficient moneys in the account, he shall make any further reductions in the amounts payable to all eligible candidates necessary to carry out the purposes of this subsection. The Secretary shall, by registered mail, notify the Commission and each eligible candidate of the reduction in the amount to which that candidate is entitled under section 503.

"(2) If, as a result of such reduction, payments have been made under this section in excess of the amount to which such candidate is entitled, that candidate is liable for repayment to the account of the excess pursuant to procedures the Commission shall prescribe by regulation.

"EXAMINATION AND AUDITS; REPAYMENTS

"SEC. 507. (a) After each Federal election, the Commission shall conduct a thorough examination and audit of the campaign expenditures of all candidates for Federal office who received payments under this subchapter for use in campaigns relating to that election.

"(b)(1) If the Commission determines that any payment made to an eligible candidate under section 506 was in excess of the aggregate amount of the payments to which such candidate was entitled, the Commission shall notify such candidate, and such candidate shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to the excess amount. If the Commission determines that any portion of the payments made to a candidate under section 506 to be used in such candidate's general election campaign was not used to make expenditures in connection with such campaign, the Commission shall notify the candidate of such determination and such candidate shall pay to the Secretary an amount equal to the amount of the unexpended portion. In making its determination under the preceding sentence, the Commission shall consider all amounts received as contributions to have been expended before any amounts received under this subchapter are expended.

"(2) If the Commission determines that any amount of any payment made to a candidate under section 506 was used for any purpose other than to defray campaign expenditures, it shall notify the candidate of the amount so used, and the candidate shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to such amount.

"(3) No payment shall be required from a candidate under this subsection in excess of the total amount of all payments received by the candidate under section 506 in connection with the campaign with respect to which the event occurred which caused the candidate to have to make a payment under this subsection.

"(c) No notification shall be made by the Commission under subsection (b) with respect to a campaign more than 18 months after the day of the election to which the campaign related.

"(d) All payments received by the Secretary under subsection (b) shall be deposited by him in the account.

"OTHER POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

"SEC. 508. (a) The Commission is authorized to conduct examinations and audits, in addition to the examinations and audits under sections 505 and 507, to conduct investigations, and to require the keeping and submission of any books, records, or other information necessary to carry out the functions and duties imposed on it by this subchapter.

"(b) The Commission shall consult from time to time with the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Federal Communications Commission, and other Federal officers charged with the administration of laws relating to Federal elections, in order to develop as much consistency and coordination with the administration of those other laws as the provisions of this subchapter permit. The Commission shall use the same or comparable data as that used in the administration of such other election laws whenever possible.

"REPORTS TO CONGRESS

"SEC. 509. (a) The Commission shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each calendar year, submit a full report to the Senate setting forth—

"(1) the expenditures incurred by each candidate, and the authorized committees of such candidate, who received any payment under section 506 in connection with an election;

"(2) the amounts certified by it under section 505 for payment to that candidate; and

"(3) the amount of payments, if any, required from that candidate under section 507, and the reasons for each payment required.

Each report submitted pursuant to this section shall be printed as a Senate document.

"(b) The Commission shall submit, not later than March 1 of each year immediately following a year in which any Federal election is held, a special report to the Senate setting forth—

"(1) the amounts certified by it under section 505 of this subchapter and sections 9005, 9008, and 9036 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for payments from the Presidential Election Campaign Fund;

"(2) the amount of money remaining in the fund at the end of the calendar year in which any Federal election is held;

"(3) an estimate of the amount of money which will be transferred to such fund during each of the four calendar years immediately following the year in which any Federal election is held; and

"(4) an estimate, to the extent practicable, of the amount of money necessary to make all payments to which eligible candidates and the national committees of each political party will be entitled with respect to the next two Federal elections to be held.

"PARTICIPATION BY COMMISSION IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

"SEC. 510. (a) The Commission is authorized to appear in and defend against any action filed under section 511, either by attorneys employed in its office or by counsel whom it may appoint without regard to the provisions of title V, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and whose compensation it may fix without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

"(b) The Commission is authorized to appear, through attorneys and counsel described in subsection (a), in the district courts and other appropriate courts of the United States to seek recovery of any amounts determined to be payable to the Secretary of the Treasury as a result of any examination and audit made pursuant to section 507.

"(c) The Commission is authorized to petition the courts of the United States for declaratory or injunctive relief concerning any civil matter arising under this subchapter, through attorneys and counsel described in subsection (a). Upon application of the Commission, an action brought pursuant to this subsection shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28, United States Code, and any appeal from the determination of such court shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. Judges designated to hear the case shall assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and cause the case to be in every way expedited.

"(d) The Commission is authorized on behalf of the United States to appeal from, and to petition the Supreme Court of the United States for certiorari to review judgments or decrees entered with respect to actions in which it appears pursuant to the authority provided in this section.

"JUDICIAL REVIEW

"SEC. 511. (a) Any certification, determination, or other action by the Commission made or taken pursuant to the provisions of this subchapter shall be subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upon petition filed in such court by any interested person. Any petition filed pursuant to this section shall be filed within thirty days after such certification, determination, or other action by the Commission.

"(b)(1) The Commission, the national committee of any political party, and any individual eligible to vote for a candidate for the office of Senator of the United States are authorized to institute an action under this section, including an action for declaratory judgment or injunctive relief, as may be appropriate to implement or construe any provision of this subchapter.

"(2) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this subsection and shall exercise such jurisdiction without regard to whether a person asserting rights under the provisions of this subsection shall have exhausted administrative or other remedies provided at law. Such proceedings shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28, United States Code, and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. Judges designated to hear the case shall assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and cause the case to be in every way expedited.

"PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

"SEC. 512. Violation of any provision of this subchapter is punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.".

LIMITATIONS ON EXPENDITURES IN SENATE GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 315 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (2 U.S.C. 441a) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(i) For purposes of this section expenditures made on behalf of any candidate (as determined under section 315(b)(2)(B)) for the office of Senator of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made by such candidate.

"(j)(1) Except as otherwise provided in section 504 of this Act, a candidate who receives payments for use in his general election campaign for the office of Senator of the United States, pursuant to section 506 of this Act may not make expenditures in such campaign in excess of $250,000, plus 15 cents multiplied by the voting age population, as certified under subsection (e), of the State in which the election is held.

"(2) For purposes of the limitation on expenditures contained in paragraph (1), only that percentage of an expenditure by a candidate or the authorized political committees of such candidate for broadcasting time which represents the cost to such candidate or committees of transmitting the material broadcast to the State in which such candidate is seeking election shall be taken into account.

"(3) A candidate who receives payments under section 506 of this Act for use in his general election campaign for the office of Senator of the United States may not make expenditures in such campaign from his personal funds or from the personal funds of his immediate family in excess of $35,000. For the purposes of this subsection, the term 'immediate family' means a candidate's spouse, and any child, parent, grandparent, brother, half-brother, sister, or half-sister of the candidate, and the spouses of such persons.".

(b) Section 315(c)(1) is amended by striking out "subsection (b) of this section and subsection (d) of this section" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsections (b), (d) and (j) of this section".

(c) Section 315(c)(2)(B) of such Act (2 U.S.C. 441a(c)(2)(B)) is amended by inserting before the period a comma and "except that with respect to the limitation established by subsection (j) the term 'base period' means the calendar year of 1982".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective on January 1, 1987, and shall apply to campaigns for election to the United States Senate after such date.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 5. There is authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Election Commission the sum of $900,000 for purposes of carrying out the provisions of this Act during the fiscal year 1987.

By Mr. CHILES:

S. 2017. A bill to amend title V, United States Code, to expand the class of individuals eligible for refunds or other returns of contributions from contingency reserves in the Employee Health Benefits Fund; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REFUNDS FROM CONTINGENCY RESERVES ON EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS FUND TO ANNUITANTS

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am introducing today what I believe should be a noncontroversial piece of legislation.

The bill calls for a simple amendment to present law to allow rebates to employees, annuitants, and the Federal Government caused by overpayments to contingency reserves in the Federal Employees Health Benefit Fund. A ruling last year, from the Attorney General, asserting that retirees were not eligible for these rebates, has made this legislation necessary.

I do not believe Congress intended annuitants to be excluded when it passed the original legislation. The Attorney General ruled the word "employees" did not include annuitants that were enrolled in the affected Federal health plans. The word "enrollees" is needed as a substitute for "employees" to resolve the issue.

This bill accomplishes that simple substitution.

This language was contained in legislation passed by both Houses last December 12. President Reagan saw fit to veto that bill. The amount of delay resulting from action not taken to allow refunds identified many months ago is an outrage. It also sends a signal that our Federal employees and retirees are not treated with much regard or given much priority. In a time of crucial budget debate, the President's veto of legislation containing language permitting refunds for all enrollees contributes to an impasse where the Federal Treasury is not receiving a refund of some $800 million. In the face of new budget sequestration procedures, the portion of these funds which was overpayment by the Federal Government on behalf of its employees could go toward reducing the deficit.

Moreover, the estimate of refunds due the enrollees in the affected plans is in the neighborhood of $400 million. These are dollars which belong to our constituents which were paid in individually by them and which should be returned without further delay.

Some have mentioned the possibility of overriding the Presidential veto.

Others have voiced the hope that a new bill, with many of the same provisions contained in the vetoed bill, could go forward quickly.

This bill is not intended to get in the way of either of those courses of action, if that is the Senate's will. But the action in this bill in all fairness, is way, way overdue. Therefore, I am introducing this bill so we might proceed without further delay to permit rebates to all enrollees in the Federal Employees Health Benefit Plan.●

By Mr. TRIBLE:

S. 2019. A bill to bar construction of new prison facilities at the Lorton prison in Fairfax County, VA, to accelerate the completion of new prison facilities within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PROHIBITING CONSTRUCTION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PRISON FACILITIES IN LORTON, VA

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today addressing one of the most important public safety needs of the Washington Metropolitan area—the urgent need for construction of a new, permanent prison facility within the District of Columbia.

This measure will help to ensure that a prison is constructed in the city as promptly as possible. It will also bar any attempt by District officials to construct new prison facilities at the Lorton complex in northern Virginia. And, it will require that the U.S. Attorney General extend temporarily the use of the Federal prison system to house those convicted of crimes within Washington, DC.

For many years now, rather than face the need for a new prison, District officials have shipped the problem to northern Virginia. As a result, the citizens of Fairfax County have been beset by fear and unease. For these Virginians have been subject to escapes, riots, and disturbances in a prison over which they have no control.

The District officials responsible for Lorton are not answerable to the residents of northern Virginia. And despite frequent expressions of concern by northern Virginians and their local officials, DC officials have looked first to Fairfax County to solve their prison problems. Instead of confronting the overwhelming need for prison facilities in the District, city officials would attempt to expand the Lorton complex.

The past several weeks have seen a recurrence of this scenario. Two weeks ago, the U.S. Department of Justice announced it was considering severing an agreement with the District that had permitted those convicted in District of Columbia to be incarcerated in the Federal prison system. Once again, the government of the District looked first at Fairfax County. Shortly thereafter, city officials announced that they had entered into a secret plan with the courts of the District to construct a "temporary" 400-bed facility at the Lorton prison in northern Virginia.

To make matters worse, district officials said they would fund this new construction with part of the funds allocated by Congress last year for construction of a permanent prison within the city. City officials said they would use $9 million—of the $30 million appropriated by Congress to build a new prison within the city—to build temporary facilities at Lorton.

Mr. President, these escapades by the District must come to an end. It is time for the city to stop postponding a resolution of its prison population crisis. It is time for the city to act responsibility, and it is time that the city stopped counting on the Lorton prison to handle the overflow that has resulted from the District's own refusal to press ahead with a new prison within the District.

To that end, the legislation I am sponsoring today will accomplish several important and overdue goals. First and foremost, this bill will prohibit the District Government from constructing any new prison facilities—be they temporary or permanent—at the Lorton complex. This measure will require the District to look instead to its own property, within its own limits, for solutions to prison crises.

Next, this bill will establish strict timetables for action that should have been taken by District corrections officials long ago. The Mayor of the District has promised that he will construct a new, permanent prison within the city. On this crucial issue, I take the Mayor at his word.

Yet, the city has been notoriously slow in taking the necessary first steps toward prison construction, especially in choosing a site or sites for the new facility. Accordingly, this legislation sets forth specific deadlines for the city to inform Congress of both its choice of a temporary site within the city to handle the inmates it had intended to place at Lorton, as well as a site for construction of a permanent facility, also within the city.

Finally, this legislation will require the Attorney General to continue to accept DC prisoners on an interim basis. I am fully aware that this is not a problem of the Attorney General's making. Indeed, the U.S. Department of Justice has been most forthcoming in attempting to help the District deal with its prison problems.

Still, I remain concerned about the possibility that all of the District's future surplus of prisoners will be concentrated at Lorton Prison in northern Virginia. The situation at Lorton is already extremely volatile. The prison has been plagued by escapes, riots, and similar disturbances in recent months. And we should not fuel the fires there by adding additional prisoners. For that reason, I believe it would be far safer for those inmates to be dispersed throughout the Federal system.

Mr. President, this legislation will set the District on a path toward alleviating its prison crisis and thus increasing the public safety in the Washington metropolitan area. Moreover, it will do so without further burdening the citizens of northern Virginia.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be inserted into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2019

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, the District of Columbia shall not—

(1) construct new prison facilities, either permanent or temporary, at the Lorton prison in Fairfax County, Virginia; or

(2) incarcerate prisoners at the Lorton prison beyond the rated capacity or court-orderd capacity of the Lorton prison.

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than 10 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Mayor of the District of Columbia shall submit to Congress his choice of a site or sites within the District of Columbia for construction of temporary prison facilities for the confinement of District of Columbia Code violators.

(b) not later than 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Mayor of the Distict of Columbia shall submit to Congress his choice of a site or sites within the Distict of Columbia for construction of permanent prison facilities for the confinement of District of Columbia Code violators.

SEC. 3. (a) For a period of one year from the date of enactment of this Act, the Attorney General shall, subject to the provisions of subsection (b), designate Federal prisons as the place of confinement of District of Columbia Code violators when the District has reached its prison capacity at the Lorton prison and the District of Columbia Jail, unless prior to or during that period, the District has established temporary or permanent facilities within the District of Columbia for confinement of those prisoners.

(b) The requirement that the Attorney General designate Federal prisons as the place of confinement of District of Columbia Code violators provided in subsection (a) shall be void in the event that the District of Columbia fails to comply with the provisons of section 2.

SEC. 4. The District of Columbia shall not engage in early release or early parole of violent offenders as a means of alleviating problems of prison overcrowding.

S.J. Res. 258. Joint resolution designating "Baltic Freedom Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today, along with the bipartisan support of 26 cosponsors, I am introducing a joint resolution calling for the declaration of June 14, 1986, as Baltic Freedom Day. A companion bill is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman CARNEY of New York.

With this resolution, the Congress focuses the attention of the world on the plight of the Baltic people and demonstrates solidarity with them in their continuing struggle for freedom.

This year, June 14 will mark the 46th year of Soviet subjugation of the Baltic States. Despite the steady erosion of the national identities of the people of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia over the past four and a half decades, their determination to regain their lost freedoms has not been weakened.

The people of these captive nations know what it means to be free. During their short period of independence—1918-40—their nations flourished both culturally and economically.

Through hard work and raw determination, the Baltic people ushered in an energetic period of reawakening. In Latvia, education blossomed, and Estonia became the first nation in the world to grant cultural autonomy to all of its minority citizens through Government-supported ethnic schools, theaters, and libraries. In Lithuania, Government-supported cultural programs unfolded and Lithuanians achieved a legacy of being the most culturally sophisticated minority in the Soviet Union. Literature and art based on a rich folk tradition thrived, making this a very proud and memorable era. The energies and talents of the Baltic people extended beyond their own borders, and they made significant contributions to the welfare and culture of Europe.

Before their presence could truly be felt, however, the tiny nations of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia were absorbed by the Soviet Union, and their citizens stripped of their most basic human rights.

Today, the brutal Soviet policy of russification, which seeks to eliminate every vestige of the unique cultures and religious traditions of the Baltic peoples, stands in sharp contrast to the cultural blossoming which occurred during independence. Despite the ongoing persecution of those who demonstrate their abhorrence of this policy, the Baltic people continue to defy the efforts of their Soviet occupiers to control them.

It is the memory of independence and prosperity once enjoyed, and the desire to transform the dream of freedom into reality that inspires these brave Baltic people to continue their fight. The past 46 years have shown that all the military strength of the Soviet Union can never succeed in crushing the spirit and the drive for freedom of the Baltic people.

American support for the return of freedom to the Baltic nations is an important demonstration of our belief in the right of self-determination for all people in all nations of the world. Just as the South African policy of apartheid, which denies basic rights to a majority of its citizens, is unacceptable, so too is the continuing Soviet occupation of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia. We must not permit the past 46 years of Soviet repression in those nations to dull our sensitivity to the injustices imposed upon the Baltic people.

Expressions of support for the aspirations of the citizens of the captive nations from the free world give hope to those still fighting to secure their fundamental human rights. Prompt Senate approval of this resolution will demonstrate the solidarity of the American people with the Baltic people in their continuing struggle for freedom.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

SALE OF CONSOLIDATED RAIL CORPORATION

DECONCINI AMENDMENT NO. 1436

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. DECONCINI submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 638) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes; as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

SEC. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) The government and people of the United States have a longstanding friendship with the Philippines based on democratic principles and institutions;

(2) The United States has a strategic interest in the preservation of two military bases in the Philippines for the security of the Pacific region;

(3) The current unrest in the Philippines threatens to undermine the continuation of a stable, democratic government in that nation;

(4) Congress has stated that restoration of democratic institutions in the Philippines is the most effective means of defeating the proliferating communist insurgency;

(5) President Marcos has announced his intention that presidential elections be held within the Philippines to end speculation by foreign nations as to his popular support;

(6) Officials of the Government of the Philippines as well as leaders of the opposition have indicated their willingness to cooperate with a delegation of international observers whose purpose would be to verify the openness and fairness of the election;

(7) President Marcos has stated that it would be impossible "in a free society" to control or keep out observers and there would be no attempt to prevent any such group from entering the Philippines to monitor the election;

(8) A decision to limit access to polling places by international observers would seriously impair the ability of observer teams to verify the fairness and validity of the elections and could jeopardize continued United States economic assistance to that nation; and

(9) It has been the experience that international observers to the elections of 1982 and 1984 in El Salvador and more recently, Guatemala, were not limited access to polling places and greatly increased the fairness and credibility of those elections.

(b) The Senate hereby—

(1) Reaffirms its support for genuine, free, and fair elections in the Philippines scheduled for February 7, 1986;

(2) Stresses the importance of the presence of international observers at such elections;

(3) Urges the Philippine Government to permit clear access to the polling places for such international observers; and

(4) Intends to consider the manner in which Philippine elections are conducted in determining future aid requests.

DANFORTH AMENDMENT NO. 1437

Mr. DANFORTH proposed an amendment to the bill S. 638, supra; as follows:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.) provided for an orderly return of Conrail freight service to the private sector;

(2) the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 were successful in removing Conrail's obligations beyond railroad freight service and in otherwise preparing Conrail for an orderly return to the private sector;

(3) acting under section 403 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 763), the Board of Directors of the United States Railway Association twice found Conrail to be a profitable corporation;

(4) acting under section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761), the Secretary engaged an investment banker and arranged, through open competitive bidding and negotiation, to sell the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail;

(5) the Secretary's Plan for the sale of Conrail provides for sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation;

(6) the Secretary found that sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation best meets the sale criteria of (A) leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, (B) preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves, and (C) maximizing return to the Federal Government consistent with the criteria specified in clauses (A) and (B);

(7) amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 701 et seq.) and related laws are needed to permit the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation and to permit cancellation of the interest of the United States in Conrail debt and preferred stock; and

(8) the Secretary's Plan satisfies the requirements of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, including the intent, goals, and objectives relating to the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the requirements of section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(e)).

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. It is therefore declared to be the purpose of the Congress in this Act to return Conrail to the private sector by directing and facilitating implementation of the Secretary's Plan for the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. (a) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term—

(1) "Conrail" means the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(2) "Definitive Agreements" means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph (4)(A);

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Transportation; and

(4) "Secretary's Plan" means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestitures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E.

(b) Section 102 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 702) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6) through (18) as paragraphs (7) through (19), and paragraphs (19) through (21) as paragraphs (21) through (23), respectively;

(2) by inserting after paragraph (5) the following paragraph:

"(6) 'Definitive Agreements' means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph (20)(A);"; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (19), as so redesignated, the following paragraph:

"(20) 'Secretary's Plan' means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestitures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E;".

(c) Section 1135(a) of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1104(a)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) as paragraphs (7), (8), and (10), respectively;

(2) by inserting after paragraph (5) the following paragraph:

"(6) 'Definitive Agreements' means any and all agreements existing or to be developed between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation, including all representations and warranties made therein, to implement the Memorandum of Intent described in paragraph (9)(A);"; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (8), as so redesignated, the following paragraph:

"(9) 'Secretary's Plan' means (A) the Memorandum of Intent between the United States and Norfolk Southern Corporation signed February 8, 1985, and (B) the divestitures by the Norfolk Southern Corporation of certain rail tracks, rights, and facilities, and any transactions or agreements related or incidental to such divestitures, in connection with the implementation of attachment A to the letter from the Department of Justice attached to the Memorandum of Intent as exhibit E;".

"(20) section 715 of this Act, as amended by the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985.".

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

SEC. 104. (a) Section 401(a)(3) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)(3)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Secretary is authorized and directed to implement the Secretary's Plan, in accordance with paragraph (4) of this subsection. Such implementation of the Secretary's Plan and the coordinated operation of the Corporation's properties with those of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliates as a single rail system is deemed approved by the Commission under chapter 113 of title 49, United States Code.".

(b) Section 401(a) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(4) The Secretary shall implement the Secretary's Plan by negotiating, executing, delivering, and performing the Definitive Agreements, which shall conform to the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act. The Secretary shall, 45 calendar days before the date on which the Secretary anticipates that the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation will be sold to Norfolk Southern Corporation, transmit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a notification of any alteration from the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act which will be made in the Definitive Agreements. After the date of such sale, the Secretary shall transmit to such Committees notification of any intent to waive compliance with any substantive covenant, agreement or obligation contained in the Definitive Agreements, and the Secretary may not waive such compliance until a period of 45 calendar days has expired after the date of such transmittal.

"(5) The Secretary shall not transfer the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation except concurrently with a divestiture by Norfolk Southern Corporation of rail assets and rights approved by the Attorney General.

"(6) The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation shall be deemed to be consummated at the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.".

RAILROAD PURCHASERS AND OFFER FOR SALE OF SHARES TO EMPLOYEES

SEC. 105. Subsections (d) and (e) of section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(d) and (e)) are repealed.

CANCELLATION OF DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

SEC. 106. Section 402 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 762) is amended to read as follows:

"DEBT AND PREFERRED STOCK

"SEC. 402. (a) RECAPITALIZATION.—In connection with the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation under section 401 of this Act, and consistent with the Secretary's Plan, the Secretary may take all action necessary to cause the Corporation to be recapitalized such that the interest of the United States, or any agent or instrumentality thereof, and all other commitments or obligations of the Corporation to the United States or any agent or instrumentality thereof arising out of such interest, in any debt (including accrued interest and contingent interest thereon) and preferred stock (including accrued and unpaid dividends thereon) of the Corporation shall be cancelled or retired, and contributed to the capital of the Corporation. The Secretary shall cause the recapitalization authorized by this section to be effective as of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation.

"(b) BREACH OF REPRESENTATIONS.—(1) Norfolk Southern Corporation or any successor corporation thereto may bring suit for any breach of representations contained in paragraph 6(e) of the Memorandum of Intent described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act (hereinafter referred to as the 'Representations') in the United States Claims Court or a district court of the United States. If such an action is brought, the Claims Court or district court shall determine the amount by which the United States income tax (including interest and penalties whether or not such penalties are assessed as a tax under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) assessable against the Corporation or against Norfolk Southern Corporation for any year exceeds the amount of such tax which would have been assessable for such year had such Representations not been breached (hereinafter referred to as the 'Offset Amount').

"(2) The Representations shall be considered breached and Norfolk Southern Corporation shall be entitled to bring suit upon the first occurrence of any of the following that is inconsistent with the Representations: (A) the issuance by the Internal Revenue Service of a statutory notice of deficiency (90-day letter), (B) the assessment of the United States income tax, or (C) any claim by the United States in a suit or other judicial proceeding against Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation.

"(3) The right to bring suit pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any waiting period applicable to tax proceedings or to any requirements for payment of any tax as a condition to instituting any suit based on a breach of the Representations.

"(4) Any judgment for money damages relating to breach of the Representations shall only be awarded as an offset in any court or administrative proceeding against the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both, to which such breach relates; except that if any such tax liability resulting from such breach has been paid, the judgment shall to that extent be an offset against any United States income tax liability of the Norfolk Southern Corporation or the Corporation, or both. If any portion of the tax resulting from a breach of the Representations has been paid, then the Offset Amount shall include interest on such payment from the date paid at the rate from time to time specified in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for interest payable on refund claims.

"(5) It shall not be a defense to an action brought under this section that Norfolk Southern Corporation knew, or should have known, of the falsity of the Representations or that there exists no carryover basis procedure as contemplated by the last sentence of the Representations.

"(6) For purposes of this section, tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation shall include the tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation and its affiliated group, within the meaning of section 1504 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.".

APPLICABILITY OF CERTAIN LAWS TO SALE OF CONRAIL

SEC. 107. Section 408 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 768) is amended—

(1) by repealing subsection (b);

(2) by amending subsection (c) by striking "No transfer" and all that follows through "subject to" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105), the Secretary's Plan and the Definitive Agreements and their negotiation, execution, and implementation shall not be subject to administrative or"; and

(3) by adding at the end of subsection (c) the following sentence: "The issuance in private placement of notes or other securities in accordance with exhibit B to the Memorandum of Intent (described in section 102(20)(A) of this Act) in the Secretary's Plan shall not be subject to the provisions of subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code.".

"PROTECTION AFTER SALE

"SEC. 715. After consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation pursuant to the Secretary's Plan, any employee of Norfolk Southern Corporation, the Corporation, any rail affiliate of either company, and any transferee of the rail tracks, rights, and facilities divested in accordance with the Secretary's Plan, who is adversely affected in his employment by the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall receive from his employer protection under the labor protective conditions set forth in New York Dock Railway—Control—Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal (354 ICC 399 (1978), modified upon further consideration, 360 ICC 60 (1979)). The arbitration provisions of section 4 of New York Dock shall apply to the formation of any implementing agreements that may be necessary in connection with the implementation of the Secretary's Plan, including any resulting coordinations.".

(2) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 714 the following item:

"Sec. 715. Protection after sale.".

PREFERENTIAL HIRING

SEC. 109. Section 703 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797b) is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c); and

(2) by inserting immediately after subsection (a) the following subsection:

"(b) IMPLEMENTATION OF SECRETARY'S PLAN.—Any employee of any railroad who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for a vacancy for which he is qualified on any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, except where such vacancy is covered by (1) an affirmative action plan, or a hiring plan designated to eliminate discrimination, that is required by Federal or State statute, regulation, or Executive order, or by the order of a Federal court or agency, or (2) a permissible voluntary affirmative action plan. For purposes of this subsection, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

CROSS CRAFT EMPLOYMENT

SEC. 110. (a) Title VII of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 797 et seq.) is amended by inserting immediately after section 703 the following section:

"SEC. 703A. Any employee of Norfolk and Western Railway Company, Southern Railway Company, or the Corporation who is deprived of employment as a result of the implementation of the Secretary's Plan shall have the first right of hire for any vacancy for which such employee is qualified at the entry level of any Norfolk Southern Corporation rail subsidiary, without regard to craft or class or the provisions of section 703 of this Act. Such employee shall retain his seniority rights to return to his original craft or class whenever a vacancy occurs. For purposes of this section, a railroad shall not be considered to be hiring new employees when it recalls any of its own furloughed employees.".

(b) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 703 the following item:

"Sec. 703A. Cross craft employment.".

Subtitle B—Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 Amendments

SPECIAL COURT JURISDICTION

SEC. 121. (a) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended—

(1) by inserting "or the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985" immediately after "subtitle" wherever it appears;

(2) in subsection (a), by striking "or" at the end of paragraph (3), by striking the period at the end of paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(5) brought by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(6) brought by Norfolk Southern Corporation seeking to enforce the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements;

"(7) brought by a party who filed a complaint with the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section, and who is aggrieved by (A) a determination of the Secretary under paragraph (1) of such subsection that the party has not suffered direct economic injury, or (B) a decision of the Secretary under paragraph (2) of such subsection that a covenant has not been violated;

"(8) brought by a party which is a signatory to an ancillary agreement entered into in accordance with the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements and which is seeking to enforce such ancillary agreement; or

"(9) brought to determine the value of the interest of the employee stock ownership plan and related trusts, or of the beneficiaries thereof, in the preferred stock of the Conrail Equity Corporation.

For purposes of any action brought under paragraph (5) of this subsection, a violation of any covenant contained in the Secretary's Plan or the Definitive Agreements shall be deemed to constitute immediate and irreparable harm for purposes of awarding injunctive relief to the United States.".

(b) Section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(e)(1) Any party who suffers direct economic injury as a result of an alleged violation of a covenant contained in the Definitive Agreements may file a complaint with the Secretary seeking enforcement of such covenant. If the Secretary determines that the complainant has demonstrated to the Secretary that it has suffered direct economic injury, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint.

"(2) If the Secretary decides to investigate a complaint under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall give reasonable notice of such decision to investigate to the alleged violator of such covenant and the complainant, and shall make a final decision on such complaint within 60 days after the date on which it was filed.

"(3) If the Secretary finds that (A) the covenant in question has been violated, and (B) the complainant suffered direct economic injury as a result of such violation, the Secretary shall enter an order directing the violator of such covenant to comply with such covenant.

"(4) On appeal, any decision by the Secretary under this subsection shall be upheld, unless such decision is found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.".

APPLICABILITY OF OTHER LAWS

SEC. 122. Section 1168(a) of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1116(a)) is amended by striking "service transfers" and inserting in lieu thereof "sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail or transfer of the rail properties and freight service responsibilities of Conrail".

Subtitle C—Employee Stock Ownership Plan

RESPONSIBILITY OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN FIDUCIARIES

SEC. 131. (a) Section 216(f)(8)(A) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)(8)(A)) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" at the end of clause (ii);

(2) by striking the period at the end of clause (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following clause:

"(iv) for or in connection with any action taken to implement the Secretary's Plan, including any sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition of the plan and related trust assets, or the assets of Conrail Equity Corporation, in connection with implementation of the Secretary's Plan and any determination of the terms on which any such sale, exchange, valuation, or disposition is effected.".

QUALIFICATION, REVIEW, AND VALUATION OF EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLANS

SEC. 132. Section 216(f) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 726(f)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(11) The employee stock ownership plans of the Corporation and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall be deemed to meet the qualification requirements of sections 401 and 501, respectively, of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, notwithstanding (A) that such plans may not meet the requirements of section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, or (B) that participants in such plans may be entitled to withdraw a portion of the shares allocated to their accounts prior to the expiration of the period generally imposed by the Internal Revenue Service for qualified plans. Such qualification shall relate only to the contributions, allocations, and withdrawals of shares provided for in the Secretary's Plan with respect to the plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan. Such contributions and allocations shall in no event be treated as having exceeded the maximum annual addition permitted under section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (but not for purposes of applying section 404(j) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) for purposes of calculating any limitation under section 415 with respect to contributions and allocations not described in the Secretary's Plan, including contributions and allocations to plans and related trusts of the Corporation and any affiliated corporation. The continued qualification of such plans with respect to all other contributions, allocations, and withdrawals shall be subject to all provisions of existing law, as amended from time to time. No inference shall be drawn from this paragraph as to whether an amount is a contribution deductible under section 404 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 rather than a non-deductible capital expenditure.

"(12) Except as provided in section 1152 of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1105), the issuance and sale or contribution of securities by Norfolk Southern Corporation to fulfill arrangements with the Corporation's employees in implementing the Secretary's Plan and the distribution of shares from the Corporation's employee stock ownership plans and related trusts maintained, amended, or adopted in implementing the Secretary's Plan shall not be subject to the registration and prospectus delivery requirements of the Securities Act of 1933, any approval requirement under subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, or the laws of any State with respect to the issuance and sale of securities.".

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

COMMON CARRIER STATUS OF CONRAIL AFTER SALE

SEC. 301. (a) Conrail's status as a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code, shall not be affected by virtue of sale of the interest of the United States in Conrail's common stock. Purchase of Conrail stock shall not alone be the basis of a determination that the acquiring entity has become a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code.

(b) The Definitive Agreements shall contain a binding commitment by Norfolk Southern Corporation to continue to operate Conrail in full compliance with the provisions of section 10731(e) of title 49, United States Code.

CONSUMMATION OF SALE

SEC. 302. The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail shall be deemed to be consummated on the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 303. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall affect—

(1) Conrail's obligation to carry out its transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements, in accordance with their terms; and

(2) the obligation of any transferee of divested assets to carry out transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements to which such assets are subject, in accordance with their terms.

(b) If a divestiture carried out pursuant to the Secretary's Plan precludes Conrail from providing a transportation service for which it has contracted without a right of termination that may be exercised in the event of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the divestiture will result in a change or modification in the movement of the traffic involved, the transferee of the divested rights and properties and Conrail shall provide the contracted-for service on terms and conditions which, to the maximum extent possible, conform to the terms and conditions in the contract.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT OF COMPLIANCE

SEC. 304. The Secretary shall, no later than January 31 of each year, submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a report setting forth each certificate which Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail provided to the Secretary, during the preceding year, certifying compliance with the covenants contained in the Definitive Agreements.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 305. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 306. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the provisions of and amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Sections 108(a), 201 and 202 of this Act shall take effect on the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

(c) Any provision of this Act which, pursuant to Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, provides for raising revenue shall only be effective upon the enactment into law of a bill which has originated in the House of Representatives enacting such provision.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 103 — COMMENDING BISHOP DESMOND TUTU FOR HIS WORK IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. HART (for himself and Mr. MATHIAS) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 103

Whereas Desmond Tutu has committed himself to nonviolent change in South Africa;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has advocated direct dialogue between blacks and whites and as the central need for the future of South Africa;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has personally rescued victims of mob violence from certain injury or death at great risk to himself;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has advocated economic sanctions against South Africa as a means to peacefully encourage Pretoria to dismantle the apartheid system of racial separation;

Whereas Desmond Tutu has repeatedly turned to the United States for assistance in his quest for peaceful change in his native country, and

Whereas Desmond Tutu received the 1984 Nobel Peace Prize for his moral leadership in South Africa, Now, therefore, be it

Resloved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress commends Bishop Desmond Tutu for his courageous work for peace and freedom in South Africa, and that Congress encourages all South Africans to heed Bishop Tutu's call for a peaceful end to apartheid.

SENATE RESOLUTION 297—CALLING FOR AN INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON TERRORISM

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

S. RES. 297

Whereas, in recent years, numerous civilized nations and their citizens have increasingly suffered needless death and destruction at the hands of terrorists; and

Whereas, individual nations and citizens have largely been unable to combat and defend against these reckless, wanton acts of terrorism on land, at sea and in the air; and

Whereas, efforts to develop a firm, effective allied response to the growing threat of terrorism have met with failure, inaction and disagreement; and

Whereas, cooperative, organized, global efforts have in the past succeeded in addressing and resolving problems of common concern to the international community; and

Whereas, it is imperative that civilized nations come together to reach agreement on international arrangements for dealing with terrorism in a civilized way: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America to urge that the President of the United States, in cooperation with other concerned nations of the world, take immediate steps to convene an International Congress on Terrorism with the objective of finding the ways and means for nations to act in concert responsibly and effectively to bring an end to terrorism once and for all.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the President of the United States take immediate steps to convene an International Congress on Terrorism.

Over the past several years, the international community has witnessed a dramatic rise in terrorist activity. Much has been said about how nations should respond to these acts. Unfortunately, Mr. President, a great deal of discussion has left the civilized world with little in terms of an organized, effective means of bringing a halt to random violence against innocent people. I believe the creation of an appropriate forum for the orderly examination of various proposals for dealing with terrorism has real merit.

We do not lack for ideas, Mr. President, I know the administration is continuously examining the options in an effort to save lives, apprehend and bring to justice those responsible for terrorism, and create defenses against future incidents. I wholeheartedly support these efforts. Other nations have come up with ideas as well. On Tuesday of this week the Austrian Government announced visa restrictions on Arab diplomatic passports, which are often issued to terrorist organizations. British Prime Minister Thatcher has, on several occasions, stressed the need for greater international cooperation if international terrorism is to be combated effectively.

An International Congress on Terrorism would allow the ideas of every participating nation to be considered by the community as a whole. We need action, Mr. President. We have learned through several painful episodes that we cannot successfully put a stop to terrorism by acting alone. As long as civilized nations pursue random, disorganized policies against terrorism, policies that sometimes create discord among countries that should be united with a common purpose and common goal, innocent people will suffer, and terrrorists will become more daring and more destructive.

The world desperately needs a coordinated antiterrorism effort, Mr. President. It's impossible to coordinate an effective defense when nations respond to assassinations, bombings, kidnapings, and hijackings on an incident-by-incident basis. The bombings in Rome and Vienna have left Western allies arguing about the value of economic sanctions. If nothing changes in our anti-terrorism policies, the next incident will usher in more arguments and more confusion. Most of all, however, it may usher in another round of inaction.

To gain the upper hand against terrorism, our defenses must be in place before the violence occurs. Policies must be more than simply reactions to an incident, each reaction is different depending on the country. Policy needs to be made cooperatively. Ideas need to be discussed and shared. I cannot believe that the common ground does not exist for the successful development of a sound, cooperative antiterrorism policy. We simply must put in place an international arrangement that will allow concerned nations to deal with terrorism in a civilized, responsible and effective way.

A consortium of nations, deliberating together, can, it seems to me, provide the world with a rational, cooperative means of coping with terrorism. Working together, we can identify terrorists, locate them, and bring them to justice in an appropriate way in the appropriate place of jurisdiction. We can determine how and whether we should retaliate in specific ways. We could consider the effectiveness of rewards. We could develop joint treaties of extradition aimed directly at terrorists.

I'm not saying I have all the answers. What I am saying is that an International Congress on Terrorism might just give us a solution that the international community can accept and implement. It is becoming more obvious every day that international discussions on terrorism need higher priority and higher visibility. The common threat of terrorism deserves mutual consideration at the highest governmental levels. I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this resolution.

SENATE RESOLUTION 298—COMMEMORATING THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE U.S. DISABLED SKI TEAM

Mr. WEICKER (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. KERRY, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. SIMON) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

S. RES. 298

Whereas the United States Disabled Ski Team is a very special group of fine athletes who have displayed the courage, dedication, and perseverance needed to qualify for competition on a national and international level;

Whereas the commitment and determination exhibited by these superior athletes is an inspiration to all people;

Whereas the United States Disabled Ski Team will travel to Salen, Sweden, to represent the United States in international competition;

Whereas the United States Disabled Ski Team has exhibited outstanding performance and has promoted full participation of disabled persons in athletic competition; and

Whereas the United States Disabled Ski Team has been instrumental in changing perceptions of society about persons with disabilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) commends the achievements of the United States Disabled Ski Team; and

(2) encourages and supports the United States Disabled Ski Team in the competition at the 1986 World Disabled Ski Championships to be held in Salen, Sweden, on April 6 through April 17, 1986.

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, our Nation's 36 million disabled Americans frequently face attitudinal barriers which impede their full participation in society. Yet these individuals continue to make significant efforts to enhance public awareness of their abilities, and to excel in spite of the various obstacles which confront them. A notable example of this is the U.S. Disabled Ski Team, comprised on 60 A team and 13 B team members who have qualified both at regional and national levels. The courage, strength and determination exhibited by these fine athletes is an inspiration to us all.

Too often, emphasis is placed on the limitations of disabled persons and it is high time we recognized outstanding performances such as those displayed by this fine group of athletes.

This year, on April 6-17, the U.S. Disabled Ski Team will be competing at the World Disabled Ski Championships in Salen, Sweden. Among the participants in this event will be my nephew, Mark Godfrey, who won first place in the 1985 Handicapped Nationals competition. The demands and rigors of competing in this championship are testimony to his and every participant's extraordinary achievements. These individuals have displayed the courage, dedication, and perseverance needed to qualify for this elite competition. The resolution I am introducing today recognizes the outstanding accomplishments of the following athletes:

TEAM A

Paul Dibello, Jack Benedick, Blaine Albertson, Chuck Weed, Bill Hovanic, Dave Keifer, Mark Godfrey, Dan Ashbaugh, Jim Tulberg, and Greg Manino.

Don Garcia, Tom Gall, Matt Kut, Reed Robinson, Bud Hillman, Bill Henry, Rick Riley, Roanne Kuenzler, Jill Skidmore, and Rick Isom.

Larry Gebhart, Peter Axelson, Kirk Parkhurst, Rick Ruscio, Patti Werner, Martha Hill, Diana Golden, Lana Jo Chapin, Kathy Poohachoff, and Rod Hernley.

Bill Latimer, David Jamison, Dan Pufpaff, Brad Hudiberg, Mary Lee Atkins, Carmela Cantisani, Jim Chlalsant, Barbara Cutler, Cara Dunne, and Greg Evangelatos.

Petra Gibbons, Maria Hansen, Sheila Holzworth, Brian Hubbard, Shelly Keck, Barbara Lewis, Ray Marshall, Pat McCluen, Cristine Montgomery, and John Novotny.

Laura Oftedahl, Joe Raineri, Ron Roe, Brian Santos, Allan Schlank, Billie Ruth Schlank, Joe Walsh, Sandra Wilmot, Steve Young, and John Bates.

TEAM B

Nancy Meyer, Bob Emerson, Ted Kennedy, Jr., Anita Kocab, Michael Anthony, Cathy Gentile, Brent Neddo, Ken Larsen, John Calhoon, Sarah Doherty, Julie Steadman, Andy Gerster, and Chuck Johnson.

These hardworking young people deserve commendation for their unique contribution to the United States and the world. All of these athletes are winners and serve as role models for all Americans seeking to participate in athletics.

The National Handicapped Sports & Recreation Association as well as the United States Association of Blind Athletes should indeed be commended for organizing and supporting our U.S. Disabled Ski Team. Their efforts to provide and promote sports and recreation for our handicapped citizens enrich the lives of thousands of individuals with disabilities each year.

I hope my colleagues will join me in offering support and congratulations to all of the members of the 1986 U.S. Disabled Ski Team for their past and present extraordinary performance. Mr. President, I am pleased to submit this resolution expressing the Senate's support of the 73 members of this elite team.●

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING, AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, January 23, 1986, in order to conduct a hearing on the nominations of Wayne D. Angell, and Manuel H. Johnson, to be members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE GHOSTS OF DEFICIT FOREVER

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, my friend and colleague, the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee [Mr. DOMENICI] recently authored a timely and insightful "tale" concerning Federal budget deficit, past, present, and future. His writing recounts missed opportunities in the past and warns of the dangers of missing whatever opportunities remain to us in the critical days soon to come.

Senator DOMENICI's narrative does hold out some hope for a happy ending to his Dickensian story—but only if there is a long-overdue change of heart in the Congress and the administration. It behooves us all to heed his grave warning, lest we bring upon ourselves the tragedy we otherwise invite.

I ask that Senator DOMENICI's article, as it appeared in the Washington Post of January 21, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 21, 1986]

THE GHOSTS OF DEFICIT FOREVER

In less than three weeks the automatic spending cuts of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will be triggered unless a court challenge to the new law succeeds. The papers will be filled with the confusion of federal agencies trying to fulfill the law and the outrage of those program beneficiaries who see their activities threatened. Before the coming public panic consumes us, we should review where we are, how we got here, and where we are likely to end up in our struggle with the deficit.

As a prelude, I should note that I am extremely optimistic about the nation's economic potential. We have solved problems of the highest order. We have created millions of job for "Baby Boom" workers. We have embarked on a new era of entrepreneurship and rising per-capita incomes. A leanness and quickness characterizes the private sector.

The only cloud on the horizon, and a cloud of mammoth proportions in my view, is the inability of the government to control deficits. The extraordinary deficits we now face symbolize this impotence and also hold the substantive prospect of plunging the nation into an unprecedented economic recession—ironically, one that could well be avoided. The deficit, simply put, remains the foremost policy and political problem confronting the nation. If I may borrow from Dickens, I will call upon three ghosts to lead us on our budget odyssey: the ghosts of budget past, present and yet to come.

1. BUDGETS PAST

Our Ghost of Budgets Past conjures up a scene of candidate Ronald Reagan speaking in Chicago in September 1980. He explains in some detail his four-part plan for the economy and the federal budget: (1) a 10 percent across-the-board tax cut for individuals in each of the next three years to increase take-home pay and the dismal national savings rate; (2) major changes in the corporate tax code aimed at reviving the staggering American economy; (3) an all-out attack on waste, fraud and abuse in government spending, coupled with a permanent shrinking of the government's programs, directed at saving tens of billions of dollars a year; and (4) a major increase in defense spending.

The president-to-be calmly explains that the increase in defense spending will be "affordable," because his other policies will yield a combination of new revenues to the government (from economic growth) and less domestic spending (from a shrinking of federal domestic programs).

Our ghost next takes us to March 10, 1981. The president releases the details of his 1982 budget, which replaces the budget of former president Jimmy Carter. The budget is truly revolutionary. It calls for domestic spending cuts in fiscal year 1982 alone of $67 billion. Between FY 1981 and FY 1986, the domestic cuts would total $475 billion.

On top of unprecedented domestic spending restraint, the president fulfills his second major campaign promise by requesting the largest single defense increase in the nation's history. For FY 1982, this increase would reach nearly $29 billion and would push defense spending from the FY 1980 level of $146 billion to $226 billion in just two years—an increase of 55 percent.

The budget also keeps the president's promise on taxes. It requests individual and corporate tax cuts of $54 billion in FY 1982 and $718 billion through FY 1986.

Above all, our ghost points to the line in the president's budget that shows that if all his policies were fully implemented, the federal budget would be balanced by FY 1984 and would be running a $28 billion surplus by 1986.

Two major points overlooked by many in that first, fateful budget will come back to haunt the nation. First, almost $75 billion in domestic cuts necessary for achieving a balanced budget in 1984 are not itemized and "will be identified later." Second, the economic projections underlying the budget assume real growth in the economy almost double the historical average for the past 12 years (4.6 percent projected compared to 2.5 percent actual for the 1972-84 time frame).

Finally, our Ghost of Budgets Past takes us to the private conference room of the Senate majority leader, Howard Baker, in early spring of 1981. In the room for an extraordinary meeting is the president, who has left the White House and journeyed to the Hill. The president leans across the table and tells the 12 Republican members of the Senate Budget Committee that he will not support a bipartisan attempt in that committee to freeze cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security recipients as part of a deficit-reduction plan. He asks them to join his opposing effort. In front of the senators is a sheet showing savings from a one-year freeze on the COLAs—$88 billion over five years, and more than $24 billion in the year 1986 alone.

The senators relent. They go back to committee and vote against the move to freeze COLAs. Social Security, although larger than all domestic non-entitlement spending programs put together, is protected in future budget battles; it comprises almost 25 percent of the non-interest spending in the federal budget.

2. BUDGETS PRESENT

Our Ghost of Budgets Present arrives, looking weary and battered. He has watched three years of congressional deadlock; the deficits for the first four years of the Reagan administration have amounted to more than all the deficits accumulated by all other presidents in the nation's lifetime. America is amassing debt—corporate, individual and governmental—at a record pace.

Yet, no perceptible crisis is at hand. Unemployment has subsided below the 7 percent mark; inflation and interest rates are down and dropping further; the economy is perking along at about the historical average growth; 2.5 to 3 percent annually. Everyone thinks the deficit may be a problem, but the political will to tackle it head-on is fading. The short-term pain of policies that would really cut deficits overwhelms the short-term gain of voting to retain Congress' favorite programs.

Our Ghost of Budgets Present reveals an internal congressional staff memo showing that despite public displays of budget-cutting enthusiasm, Congress has allowed large spending increases since FY 1980: an increase of $132 billion (99 percent) in national defense; $169 billion in new spending for domestic entitlement programs (an increase of 60 percent), driven by new Social Security increases; and an additional $26 billion in domestic, discretionary spending (a 17 percent hike).

It turns out that many of the "cuts" were measured from baselines that assumed growth, so even with a cut there was frequently an actual increase in dollars. The memo also shows that revenues have dropped off from those original FY 1982 presidential projections by about $150 billion in FY 1986. Moreover, the gross national product forecast that FY 1982 budget fell short of reality by $2.4 trillion for FY 1982-86! Almost nothing is "affordable" anymore, in the sense that word was used way back in September 1980.

Even worse, the restraint in spending that has occurred has spared programs that stress present consumption (pensions are a prime example) and hampered programs that stress investment in the future (research in nondefense scientific areas, basic physical infrastructure, education).

Interest payments on this debt are $200 billion annually and are the fastest growing element of federal spending. This means that America cannot make the basic commitment to the future that needs to be made in order to ensure the unparalleled prosperity to which all other indicators point.

We now move to February 1985. The president has emerged from his reelection campaign with one of the most overwhelming victories in America's history. Undeterred deficit-fighters in the administration and in Congress conspire to make one last fight to get deficits under control.

The president's budget asks once again for large domestic spending cuts, $180 billion over three years, with the elimination of more than a dozen major domestic programs as the centerpiece of the plan. The budget also asks for a $30 billion increase in defense spending for FY 1986 alone, and rejects tax increases. It projects a deficit of $144 billion in FY 1988, twice as high as any deficit in the non-Reagan era, but a substantial move toward what economists are now calling "structural budget balance."

The ghost now takes us to a dramatic moment. It is May 9, well past midnight. The Senate has concluded debate on an unprecedented deficit reduction package, incorporating Social Security COLA freezes and eliminating several programs. It not only will meet the president's deficit reduction goal in FY 1986, it will yield substantially lower deficit by FY 1988.

The vote stands at 49-48 against the proposal. Sen. Pete Wilson of California arrives from a hospital, where he underwent emergency appendectomy surgery earlier. Against doctors' recommendations, he has come to the Senate in a wheechair, an intravenous tube in his arm, to vote. He votes for the proposal. With the vote 49-49, Vice President George Bush, in his capacity as president of the Senate, votes for it. It passes, 50-49.

Although only a few suspect it at the time, that moment in the Senate chamber will be the high point for deficit cutting for the year. Our Ghost of Budgets Present speeds over a troubled summer. The budget finally hammered out between House and Senate falls far short of the Senate-passed version, in large part because the president finally opposes any change in Social Security COLAs. His decision dooms any significant congressional action.

Congress finds it impossible to pass almost any significant bills. Appropriations bills fail to move. Approaching is an autumn vote to extend the federal debt the government has run up. Sens. Gramm, Rudman and Hollings conceive a new deficit-cutting mechanism and attach it to the debt limit bill.

Our ghost now takes us to December 1985. Congress sends the president a farm bill that costs an estimated $50 billion during the next three years, about double what the president requested in his FY 1986 budget of nine months earlier. Congress finds it difficult to comply with even the watered-down budget it passed just four months earlier. Congress staggers through a chaos of short-term continuing appropriations and short-term debt extensions, all of which threaten to shut down the government.

Finally, Congress passes more spending bills, postpones action on a multibillion-dollar deficit reduction measure that the administration threatens to veto, and heads home. The president signs the farm bill into law. He signs all of the spending bills, even though they contain in the aggregate about $40 billion more in domestic spending than he wanted and about $30 billion less for defense. He signs the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill.

Within a fortnight, the Justice Department announces that it will join in attacking the constitutionality of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. The president asks for $4 billion more spending for the Commodity Credit Corporation, sending up his formal request Dec. 23. A year that began with high hopes for deficit reduction fizzles into the winter rain of utter failure. Our Ghost of Budgets Present decides to become a consultant to corporations on the impact of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

3. BUDGETS YET TO COME

Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come offers us a choice. First he takes us to February 1986. The president and Congress have been given the size of the automatic cut order (called a sequester order) mandated by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill for FY 1986. It will take a toal of $11.7 billion from federal outlays, equally split between defense and nondefense programs.

This leaves defense spending in March 1986 about $40 billion less than the president's original request for the year. Nondefense programs will be cut in some cases below last year's level. Senators up for reelection later in the year are besieged by interest groups hit by the sequester.

Yet, this tiny cut pales in comparison to what may be necessary later in the year. Our ghost reveals internal staff documents that show deficits of more than $205 billion in FY 1987, a full $60 billion over the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target of $144 billion. The president presents his budget in early February. It contains a request for $20 billion more in defense spending. It terminates scores of federal programs through direct cuts and privatization ideas. It rejects new taxes. It is kept alive by Congress mostly as a vehicle for repudiation.

Here our ghost presents two scenarios. Sadly, one is more likely than the other. The first scenario is the hope of many of us who voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—a comprehensive compromise on the deficit. It goes like this:

(1) Late March 1986: The president and Congress, unable to come up with a budget for the 1987 year, agree to a "Grand Summit" on the budget. Tax reform plans in the Senate are temporarily laid aside in order to focus on deficit reduction.

(2) April 1986: After weeks of negotiations, Congress and the president agree on a historic deficit-cutting package, including fundamental reforms and reductions in domestic spending, a slowing of the defense buildup, and new revenues.

(3) May and June 1986: Congress passes new laws implementing the "summit" agreement and appropriations bills that are consistent with it.

(4) August 1986: the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget compare their spending updates and conclude that because of presidential and congressional action, the deficit targets of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will indeed be met.

(5) The stock market surges, interest rates drop, and the economy takes off. America soars into the future.

But that scenario may be unlikely for many reasons, so our ghost provides a second scenario, feared by many of us who are familiar with the realities of both the budget and of the politics of 1986:

(1) Late March 1986: The president's budget has been rejected in all quarters. Congress tries to devise its own budget and fails. The president vigorously pursues his tax reform plan in the Senate, opposing any tax increase within the plan.

(2) April and May 1986: the Senate, with 30 members watching primary results that will select their opponents in the November elections, is stymied. Tax reform is stalled, the budget cannot move, and appropriations bills await some resolution of the deadlock. The House puts off action, claiming it cannot act until some initiative is taken by either the president or the Senate.

(3) June 1986: The Supreme Court rules Gramm-Rudman-Hollings constitutional.

(4) Summer 1986: As the stock and bond market and most of the rest of the world watch, America's government is nearly paralyzed. The size of the amounts needed to meet the $144 billion deficit target prohibit action: $30 billion from defense and from nondefense spending translate into as much as $75 billion in budget authority from defense spending (or almost one-fourth of all new spending authority for defense) and about $45 billion from nondefense programs (or about one-third of all new budget authority in the appropriated, discretionary accounts).

(5) September 1986: Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in the amount of a $60 billion sequester goes into effect, causing grave concern among America's Western allies. Most Senate campaigns are now in the post-Labor Day "hot" period. Groups that participate in federal domestic programs, especially teachers and health professionals, descend on Washington in huge numbers. Many state governments begin to lay off large numbers of employees to try to compensate for cuts in state and local aid.

(6) October 1986: One month before the 1986 federal elections, the president decides that his position as commander-in-chief compels him not to sign the final sequester order because it would violate his oath of office to defend the nation's security. Already more than 100 lawsuits have been filed against the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts by potential program beneficiaries.

(7) Mid-October 1986: Congress, faced with an unprecedented uproar, coupled with a plummeting stock and bond market, tries to devise a way to cope with the new crisis. Everyone attempts to find a way to get out from under the new law. Someone suggests that we need a budget forecast that shows a recession sometime in the next four quarters. The person who makes the suggestion is widely applauded as a genius, and soon the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill is suspended.

(8) November 1986: Huge numbers of incumbent senators and representatives of both parties are defeated at the polls, saddled with explaining their position on Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Our Ghost of Budgets Yet to Come concludes his gloomy scenario by revealing an internal staff memo that shows deficits will be $200 billion or more as far as the eye can see.

I conclude this little budget journey through time by saying that the concept behind the second scenario is a real possibility if both the president and Congress refuse to compromise on major deficit-reduction options. The amount of deficit reduction needed to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets, or to make any real dent in deficits regardless of any law, is very large.

If the nation's leadership fails to agree by late spring, especially in a year charged with important elections, the mechanism of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will take effect. To allow that to happen would be a national, and even international, tragedy.●

BONES SEIVERS, AN EXTRAORDINARY CITY ADMINISTRATOR

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the Tennessee Town & City, an official publication of the Tennessee Municipal League, recently included an article and interview with Charles G. Seivers, known as Bones Seivers to his friends, city administrator of Clinton, TN.

The example that Bones Seivers has set in Clinton, TN, is an envy to all city managers. It is especially noteworthy at this time when municipalities are being threatened with staggering Federal budget cuts and their own growing city deficits.

Bones Seivers knows the people of his town and works for their needs. In this interview, he discusses the problems facing municipalities today as well as some of his methods of solution.

Mr. President, I ask that the article and interview by Gael Stahl be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Tennessee Town & City, Dec. 9, 1985]

TML OFFICER: ANY TOWN CAN DO ANYTHING IT WANTS, IF UNITED

(By Gael Stahl)

Charles G. (Bones) Seivers was born in Clinton, TN, and except for three years as a platoon sergeant in the mid-fifties at a Massachusetts NIKE missile site, has always lived there. His father served for 14 years on the board of mayor and aldermen in the fifties.

Seivers' entire family, father, mother, two brothers and their families, two sons and a daughter have stayed around Clinton. His 84 year-old mother and her twin sister have a family restaurant on Market St. They still go in at 3 am six days a week to make the biscuits. His father, Mack (81) and his Dad's sister Willie (75) still play the Hawaiian & steel guitar, fiddle and piano for the Novelty Hawaiians, the original Tennessee Ramblers and have played with Roy Acuff and Archie Campbell. Mack is an active professional sign painter.

A taunt dynamo, Bones (what else could they call a 100-pound six footer?), returned home from the army to go into the insurance business for three years and then to Union Carbide for ten years as a process supervisor in Oak Ridge. In 1962, he ran for alderman and served four two-year terms as alderman and as mayor for one two-year term.

During Seiver's mayoral term Clinton formed a committee of citizens and former mayors, and the part-time mayor and aldermen to see if they needed someone full time. Not suspecting he'd ever fill the position himself. Mayor Seivers recommended that instead of going to a city manager type government which meant changing the town charter, Clinton go with a city administrator (which can be done by ordinance) "because the administrator must report to the mayor and aldermen who are ultimately responsible anyway, and the administrator is actually a manager."

After applicants were interviewed, Seivers was asked to give up his job at Union Carbide. Thus it was that 13 years ago he became Clinton's first and best city administrator, the only one so far. He was hired "for as long as he does a good job."

Last month a grateful board of mayor and aldermen voted to name the new by-pass around Clinton which they struggled 30 years to get, "the Charles G. Seivers Boulevard. (Locals will no doubt call it "Bones Boulevard.")

Seivers is in his third term as a TML board member, served on the committees that formed the TML insurance pool and bond fund and is first Chairman of the latter.

Clinton's claim to fame in the past several years has been in obtaining federal and other monies for streets, water, sewers, community centers, recreation, and housing, for which Clinton, received the TML award for Superior City Achievement last June.

GS: I once overhead someone describe you as one who gets his teeth in something, finds out who can get it done, flies to Washington and perches on the front steps until they give in if only to get rid of you. Is that how you got so much federal and state money for a small town like Clinton?

CS: I've been told I've been . . . persistent.

GS: You been both an elected and an appointed city leader. What's the major differences between them?

CBS: The difference for the administrator, of course, is that he's not responsible for policy decisions. He's making a living at it, not doing it for nothing as a volunteer mayor or alderman.

The mayor and alderman set the policy as to what they want done, pass ordinances and give the administrator the responsibility to carry those policies out. Any town needs to have a full-time administrator or manager and I can assure you he'll more than pay his way if he's doing his job.

GS: So many town boards are split down the middle on such issues as firing their city manager (Hendersonville) and their police force (Ashland City), and putting in a new sewer system (Mt. Juliet). How does Clinton get on so much better and faster?

CBS: Clinton has been lucky. Next week three aldermen are unopposed for re-elect on which is typical. Last year the mayor and three aldermen were unopposed. The staff, the school, utility, planning, recreation, senior citizens, all the various boards, work together to make it a better place.

GS: Surely Clinton is more than "lucky"? Do you know some managerial technique that works better?

CGB: Well, we welcome and encourage public opinion on whatever we're doing and as soon as differences of opinion develop we invite everybody in to serve on various committees to help us narrow down the problems so that by the time we get to the ballgame we're all behind the project rather than haggling and being mad at each other and getting nothing done.

The committees are phenomenal at uniting community support. For example, when we needed a library in the seventies the committee raised $80,000 on the streets.

GS: How did you raise funds for Clinton's many, many capital improvements without raising the property tax in 23 years?

CBS: Instead of going to the property tax we go to the people to tell them what we want to do and what it will cost, and suggest a quarter of a cent increase in the sales tax and hold a referendum. We go to the clubs, direct mail, one on one, and on several occasions they've voted overwhelmingly for it. The Board of mayor and aldermen and all the commissions go out and sell it.

GS: How did you get all the federal money when others couldn't?

CBS: We've worked at it constantly. I may be the front person calling on people but you need total support back home for the 50/50 or 80/20 share. When I get back home I know they will support that project. Our first lady mayor, Cathy Brown, who was an alderwoman for six years prior, is doing a tremendous job. Most of our board have served for over ten years. It takes them to make it work.

And above all, with all the traveling I do, I need a staff second to none from the department heads on down to all our 85 fulltime employees. They work so closely together and help each other when necessary to get the job done. They're generalists, not specialists.

GS: I'm still intrigued that the community pulls so well together. One-on-one talks and direct mailings are too infrequent. What are your media relations like?

CBS: The owner, publisher and editor of the Clinton newspaper for the last 50 years attends every meeting. We never fail to notify him and ask his advice. He's genuinely interested in the community and helps my job because he keeps the public informed. I look to him for guidance and advice.

GS: Is the Sunshine Law a problem for small towns?

CBS: It's a very good thing. Some things can't be discussed openly such as lawsuits, but the law provides for them.

GS: Bones, you're known for spending a lot of time outside Clinton, on boards and committees of a broader influence. In 23 years you've served repeatedly on all the major TML boards and committees and on the National League of Cities Small Cities Advisory Council and Steering Committee. Why? They don't involve your city straight out.

CBS: Let me give you a good example. I chair the Tennessee Municipal Bond Fund. Clinton is going to borrow six million dollars for the water and sewer department and a new school. If through the bond fund we can borrow for 2 or 2.25 points less than we can on the open the market, that means we'll save Clinton at least $100,000 a year over a ten or fifteen year period. That's the effect that this fund will have on all the towns. So for me to play a part in making that work is indeed for Clinton.

GS: Does the town suffer while you are away? Can you afford so much time out of the office?

CBS: The town gives total support. I feel very comfortable about leaving two or three days to work on grants, or the boards I work on, but I also know I have a staff there operating just like I were standing there with them. It's not like having a bunch of fires to put out every time I get back to town.

GS: How has your work with TML benefitted Clinton?

CBS: For one, the legislative process. You know how tiring that is and of course you have Joe Sweat, Ed Young, and Joan Pickens working for cities. You know, people don't realize what the TML label means in lobbying for and looking after the bills of interest to local government. A lot of us don't have any earthly idea what they've talking about and how a bill will affect our towns. The state lobbying effort is vital.

GS: Can you give an example?

CBS: If TML is successful with its bills to raise the cap on the sales tax, Clinton alone gets $180,000 a year. That will replace the loss of general revenue sharing. Things of this nature. When you're talking about smaller towns with a three to four million dollar budget a couple hundred thousand dollars is a lot of money.

GS: Can you explain why there are still a few small towns that are not members of TML?

CBS: They just don't realize. You know, I think that probably the best money that a town can spend is its TML dues. I can't understand anyone at all not belonging and actively participating in it because the costs aren't that great for the benefits they derive from it.

I very much believe that and I've served on all the committees from nominating to finance, and I think all the people on the staff, not only Joe and Ed, but the girls in the office, are very pleasant. They take care of the officials when they travel, and when they come here to Nashville, provide us a facility which is worth an awful lot to all of us. It is to me particularly because as you know I'm not too bashful about calling on you and asking for help—and very seldom do I come to Nashville and not ask for help—and I can honestly say I never fail to get it.●

OBSERVATION OF REFORM

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I inserted into the RECORD an article from the Air University Review from the September-October 1985 issue, which dealt almost entirely with the subject of military reform.

I intend to continue to insert these various articles because of the coming legislation that the Armed Services Committee is preparing, to accomplish some of the reforms discussed by Senator SAM NUNN and me on the floor last year.

Today, I have removed from that publication an editorial entitled, "Individuals, Institutions, and the Impulse for Reform." This rather short editorial pretty well summarizes the need—constant need—for the observation of reform.

I ask that it appear at this point in my remarks.

The article follows:

[From Air University Review, September-October 1985]

INDIVIDUALS, INSTITUTIONS, AND THE IMPULSE FOR REFORM

Like individuals, institutions ossify with age. Goals and objectives become part of the warp and woof of corporate personality, enforcing conformity and demanding unity of purpose from those who are part of the institution. When service to institutionalized goals becomes an objective unto itself, a bureaucratic rigidity develops that stifles initiative and, ultimately, causes atrophy and impotence. That is when the invigoration of reform is needed.

Only the strongest establishments can reform themselves. Those that seek to foster change from within must, in most instances, be prepared for the lot of martyrs. On the other hand reform from without can be unduly abrasive, destroying rather than improving. The successful reformation usually results when insiders work with interested outside parties to bring about constructive changes.

The Protestant Reformation and the Catholic Counter-Reformation provide good examples of successful reorientation and reconstitution. In 1520, the Papal Bull Exsurge demanded that the monk Martin Luther either recant his position on reforming the Church or be branded a heretic. Luther became an unenthusiastic revolutionary.

Martin Luther loved the Church. He did not seek to destroy it, but he was a determined advocate for redirection and reform, particularly in the area of finances. When Luther criticized the sale of indulgences, he did more than probe at a lucrative practice that was vital to financing Europe's Most lavish court: he ultimately raised questions about doctrines basic to the Church's existence, including that of papal infallibility. However limited Luther's impulse for reform was initially, the consequences were dramatic.

The Air Force, like the medieval church, is subject to the vicissitudes of institutional life. As the Air Force matured, particularly after it attained its independent status in 1947, goals and objectives were incorporated, and air doctrine was defined and developed. Such processes are proper and common for any military service. However, if doctrine has become dogma, reformation may be needed. Like Martin Luther, today's military reformer seeks to correct rather than to destroy. In Luther's day, it was the Infidel Turk that actually sought to destroy Christiandom. Today, it is the Soviets who wish to obliviate the American way of life, with all of our institutions. Military reformers are neither infidel to our military ideals nor Communist, and it would behoove us not to use the terms heretic or adversary too freely.

Even the most facile study of history teaches that the impulse for reform is virtually irresistible to all but the very entrenched. If accommodated, reform can improve the institution, strengthening it through evolutionary rather than revolutionary development. The United States government is an example of an institution in a continuous state of reformation. Imperial Russia's tsarist autocracy, on the other hand, could not accommodate much-needed reforms advocated by socialists, democrats, and Mensheviks. The resulting Bolshevik revolution swept away autocrat and democrat alike. The Roman Catholic Church, in contrast, though shaken by Luther and subsequent reformers, undertook its own reformation to survive today as the largest and single most powerful religious institution in Christendom.

Martin Luther's impulse for reform was, at its essence, a personal thing. It began with his own passionate commitment to understanding what he was all about as a Christian and a cleric. His road to reform began with a search of the Scriptures as he sought to better understand his own relationships with God and with the Church of his time. For Luther, the Reformation began with himself.

Whether we consider ourselves reformers or defenders of the faith, we would do well to reexamine our own commitment. Officership, involving service and sometimes self-sacrifice for the good of the greater society and the lot of humanity, may be as much priesthood as profession. Just as the clergy faces the awesome responsibility of dealing in questions relevant to temporal values and eternal existence, so too military officers must master their own set of awe-inspiring imperatives, dealing as they do, ultimately, with life, death, and defense of the nation. That kind of charge demands the stuff of total dedication that transcends institutionalized interests. If self-preservation and promotion within the institution have become our goals, reform might best begin with a rigid examination of what we ourselves are all about. A rereading of both our commissions and the oath of office might be helpful. We could find ourselves paraphrasing Shakespeare's Cassius in the play Julius Caesar, "the fault . . . is not in our stars but in ourselves as underlings."—E.H.T.●

FINANCING SENATE CAMPAIGNS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, every Member of the Senate will admit, at least to himself or herself, that the present system of financing campaigns is a disaster.

Senator MATHIAS and I have introduced a bill calling for Senate financing identical to the Presidential financing, with a voluntary checkoff on income tax paying for it.

Our colleague from Maryland had an item in the New York Times recently telling in some detail why the change is needed.

I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point, and I urge my colleagues to read it.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Nov. 22, 1985]

FEDERAL FINANCING OF SENATE CAMPAIGNS

(By Charles McC. Mathias)

WASHINGTON.—A year from now, Americans will elect the 100th Congress. While no one can know the identity of the victors, we can be sure they all will take office under a shadow—the long shadow cast on the political process by the powerful, growing influence of private campaign contributions. And in every subsequent decision they make, they will be affected by the size and the sources of the bankroll that helped bring them to office, and by the need to plan for an even larger purse to keep them there.

Congress must act to clean up the system of campaign financing. Senate legislation recently introduced would do just that, by providing public funding of Senate general election campaigns—an approach that has worked well in Presidential elections since 1976.

The legislation would relieve senatorial candidates of the burden of raising millions of dollars, freeing them to pursue the primary purpose of a campaign: getting their message across to the voters. By banning all private contributions in the general election, it would remove not only the reality but the appearance of special-interest influence and in so doing help the public perceive the Senate as serving the public interest, not the interests of the wealthy and powerful.

Public financing is a way to limit overall campaign outlays. The Supreme Court in 1976 ruled that limits that Congress had set on campaign expenditures in Congressional campaigns were unconstitutional, but held that spending limits can be imposed on candidates who accept public funding. Thus, the measure before the Senate permits the Congress constitutionally to place a ceiling on the soaring costs of Senate campaigns.

The need for such limits is obvious. One of the most striking features of elections is the flood of campaign dollars unleashed in successive election cycles. Each passing year records new highs in spending: Since 1980, the cost of every election has surpassed the billion dollar mark, if state and local campaigns are included. In 1984, it cost an average of $3 million to win a Senate race—a fivefold increase over 1976.

What has been the effect of these record torrents of cash? Old familiar landmarks have been washed away, while the rising tide of campaign dollars has reshaped the contours of politics. Small contributors and grassroots volunteerism no longer are important parts of costly media campaigns. And high spending hasn't translated into voter interest. The rate of vote turnout remains dismally low compared to that of other democracies.

Television, while enormously expensive, conveys simplistic and image-based political messages: 30-second spots are unable to portray the complexities of policy choices.

In addition, high costs keep too many good people out of the system—talented men and women who won't enter the political arena because they can't or won't raise the hundreds of thousands, even millions, of dollars necessary to run a campaign.

Let us not overlook the toll on office-holders either. Something is wrong with a system in which Senators now spend half of their six-year terms raising campaign funds. Not only are they distracted from their duties but also the public has the impression that wealthy contributors have privileged access and influence as a result of their campaign contributions.

Hubert H. Humphrey described political fund-raising as demeaning: The politician would stand in the front room greeting potential contributors, acting as if he were not aware of the collecting going on in the back. He was right. It is demeaning to the politician, to the contributor and, ultimately, to our system of government.

In its first serious effort to comprehensively regulate financing, in 1971 Congress passed the Federal Election Campaign Act, which provided for public disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures. That act and its later amendments represent a good start, but more remains to be done. Congress can act now, or it can wait until it faces a greater crisis of confidence in the system. Some say that in an era of record Federal deficits, we cannot afford to publicly finance campaigns. I would reply that we cannot afford not to.●

ENOCH PRATT FREE LIBRARY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, this month, the Enoch Pratt Free Library in Baltimore marks its 100th year of service to the people of Maryland. It is a centennial that celebrates both the role of the public library in American society and the dream of the founder, Enoch Pratt, who envisioned a system of libraries "accessible to the people, who, I hope, will avail of the advantages it is my wish to offer them, they being for all, rich and poor without distinction of race or color * * *"

Our libraries are precious national resources, cataloging our hopes and realities and satisfying our thirst for self-knowledge. As custodians of our intellectual values, libraries illuminate what we were, reflect what we are, and hint at what we aspire to be. The success and longevity of a library such as the Pratt invigorates our commitment to support our libraries in facing the challenges of these difficult times. Our support is a solid investment, for be it 1886, 1986, or 2086, and beyond, libraries are essential to the Nation, fulfilling the need to know and the quest to understand.

Mr. President, I ask that an editorial from Baltimore's Sun newspaper of January 11, 1986, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The editorial follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Jan. 11, 1986]

THE PRATT'S NEXT CENTURY

When it comes to urban libraries, the Enoch Pratt, which celebrates its 100th anniversary this month, is still regarded as a model in the profession. But for public libraries in the larger, older cities today, these are not the best of times. Detroit's public library almost went down the drain, and New York's has experienced very hard going. The Pratt, through heroic efforts, has avoided that—but the cost of books, other materials and staff is on an upward curve while the growth line of public funds lags far behind. It is sad but true that the Pratt begins its second century with less optimism about its future than it began its first.

That is especially unfortunate at this time because information, which is one of the most important services a public library offers its patrons, is becoming more and more important in society. Ours is an information age. It is also the age of mass media. What but a public library can offer to the individual the specific mix of facts, ideas, images and dreams that fits his or her specific needs and desires? Even the most comprehensive newspapers, magazines and broadcast companies fall far short of providing the variety that a good library offers.

Today there are video and audio cassettes, compact discs and other technological marvels unimagined when Enoch Pratt's first library opened. Some people wonder about the future of books, hence of libraries. But libraries like the Pratt are not unaware of the new technology. Much of their scarce resources go to on-book items. But without taking anything away from the marvels of the VCR, etc., we believe the heart of a good library like the Pratt will always be its book collection. As long as human beings have imagination, there will be no frigate like a book to take its reader on a voyage of discovery, inspiration, amusement and understanding.

There are several good library systems in Maryland. Baltimore County's is one of the busiest and best in the nation. But there is only one Pratt. No other system has the variety of titles and resources it offers—not just to Baltimoreans but to the whole state. The state government supports the Pratt because of this responsibility, but no one familiar with the library's role and needs would contend that the level of support has been high enough. Nor has the city's support been as high as needs be in recent years. Both should do better. And so, of course, should private individuals and groups. Private generosity is important to libraries. Large gifts, like the H.J. Mencken estate, including his unpublished works, and small ones, like the $10 and $25 gifts grateful users make, all help and should be encouraged.●

DAN LAMBERT

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the January 8 issue of 55 Plus, a weekly newspaper covering issues and subjects important to Maine residents age 55 and over, included an excellent article on Dan Lambert, the adjutant of the Maine American Legion.

The article centers on Dan's well-known ability as a public speaker, especially on the subjects of Americanism, patriotism, and love of country. I have shared the podium with Dan at numerous functions across Maine since coming to the U.S. Senate. While other speakers might become stale after a time, Dan Lambert remains fresh, engaging and lively for every occasion.

Dan Lambert is a strong and impassioned voice for many things, especially the interests of Maine's veterans. He is a long-time leader of Maine's veterans community. He is a good friend. He is an outstanding citizen of the State of Maine.

I ask that the full text of the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

"BIG DAN" LAMBERT: HIS SPELLBINDING SPEECHES SUPPORT AMERICAN IDEALS

There's never any danger of boredom whenever "Big Dan" Lambert gets up to speak.

And there's no need for a microphone as he appears in an auditorium jampacked with listeners.

A prepared text? That would only be in his way.

That's because Dan Lambert becomes a spellbinder, an orator of superb talent, as he rises to address audiences at veterans' gatherings, in Grange halls, at service club luncheons, at school assemblies.

In a booming baritone voice, Lambert hammers home the basic message:

Love your country * * * be proud to be an American * * * preserve the rich traditions that have been handed down to you by men of greatness."

He does this between 200 and 250 times a year.

As department adjutant of The American Legion in Maine, Lambert travels some 65,000 miles a year to preach the gospel of Americanism, patriotism, love of country.

Not bad at all for a 62-year-old decorated veteran of World War II who maintains a rugged schedule that would challenge a man half his age. He describes himself as "completely recovered" from a heart attack suffered in 1983.

Since 1975, the state adjutant has been looking after the interests of 26,000 Legionnaires in Maine from state headquarters located in the Legion building of Bourque-Lanigan Post in Waterville.

"I'm the luckiest man in the world * * * I shouldn't be here today," smiles the oft-decorated Irishman who was wounded four times in Europe while fighting with the famed Darby's Rangers unit.

He's a writer and lecturer who serves as editor-publisher of The Maine Legionnaire, the official newspaper of The American Legion of Maine. He also serves as chairman of the Maine Veterans Coordinating Committee. He has been cited many times for his service to children and youth, as well as for his efforts to assist the aged and the handicapped.

But, despite Lambert's many other talents, his strength lies in his ability to stand on his feet and hold an audience spellbound.

On four separate occasions he was presented the George Washington Gold Medal Award from the Freedom Foundation at Valley Forge for his outstanding public addresses.

"I enjoy speaking," Lambert says simply.

That he does it well is an understatement. He's in constant demand. It's not unusual for him to speak at a communion breakfast in the morning, at a service club luncheon at noon, and at a Legion meeting in the evening.

Lambert is a deeply religious man (as a youth he studied for the Roman Catholic priesthood) who terms his speaking ability "a God-given talent," and he means it.

Plaques, awards, citations are prominent on the walls of Lambert's office, testimonials to his service as department adjutant since 1975, as department commander in 1968, and to years of achievement in behalf of others.

Lambert is an outspoken individual who has strong views. He admits that he is disturbed by many events that are taking place on the American scene.

Here are a few comments:

"During the war, I had a kid die on me. I held him in my arms. He was badly wounded. His last words were: 'Who is going to take care of my mother?' I decided to do something.

"What I'm doing now is exactly what I wanted to do in life. My life is complete in that I am able to do something for people, to help people.

"I'm convinced that there are some people in this country who are trying to rewrite history. I've been in every military cemetery in the world. There men fought together and died together and they lie together under the Stars and Stripes.

"I was an aide to Gen. George Patton. I pick up junk written about George Patton that never took place. He was an intellectual. He had a sense of history. As a soldier, he was the greatest military man in World War II.

"A few years ago I was in Washington and I met Mother Teresa of Calcutta. She's so small, like a little speck of dust. Yet she told me: 'Please tell the American people never to close their charity. This is the nation with the biggest heart.' I decided to give up one meal a week and send the money to charity. I lost 25 pounds.

"I'm astounded that we can't do more for the people of Lebanon. I've been through the midwest and for miles all you can see is storage bins and warehouses full of food.

"I believe that no matter who is president or who is governor, we have grown into a very cynical society. There are so many people picking at you that your effectiveness is lost.

"I'm bothered about haters on the left and haters on the right.

"Once I heard a Jesuit priest give a sermon. I never forgot it. He quoted the words of Christ. 'Ye shall be witnesses * * *.' I try to witness for my faith, my country, what I believe in. I tend to be unyielding in my opposition to forces who are attempting to overthrow the nation.

"America has lost its sense of self-discipline. There is an apathy in our people. Many Americans don't seem to care any more. They seem to say, 'It's OK, as long as I get mine.'

"I'm very proud of what I did in the service and I'm very proud of what I'm doing today."

Resting on a table in Lambert's office is a beautifully engraved plaque. It is the Humanitarian Award, given to Lambert at the American Legion state convention of 1982.

From my vantage across from him I can read the words:

"For outstanding self-sacrifice and devotion to the cause of the less fortunate and the underprivileged."

Somehow, those words seem to say it all.●

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, Newsweek magazine summed up the issue so well . . .

Washington may be agog over the Prince and Princess of Wales, but a less glittery group of visitors this week could create a more lasting stir. Nearly 100 of the world's most influential financial experts will congregate in the nation's capital to consider overhauling the international monetary system. Billed as the Congressional Summit on Exchange Rates and the Dollar, the conference is sponsored by odd bedfellows—conservative Republican Rep. Jack Kemp of New York and liberal Democratic Senator Bill Bradley of New Jersey—and attendees will include everyone from central bankers to gold bugs. Though the participants will disagree on many points, most will concur on one: "Monetary reform," says Kemp, "is an idea whose time has come."

I rise today to commend Representative KEMP and Senator BILL BRADLEY for their initiative in convening the first Congressional Summit on Exchange Rates and the Dollar. I joined as a cosponsor of the event because I too am convinced that monetary reform is an idea whose time has come.

The world is at an economic crossroads in the considered opinion of nearly all of the 350 leading policymakers who attended the monetary conference. And there was virtually unanimous expert opinion that the current international floating exchange rate system is a failure, and needs overhaul.

America has an enormous stake in the international monetary system, and it is time we protect our interests while promoting economic growth abroad. According to the U.S. Commerce Department, some 70 percent of American businesses are affected by international monetary exchange rates either through the price of goods purchased or sold, or terms of credit extended. The U.S. Treasury Department attributes 50 percent of the current U.S. trade deficit to problems stemming from the current international monetary system.

The United States has just become a net debtor nation for the first time since World War I. This means the United States will owe more to foreign nations than the value of its own investments abroad. This decline in the U.S. trading position marks a dramatic reversal. From 1982-85, not only has the United States become a debtor nation, it has reversed, totally, the buildup in international investment that has accumulated over the past 65 years.

The main cause of this is clearly the massive overvaluation and dramatically fluctuating exchange rates.

The twin problems of overvaluation and wild currency fluctuations are at least partially the result of the 1973 decision when the West's major nations abandoned the 44-year-old fixed exchange system—in which currency was backed either by gold or U.S. dollars—to settle international payments. The major nations converted instead to a floating system in which governments allowed their currencies to "float on global money markets."

It was surprising to me to learn from the conference that nearly all of the international monetary experts agreed that this new system has created more problems than it was intended to solve. Just one example, typically each day in international exchanges there is as much as 2 percent change in currency rates. This causes a huge problems for American businessmen who are never sure what price to charge, or what price they will receive for their overseas sales.

This need to solve this problem is what triggered the congressional summit on international monetary policy. This conference has received glowing praise in the financial press for focusing on this problem, and identifying solutions. Mr. President, this is a subject my colleagues will be hearing more and more about in the future. To enhance the Senate's understanding of this issue and the importance of the monetary conference just held, I ask that a series of articles and editorials about the conference be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. President, I sincerely praise Representative JACK KEMP and Senator BRADLEY for convening this monetary conference. This conference surely marks one of the year's most important public policy meetings. I also want to pay tribute to the organizers of this event—Dave Smick and Richard Medley of the Global Monetary Project—for their yeoman behind-the-scenes work in making the conference so successful.

I ask the articles in connection with this matter be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

A NEW MONEY GAME?

Washington may be agog over the Prince and Princess of Wales, but a less glittery group of visitors this week could create a more lasting stir. Nearly 100 of the world's most influential financial experts will congregate in the Nation's Capital to consider overhauling the international monetary system. Billed as the Congressional Summit on Exchange Rates and the Dollar, the conference is sponsored by odd bedfellows—conservative Republican Rep. Jack Kemp of New York and liberal Democratic Sen. Bill Bradley of New Jersey—and attendees will include everyone from central bankers to gold bugs. Though the participants will disagree on many points, most will concur on one: "Monetary reform," says Kemp, "is an idea whose time has come."

It's a view that events have rendered undeniable. The flexible exchange rates adopted in the early 1970's haven't worked as planned: designed to adjust automatically to changes in countries' relative purchasing power, they have instead been overwhelmed by capital flows and other economic forces. The volatile behavior of foreign-exchange markets, meanwhile, has helped yield a drastically overvalued U.S. dollar and other currency distortions—worsening everything from trade imbalances to the Third World debt crisis. The recent decision by the five largest industrial countries to intervene in the markets to drive down the dollar represents a tacit admission that the era of pure floating exchange rates is over. Now, led by the Reagan administration, a move is under way toward a managed system of exchange rates—and greater coordination of global economic policies to shore them up.

Newsweek has learned that the U.S. Treasury Department is drafting a rough plan of action to create a system of "target zones" for exchange rates—possibly modeled after the European Monetary System, which bands the German mark, French franc and six other currencies together in a fluctuating arrangement known as "the snake." Under such a system, countries would meet regularly to discuss their internal fiscal and monetary policies, and a mechanism would be created to press for changes in those policies when necessary to keep currencies fluctuating within broad bands. A move to target zones would represent a major turnaround in the world economy, and prolonged consultations would be needed before a new road map could be devised. But for now the Treasury is acting "within an intellectual framework" to bring about monetary reform, one senior administration official says.

Group of Two: The first step was the intervention agreement crafted by the Treasury and unveiled two months ago by the so-called Group of Five industrial nations. The plan has mainly been carried out by a smaller Group of Two: through a combination of dollar sales and jawboning of large Japanese investors, the U.S. Federal Reserve and the Bank of Japan have succeeded in driving the dollar down 16 percent against the yen. The effort has had the desired effect of cooling protectionist fires in Congress and could begin to make a dent in the U.S. trade deficit next year. Last week Satoshi Sumita, governor of the Bank of Japan, suggested that the bank would continue intervening when necessary to keep the yen at about its current level of 207 to the dollar. Meanwhile, keeping more yen at home, Japanese interest rates have risen—and Tokyo has announced modest measures to stimulate domestic demand through increased public-works spending and tax incentives to encourage new housing construction.

The Kemp-Bradley conference will explore other ways to reform the system. Stanford University economics Prof. Ronald McKinnon will argue that the drastic cycles of inflation and deflation in recent years were in large part attributable to flexible exchange rates—and may repeat his call for a system linking monetary policies in Germany, Japan and the United States. Meanwhile, David Hale, chief economist of Kemper Financial Services, will contend that individual countries' microeconomic policies skew exchange rates as well. He argues that American tax-law changes accelerating depreciation on capital equipment raised the rate of return on real assets and forced returns on financial assets upward—boosting U.S. interest rates and the dollar.

Bradley and Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, among others, may plump for bills they have sponsored that would require the Fed to intervene in currency markets and to boost the money supply whenever the dollar was overvalued or the U.S. trade deficit soared. For his part Kemp, who once advocated a return to the gold standard, now favors a plan that would force the Fed to manage the money supply so as to hold prices level for a "basket" of commodities including gold, other metals and foodstuffs.

Evolutionary Approach? Whether the Treasury will hear much support for target zones remains to be seen, but a consensus for changes is clearly developing. "We are sailing very close to the wind as far as the risks we're running in the financial system," says investment banker and conference participant Felix Rohatyn. The session may lead to further discussions among the industrial nations on how to revamp the current system—"an evolutionary approach, not sitting down and writing [a new] Constitution," says conference participant Charles Kindleberger, professor emeritus of economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. But given the pressures facing the global economy, an intercontinental congress to adopt monetary-reform measures could still be in the industrialized world's future.

THE DRIVE TO TAME CURRENCIES

(By Peter T. Kilborn)

WASHINGTON, October 28.—Worldwide concern over the ups and downs of the American dollar and its impact on the livelihood of all countries has set in motion a multinational effort to reimpose some form of government control over currencies, according to international economists.

The catalyst for change could well be a monetary conference here next month to be attended by many of the world's top economic policymakers, leading international economists and senior members of the Reagan Administration. From that meeting will come a report for the seven-nation economic summit conference to be held late next spring in Tokyo. That, in turn, could lead to the first international conference devoted to currency revisions since Bretton Woods in 1944.

What is happening is that governments, and in particular the United States Government, now see political opportunity in regulating exchange rates. The Reagan Administration, once an intractable foe of government intrusion in currency markets, has come to recognize the value of at least occasional intervention to deal with the effects of its $200 billion budget deficits and other pressing economic issues such as the protectionist attitudes in Congress and the developing world's debts to Western banks.

Other industrial nations have been disenchanted for several years with the current system in which currencies are left to vie for themselves in an often volatile marketplace. The change in American attitude is encouraging these nations to step up their efforts for change.

The prospect of revising the currency system has captivated some Congressmen as well. Two men who are often mentioned as possible presidential candidates. Representative Jack Kemp, Republican of Buffalo, and Senator Bill Bradley, Democrat of New Jersey, have joined in sponsoring next month's monetary conference.

"We hope to focus attention on the problem of exchange rates," Senator Bradley said. "The present system isn't working as it was supposed to work, or we wouldn't have $120 billion trade deficits."

Some economists and political leaders in the United States and abroad are calling for a return to the system of tight supervision of currency exchange rates that was established 41 years ago at the conference in Bretton Woods, N.H.

That system, in which the dollar's value was pegged to gold and then the other currencies were tied to the dollar, crumbled with rising world inflation at the start of the 1970's. Most of those now advocating change want a less rigid system, but a system, nevertheless, to curb the volatility of an unsupervised marketplace.

"A broad spectrum of international and financial thinking says we ought to get together and talk it out and see if we can get a little better understanding of financial markets and financial institutions," said Henry Kaufman, chief economist at Salomon Brothers Inc.

A senior Reagan Administration official, who declined to be named, said, "My personal opinion is that we have to reform the system."

Governments are vitally concerned with the values of their currencies because they affect virtually every facet of an economy—the prices of imports and exports, the investments that countries make outside their borders, their inflation and employment rates.

THE DOLLAR SITUATION

In the case of the United States, the relatively expensive dollar has been an important factor in the loss of jobs to foreign competition, to the recession in agriculture and to the boom in American travel abroad. At the same time, the high prices that debtor nations have to pay for dollars to make payments on their loans to American banks is responsible in part for their difficulties in making those payments.

But managing currency exchange rates is a matter of considerable ideological debate. For years, President François Mitterrand of France, a Socialist, has argued for close Government regulation of the international marketplace, including exchange rates, just as he promotes such regulation over domestic policies. At the other extreme, the Reagan Administration has argued for free and open markets at home and—until now—in the international economy.

Managing currencies is also an imperfect art. For centuries, nations have sought to settle upon a method of keeping their currencies in line with one another to avoid the shocks occurring when they rise or fall. But they have yet to devise a system that has satisfied everyone for more than a couple of decades.

During the Bretton Woods era of "fixed" exchange rates, countries complained that the rates often undermined their economies, particularly when the levels of inflation varied from country to country. Yet, few countries are happy with the nonsystem that they settled upon in the early 1970's. They then decided to let currencies "float" in the market, permitting bankers, business executives, governments, international travelers and speculators to determine exchange rates through buying and selling of currencies. The United States endorsed this policy of "benign neglect."

A LOSS OF FAITH

But the Reagan Administration has lost faith in the policy, in part because of the strength of the dollars, which in the last four years has risen more than 40 percent above the average of other currencies.

"There wasn't much objection to floating rates until three or four years ago," said Robert Solomon, economist at the Brookings Institution and for many years the chief international economist at the Federal Reserve Board. "But then we found that the exchange rate can move beyond where you like to see it go, and it interferes with your domestic objectives."

To some extent, multinational reregulation of the currency markets has already begun. Six years ago, Western Europe developed a regional solution, called the European Monetary System, that some economists say could be expanded to the world economy. Eight countries agreed to limit their currencies' rise or fall to 2¼ percent. The system withstood a severe test during a sharp devaluation of the French franc in 1983. "I'd call it a great success," said John Williamson, a British economist at the Institute of International Economics here.

THE U.S. FACTOR

But it is the United States that can make or break any worldwide move towards currency revision. The first hint of a change here came last April when Treasury Secretary James A. Baker 3d told finance ministers from the industrial nations that the United States would "consider the possibility" of holding a monetary conference.

Last month, on Sept. 22, with the trade deficit fueling protectionist moves in Congress, Mr. Baker took a major step toward a more managed currency market by agreeing with four other major industrial powers—Japan, Germany, France and Britain—that the dollar was too high. The officials said that they "stand ready" to force the American currency down and since then the dollar has fallen 6 percent against an average of 15 major currencies.

It is possible that the Administration may go no further than its Sept. 22 commitment. Some critics of the "benign neglect" policy say that a simple endorsement of joint intervention when a currency falls out of line is sufficient to handle the problem.

"We've got a major change already under way," said Robert V. Roosa, a former Under Secretary of the Treasury and a partner at Brown Brothers Harriman in New York, a private bank. Rather than attempt to construct a more elaborate system of currency control, Mr. Roosa said, the Government should now deal with the domestic economic issue that he and many economists see as the source of much of the dollar's rise—the $200 billion annual Federal deficits. Inaction on that, he said, could send the dollar climbing again.

But others endorse a system similar to the Bretton Woods formula, with the dollar or all currencies tied to gold again or to a "basket" of commodities. Proponents of such a system say it would stabilize prices of major commodities, which in turn would stabilize world economies.

"I personally believe in stable, fixed exchange rates and possibly a gold-backed role for the dollar," Representative Kemp said.

But given the failings of the Bretton Woods system, most international economists doubt that a new system would be that extensive. "I think what we need is a synthesis of fixed rates and the excessive volatility that we have now," said C. Fred Bergsten, a former Treasury official and now director of the Institute for International Economics, a research organization here.

"The key," he said, "is to have guidelines, presumptions and even rules that countries could take into account when formulating their economic policies."

[From the New York Times, Nov. 15, 1985]

THE BUCK (POUND, FRANC) STOPS HERE

There's little dispute that the dollar is too high and other currencies are too low, and it's common to blame the current system of free-floating exchange rates for allowing that. But nobody agrees on what, if anything, might work better. A conference in Washington this week has helped put things into focus. Perfection may be out of reach but there are ways to improve the system.

The conference dealt in monetary abstractions, but its roots were profoundly political. Currency values have a direct impact on exports and imports and thus on nations' growth. Growth is how political leaders stay in office. And they are not good at retarding it for some larger common interest. The conference was convened by Senator Bill Bradley, Democrat of New Jersey, and Representative Jack Kemp, Republican of New York. They come at the problem from different directions but agree there's a problem. The Administration didn't until lately, but Treasury Secretary James Baker shows a welcome new openness.

The clearest evidence of trouble is America's immense trade deficit and the huge increase in foreign investment here. With American goods now priced high and foreign goods low, imports have surged and exports lagged. This has cut economic growth at home, inflamed pressure for trade barriers and put America deeply in debt to foreigners. On the positive side the boom in imports stimulates other countries' economies, and foreign investment helps finance the budget deficit.

It is widely assumed that this situation won't last. Countries cannot run large trade deficits indefinitely; one day, foreigners will decide they don't want so many dollars. When they reduce their holdings the dollar's value will drop. If it drops too far or too fast, the world faces a whole new set of distortions. Everyone wants to avoid that; hence the exploration for a more disciplined system.

Until 12 years ago all currencies had a fixed relationship to the dollar, and the dollar was pegged to a fixed price for gold. Fixed rates presume that governments will adjust fiscal and monetary policies if their currencies get out of line. This system was finally overwhelmed by the growth of international trade and capital flows. In 1973 currencies were freed to float.

Mr. Kemp wants to return to some form of rate fixing. Mr Bradley leans toward more flexible controls. There's increased talk of setting "target zones," in which there would be an agreement on exchange rates from which currencies would be allowed to vary by no more than, say, 10 percent.

The big five Western nations agreed in September to seek better alignment of their currencies. But they didn't declare any targets nor reveal any commitments to correct domestic policies. The most notable distortion of currency values comes from the American budget deficits, but other countries' policies are faulty too.

No sovereign government willingly alters domestic policy under foreign pressure. A perfectly harmonious currency system is thus blocked by the political pressures felt by leaders of individual countries. But even sovereigns can recognize a common good. The September accord and this week's brainstorming move in the right direction. Harmony need not be perfect to avert a plunge.

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 13, 1985]

REFORMING THE EXCHANGE RATES

Don't blame imports, or the people who buy them, for the gigantic American trade deficits. The trouble lies in the currency exchange rates, and it's more useful to ask why the exchange markets have been behaving so strangely in the past several years. This week a congressional conference on exchange rates, convened at the initiative of Rep. Jack Kemp and Sen. Bill Bradley, is at work on that question. Most of Congress has now acknowledged, publicly or otherwise, that protectionism—the attempt to hold down imports by law—is dangerous and costly in its effects. But if protectionism won't work, the politicians anxiously ask, what will?

The kind of reform that's needed has less to do with changing the exchange system than with changing the attitudes and political preconceptions that surround it. From World War II until the 1970's, Americans lived in a world in which exchange rates were something for other countries to worry about. The rest of the world made little difference to the hugely powerful economy of this country, most Americans thought, and they were right—for a while. But beginning in the early 1970's this country's foreign trade expanded twice as fast as its economy, and the flows of foreign investment expanded even faster. Although foreign trade and foreign money became major determinants of American prosperity, American views of the world did not adjust immediately to that reality. Until recently the Reagan administration brushed off the foreign connections with the argument that, with steady growth here at home, the international accounts would take care of themselves. That hasn't worked.

As long as the United States runs large budget deficits requiring foreign financing, the dollar exchange rates will continue to be out of line. All of the trading countries draw great advantages from the enormous volumes of trade that now tie their economies together. But because they are tied together their governments enjoy less independence in economic policy than they once did. The Americans in particular are having trouble getting used to these constraints and the obligations to cooperation that they impose.

But the responsibility for poor performance does not lie wholly with the United States. Germany and Japan are still not entirely accustomed to their economic weight, and still behave as though their policies had little effect on anyone but themselves. As long as countries as strong as those two accept so little responsibility for making the system work, it is not likely to work well.

No one country dominates the exchange rates any longer, and managing them successfully is necessarily a joint endeavor. That's the spirit in which the Kemp-Bradley conference is proceeding and that's why it may turn out, in this city of conferences, to be unusually useful.

[From Business Week, Nov. 25, 1985]

KEMP'S MONETARY POWWOW: NOT BAD FOR STARTERS

It was the social event of the year for anyone who matters in international finance. Representative Jack F. Kemp (R-N.Y.) and Senator Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) had called a conference to consider reform of the international monetary system, and 350 leading policymakers, central bankers, and economists flocked to the National Academy of Sciences in Washington for a debate that was downright chic. As it turned out, the conference was a cacophony of diametrically opposed views about how to stabilize the monetary system. But the important thing is that the powwow took place at all.

Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III, who had originally declined an invitation to attend, in the end managed to place himself at the forefront. Supplysider Kemp and his friends had drummed up enough support to make the conference too significant for the secretary to shun.

Baker was the honored guest at the opening party thrown by the organizers in the stately reception rooms of the Federal Reserve. And in an unscheduled interruption of the proceedings the following day, he threw his weight behind the drive to improve the international monetary system. The Sept. 22 agreement between the Group of Five major industrialized countries to stabilize the dollar, the Secretary said. "was not a one-shot effort but one step in a continuing process of enhanced economic cooperation."

World leaders were already alarmed about the monetary system's troubles—and a widespread perception that the G5 agreement was running out of steam only added to the attraction of Kemp's forum. Thanks to sizable intervention in the currency markets by the world's largest central banks, the dollar has come down to its level of early 1984. But the dollar may not stay battened down unless the industrial powers more closely coordinate their economic policies—which could require some painful domestic adjustments.

For that to happen, the world may have to switch to a more managed floating-rate system—a move that may be in the offing. In a significant concession, Deputy Treasury Secretary Richard G. Darman said: "Perhaps there is a middle ground that begins to look like target or reference zones. It seems that that might have some virtue." The French government has backed such a step for some time, and its position was reiterated at the conference by Jacques Attali, chief adviser to President François Mitterrand.

But if Baker was pleased by the support for his more activist approach, he got more than he bargained for. Speaker after speaker criticized the monetary system with a vengeance, struggling to compress their cosmic pronouncements into the five minutes each was allotted. As one organizer put it: "Never before had so many egos been asked to say so much in so little time."

Monetary expert Robert Triffin dismissed the current exchange-rate system as a "world monetary scandal." Professor Robert A. Mundell of Columbia University warned that the world has narrowly escaped total anarchy. He wants to stabilize international monetary reserve around the current price of gold—about $325 per oz. Even such a mainstream economist as Alan Greenspan said that the restoration of something approximating a gold standard would be desirable.

Conspicuously absent. But as Baker warned, improving the international monetary system is "not an overnight task." Although many economists were enthusiastic, there was a noticeable lack of consensus among world leaders on whether major reform is really necessary. Officials of monetarist Britian were conspicuously absent from the conference. Helmut Schlesinger, vice-president of the West German Bundesbank, showed scant interest in reform: "We seem to have forgotten that the fixed-exchange regime had a number of disadvantages as well," he cautioned. And Toyoo Gyohten, a top official at Japan's Finance Ministry, wondered whether the fault lies in the economic policies of the major countries rather than the functioning of the monetary system.

Of course, no one expected the problems of the monetary world to be solved at one meeting. But the talk about reform struck many as refreshing and provocative. If nothing else, said Federal Reserve Vice-Chairman Preston Martin, the conference showed that "it has become socially acceptable" to talk about reforming the international monetary system.

Congressional advocates of reform were equally pleased, and they hope the attention paid to the conference will, as Bradley put it, "accelerate momentum at the official level." That won't be easy. Despite Baker's qualified support for further change, he could run into stiff opposition from Reagan Administration colleagues, including Secretary of State George P. Shultz, who has never been overly fond of currency manipulation. Moreover, as Darman warned the delegates: "Just publishing targets doesn't address the question of policy fundamentals." Put another way, talking about a problem isn't the same thing as fixing it.●

ENCOUNTER ON A MOSCOW SUBWAY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the November summit between President Reagan and Mikhail Gorbachev is over. Political analysts, Government leaders, and pundits are doing their best to assess the successes and failures of the historic meeting in Geneva. In a weekly column I write for newspapers in my State, I have related an experience that one of my staff members had while visiting the Soviet Union. It illustrates, I believe, the strong yearning peoples of both our countries have for peace. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ENCOUNTER ON A MOSCOW SUBWAY

(Weekly Column by U.S. Senator Paul Simon of Illinois)

How important was the summit meeting at Geneva?

We will not know with certainty for some time, but there is reason to hope that it was a significant meeting, a time when the U.S. and Soviet leadership came to understand each other better.

President Eisenhower once commented that if the governments of the world stand in the way of peace, the people of the world may push them aside to achieve peace. That is not an exact quote, but it conveys the essence of his remarks.

There is a yearning for peace among all people.

A member of my staff, Art Greles, recently took his first sight-seeing visit to Moscow (not at your expense) and he related this incident:

"It was Friday night, Sept. 6, my birthday—my last night in Moscow. I was returning to the Cosmos Hotel from the Moscow Circus on the subway, and considering how late it was I wanted to make sure that I was on the right train. I saw a Russian man sitting alone—I would say 55 to 60 years of age. I kept saying, 'Cosmos Hotel' and pointed on the map to my destination. He nodded, and said, 'Okay.'

"He then said, in very accented English, 'You American, yes?' I replied, 'Yes.' He then put his hands on my shoulders and forced me down on my knees so I was face to face with him. He then firmly put his hands on the back of my neck and put my head to his chest and patted my shoulders and whispered into my ear, 'Please, no war. No war, please. No war with America—for the children—save children. Russian people do not want war with America. Go home and tell America Russian people do not want war.'

"I replied, 'America does not want war with the Soviet Union. We do not want war, we want peace. I will go home and give your message.' At this point, I was overwhelmed with emotion looking into his eyes. This man was for real—tears almost started coming from my eyes as I felt the adrenalin being released in my system.

"We arrived at my subway stop and I had to get off. He looked at me as I exited, waved and said, with his hand on his heart, 'Please tell them.' I replied, 'I will.'

"This is something I will never forget and was the most moving part of my entire Soviet trip. It showed that they have the same fears and concerns. It also made me wonder exactly what they're being told about the United States."

That is a simple story, but it tells of more than a simple encounter between two people.

The hope and prayer of all of us is that the universal yearning for peace can become a reality. That's what people everywhere want, and we must make sure that governments don't get in their way.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATIONS BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 35 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this notice of a Senate employee who proposes to participate in a program, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Robert B. Van Cleve, a member of the staff of Senator JOHN C. DANFORTH, to participate in a program in Israel, sponsored by the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, from January 5 through 16, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Van Cleve in the program, in Israel, at the expense of the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Bruce Heiman, of the staff of Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, to participate in a program in Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from January 11 through 19, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Heiman in the program, in Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Greg Chapados, of the staff of Senator TED STEVENS, to participate in a program in Israel, sponsored by the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, from January 6 through 15, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Chapados in the program, in Israel, at the expense of the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Christina Bolton, of the staff of Senator BOB DOLE, to participate in a program in Taiwan, sponsored by the Chinese Culture University, from January 1 through 10, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Bolton in the program, in Taiwan, at the expense of the Chinese Culture University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 would would permit Mr. Robert W. Porter, Jr., a member of the staff of Senator WILLIAM S. COHEN, to participate in a program in Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from January 11 through 20, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Porter in the program, in Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mrs. Mary McGuire of the staff of Senator FRANK H. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. Edward Long of the staff of Senator TOM HARKIN, to participate in a program in Israel, sponsored by the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, from January 5 through 16, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. McGuire and Mr. Long in the program, in Israel, at the expense of the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Leon S. Fuerth, a member of the staff of Senator ALBERT GORE, JR., to participate in a program in Israel, sponsored by the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, from January 5 through 16, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Fuerth in the program, in Israel, at the expense of the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Project Interchange, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Peter N. Marudas, of the staff of Senator PAUL S. SARBANES, to participate in a symposium in Sussex, England, sponsored by the A.G. Leventis Foundation, Inc., of Paris, France, from January 24 through 26, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Marudas in the symposium in Sussex, England, at the expense of the A.G. Leventis Foundation, Inc., was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Senator PHIL GRAMM to participate in the Davos Symposium, Davos, Switzerland, from January 30 through February 4, 1986, sponsored by the Dallas Chamber, Dallas, TX, and the E-M-F Foundation, Davos, Switzerland.

The committee has determined that participation by Senator GRAMM in the Davos Symposium, in Davos, Switzerland, at the expense of the Dallas Chamber and the E-M-F Foundation, Davos, Switzerland, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Brent Erickson, of the staff of Senator ALAN SIMPSON, to participate in a program in the People's Republic of China, sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, and organized by the United States-China Friendship Program, from January 9 through 11, 1986.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Erickson in the program in the People's Republic of China, organized by the United States-China Friendship Program, and sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

PROBLEMS OF TEACHERS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Marguerite Michaels had an article in a recent Parade magazine about the problems teachers are facing.

It is an extremely important article because it speaks to the future of our country.

I occasionally speak to teachers' institutes. If I am speaking to 4 of 500 teachers and I ask, "How many of you would want your sons or daughters to become teachers?" there are usually not more than 10 hands raised.

Even more disconcerting, if you check what is happening at the top 5 percent of the graduating class in any high school in this country, you will find that those top students want to become lawyers, doctors, engineers, architects, journalists, and a variety of other professions, but very few, if any, want to become teachers.

If we want to build the right kind of future for this Nation, we ought to do more to encourage and keep the very finest of our citizens in the teaching profession.

I urge my colleagues to read the Marguerite Michaels story, which I ask to be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A REPORT CARD FROM OUR TEACHERS

(By Marguerite Michaels)

In all the talk about the crisis in education in America in the last few years, one group has been far more talked about than talked to: teachers. Education experts say that intellectual and motivational problems of teachers are the cause of the crisis in education. Even if that it true—if teachers are a large part of the problem—then they must also be a large part of the solution. It seems only logical that what's wrong with our public school system, cannot be fixed without their involvement.

With that thought in mind, Parade asked Mark Clements Research, Inc. to conduct a survey of teachers' attitudes toward their career and the education process itself. At the end of the last school year, 1941 questionnaires were sent out to elementary and secondary school teachers all over the country.

Some of the findings of the survey are:

Almost all teachers feel that schools have been the scapegoats for a lot of society's ills.

87 percent of teachers feel parents are too permissive.

When asked what would help them do their job better, teachers said (1) students with a better attitude toward learning and (2) more parent involvement with their children's education at home. Higher wages came in a surprising seventh.

Only 40 percent of teachers are very satisfied with their jobs, as opposed to 52 percent of the total working public.

40 percent of teachers are more negative about teaching now than when they first started.

One-third of teachers would leave their profession for another job even if the salary were no more than what they are making now.

Parade asked teachers who answered negatively to explain why they felt as they did. A fifth-grade teacher from Florida wrote that "educational values of students and parents have declined." A high school teacher from Ohio said, "I was unprepared for the apathy of students—and parents—and how to deal with it." Teachers cited stress on the job, lack of parental and community support and loss of respect for the profession.

One out of five teachers mentioned problems with school bureaucracy. "Administrators and central office personnel impair my ability to do the job," said a high school teacher from Georgia. "They play partisan politics and do not match teachers to classes for which they are best suited."

While every working person has problems with his or her boss at one time or another, it should be noted that over the last 20 years the number of principals and supervisors in the public school system has increased by 83 percent, compared with a 64 percent increase in classroom teachers. In 1960, there were 40,000 school districts in the U.S. Today there are only 16,000. Consolidation has led to increasing centralization and bureaucracy. Administrators are now getting a much larger portion of the school budget dollar that are the classroom teachers.

More than half of the teachers in Parade's survey said that the mushrooming central school bureaucracy had a negative effect on their work in the classroom.

Most of the continuing controversy about "why Johnny can't read" has focused on poor teaching—and well over a quarter of the teachers surveyed acknowledge that teachers in general are not doing the best job they can. But then say the teachers, neither is Johnny.

It is not a question of discipline, said 78 percent of the teachers. Apathy is a larger problem. Teachers with at least 10 years of classroom experience found their students "less interested in learning" than before, harder to teach" and "not appreciative" of the job teachers are doing.

The Parade/Clements survey asked a series of questions about how the time students spend viewing television has changed their ability to learn. Teachers overwhelmingly said students now expected to be "entertained in the classroom." They thought their students had "shorter attention spans" and found them "more responsive to visual methods to teaching." Parade asked teachers to write in any other effects they thought important, and a sampling of these responses runs from the expected—"study less," "read less," "less physically fit"—to more profound impacts of television. "Poor listening skills," wrote a sixth-grade teacher fom Utah. Many teachers described problems of "passivity," 'lack of imagination," "expectations of easy solutions to problems." "Creates uncertainty about reality," said a high school teacher from Virginia. Most of the teachers surveyed said they had changed their teaching methods in response to television's impact. They use more audio-visual equipment in their classrooms and plan "more compact" lesson presentations. Some even have taken on a "flamboyant acting style," while others have tried to relate classroom work to specific television programs.

While teachers feel that the student is most responsible for his or her own behavior in the classroom, parents came in a close second. Parade's teachers seem both critical of and sympathetic to the parents; 44 percent of the teachers surveyed are parents of students themselves.

Teachers not only found parents too permissive, they also found them often "not at home" to discuss problems teachers might be having with their children or "not creating an environment at home" conducive to learning. Few teachers wanted more parent participation in classroom issues like school curriculum or textbook choices or the hiring policy of teachers. But they clearly want and need parents' help in getting pupils to a point where they are motivated to learn. A grade school teacher from Michigan thought many parents "are not well informed and don't care."

According to Parade's survey, teachers have a fairly low opinion of the impact of some national policy decisions on the classroom:

52 percent of teachers think busing has not helped minorities get a better education.

52 percent of teachers feel the recent spate of reform on the state level—stricter school curricula and higher grade standards—has not improved the education students are receiving.

20 percent of the teachers said that the higher standards have led to a higher student dropout rate in their schools.

Teachers are evenly divided on the question of merit raises and competency tests. They are not divided on what they think it will take to fix things—a new national attitude recognizing the importance of education. Wrote a junior high school teacher from Minnesota: "Even considering the barrage of negatives from the public and political arenas, I still enjoy the job. But education won't improve in this country until Americans truly begin to respect if for its own sake."

The Parade/Clements survey results are based on a total of 1172 questionnaires. The response rate was an extremely high 77.7 percent.

Clearly, teachers would like to be included in the continuing national debate on the quality of education in the United States.

WHY DO WE HAVE SUCH A BAD IMAGE?

The crisis in education, teachers say, is not what is coming out of the classroom, but what is going in. They list unimaginative, overbearing school administrations and competition for students' attention from television and rock music heroes who ridicule education. Most troubling, however, is their increasing suspicion that society does not value teachers.

"The students have such apathy," says Julie Riegel, an elementary school teacher in Ypsilanti, Mich. "That's coming from the parents. We are working so hard. I think we're doing a great job. But we are not important enough to people out there. Why aren't we? Every parent should spend a day with us in the classroom."

David Sutherland teaches elementary school in Scotts Valley, Calif. "If we as a country don't think that the most important thing is to pass down our values and perpetuate the culture, then that culture is threatened." Sutherland—and many of the teachers Parade talked with and polled—felt that parents were "significantly responsible" for the fact that the school system is not allowed to get "the business of teaching done." Sutherland, 36 has been teaching for 13 years. "Before we can get down to reading and writing," he says, "we must teach self-discipline, concentration, honesty, integrity—values that should have been brought from home."

Teachers understand the rising expectations from society, and they accept the challenge to improve, but they feel they are not getting the support they need. "As the level of professionalism increases," says Sutherland, "the level of frustration also increases. The best teachers are looking elsewhere."

"I don't think the public understands how hard we are working," says Betty Williams, who has been teaching elementary school in Kirkland, Wash., for 22 years. "They are always hearing about the strikes. But for my 9 o'clock to 3 o'clock day, I work 7 to 5. There's no break with kids. I'm always working on weekends, and through the summers. You just give so much time and energy. It's intense. Teachers care. Why do we have such a bad image?"

Teachers, say teachers, are as good as ever. What makes a good teacher? Betty Williams says: "You have to love the profession." Brenda Wilson, a third-grade teacher in Syracuse, N.Y., talks about "those indescribable moments when you walk into a classroom and see what progress the kids are making." Julie Riegel agrees: "It is really exciting to watch a child latch onto something." "A good teacher," says Virginia Smit, a high school art teacher, "is a flexible, caring individual." "And a secure individual," adds Jane Cohen, Smit's colleague at Livingston High School in New York City.

Most of all, good teachers believe in their students. "They are a lot brighter than they were 10 years ago," says Diane Landures, who's been teaching for 16 years—at present in Salt Lake City. "You would be stunned by what an 8-year-old or a 9-year-old knows. The children are our future, but when people ask me what I do for a living and I say 'teach'—they say, 'You're kidding!' There is such scorn.

The lack of respect bothers Ed Amaral, a high school math teacher in Hanover, Mass. "I don't want to blame the parents. I'm a parent myself. But society has changed in the 20 years since I started teaching. We grab more things—VCRs, stereos, TVs. We abuse the kids emotionally. What I mean is that we don't demand enough of them. Maybe we have all forgotten the hard work we put into this country after World War II to get where we are today."

Amaral, however, sees much of the recent criticism of education as a positive thing. "I've been in the business long enough to see the pendulum beginning to swing back now to education as the key to a successful future. I think a lot of parents are looking for more quality and are more concerned. They see the competitive world that their children are facing, and they want them prepared as well as possible. That's good news for teachers."●

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, since 1973, when the Supreme Court ruling recognized a woman's right to choose abortion, opponents have attempted to overturn this decision through nearly 500 legislative initiatives. These initiatives seek to restrict abortion from several perspectives ranging from constitutional amendments to prohibiting abortion by statute. As the prochoice advocates recognize this anniversary and the opponents work to reverse the 1973 ruling, one single issue gains significance: That persons of sensitive and informed conscience find themselves on differing sides of the choice issue.

I strongly support the woman's right to terminate a pregnancy, but recognize that such a decision is not made lightly. One may struggle with the circumstances of their own ability to love and care for a coming child and the options a woman must choose from may all seem equally difficult. It is my belief that the prochoice position is weighed with many responsibilities as we all work for greater respect for human life.

There is the responsibility of maintaining broad, accessible family planning to provide maternal and infant health care as well as preventive services. The provisions of family planning services to low- and marginal-income persons can be instrumental in reducing or alleviating poverty and dependency. An especially important part of maternal and infant health is the timing and spacing of births—a key to adequate family planning services. And of course from the beginning, family planning has focused on preventive services to avert the unintended pregnancy. The consequences of pregnancy and childbearing for adolescents is particularly heartrending and family planning services have served to educate teenagers about the obligations or parenting and alternatives for prevention.

There is the responsibility of working for a better quality of life after birth. Our child nutrition programs, assistance for the low income, Headstart, education for the handicapped, and other special programs of benefit to children are all prolife programs. They seek to improve the quality of life for all children regardless of a family's situation, a child's physical handicap, or other special concerns. Recognizing the value of life entails recognizing the malnourished from the nourished, the sick from the healthy, and the poor from the rich.

Coming full circle, though, we return to the value judgment placed on the issue of abortion. The belief in the right to choose abortion is based in philosophical and theological judgments, although no less weighty they cannot be imposed on a multireligious society.

The Supreme Court view in Roe versus Wade stated that there is not a necessary relationship between the definition of legal personhood and a given theory of when life begins. One is the question of law, and the other a question of biology. On the question of law, responsible individuals do and will probably continue to disagree.

The right to a safe and legal abortion is under attack from a specific group of opponents who seem to believe that in their effort to protect fetal life, the sanctity of other lives may be threatened. Women have had their examining rooms invaded, children have come home from elementary school with threatening notes in their schoolbooks, and clinic bombings are seemingly now part of the territory—our own domestic version of terrorism. These incidences represent a trend that all free citizens should fear.

To conclude, I wish to reaffirm my support for programs which improve quality of life, funding for domestic and international family planning services, and legal right to a safe abortion. It is my belief that reproductive freedom is a basic human right, and I shall not deter from my responsibility to protect this right as secured by the Constitution.●

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

memorates the 20th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Freedom. On this date we pay tribute to the 1,500 Cubans who on January 23, 1966, assembled in Key West, FL, and set forth this historic document. More importantly, we pay tribute to the Declaration of Freedom itself. Similar to our own Declaration of Independence, it lays the cornerstone for a free and independent Cuba.

The 20 years which have passed since the signing of the Declaration of Freedom reflect a record of denial of human rights and civil liberties in Cuba. The Cuban people are denied the most basic of freedoms. Fidel Castro has no sympathy for freedom of speech, freedom of the press, or freedom of religion. He has denied his people the right to unhindered emigration and the common exchange of ideas. And he harbors little tolerance for dissenting opinion. Combinado Del Este and Boniato prisons and the atrocities committed within attest to this intolerance.

In Cuba, freedom does not exist. The hardship imposed by the denial of civil liberties is ever present.

The Declaration of Freedom serves as a rallying cry against the crimes committed by a brutal and merciless government; a government which condones cruel and lengthy prison sentences and subjects its prisoners to the harshest forms of physical abuse and mental torture. The Declaration of Freedom is a reaffirmation of the belief in democratic principles and in the dignity of man.

It is proper that we commemorate the 20th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Freedom, for it underscores the desire in every Cuban to see his homeland once again free. It embodies a spirit which burns as fervently today as it did 26 years ago when Fidel Castro first came to power and freedom was quickly extinguished in the island nation. This declaration encompasses the yearning of brothers wishing to see brothers set free. It is a statement by free men desiring to break the chains of those who are enslaved. And it stands in defiance of the actions and priorities of a ruthless dictatorship.

Mr. President, I ask that the Declaration of Freedom be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

In the city of Key West, Monroe County, State of Florida, United States of America, we, the Cuban exiles in the United States, in the name of God Almighty, and speaking both for ourselves and the oppressed people in Cuba, the Martyr Island, do say:

That on January 1st, 1959, the slavery yoke that came from Europe and was extinguished in Cuba at the end of the 19th century, was resumed.

That those responsible for this high treason to our Fatherland and our People are just a score of traitors who, usurpating the Government of the Country have been acting as mercenary agents for the Sino-Soviet imperialism, and have surrendered to that imperialism our Freedom and our Dignity, also betraying the American Hemisphere.

That as a consequence of this high treason, those who are usurpating the Power in Cuba (as they were never elected by the People), are imposing a regime of bloodshed, terror and hate without any respect or consideration to the dignity of the human being or the most elementary human rights.

That in their hunger for Power, these traitors, following the pattern of totalitarian regimes, are trying, within Cuba, to separate the Family, which is the cornerstone of actual society, and at the same time, are poisoning the minds of the Cuban children and youth, in their hope of extending the length of time for this abominable system.

That the rule of the law has been wiped out in Cuba, and it has been replaced by the evil will of this score of traitors, who are acting under orders from their masters, the Sino Soviet imperialists.

In view of the aforegoing,

WE DECLARE

First: That the actual Cuban regime is guilty of high treason to our Fatherland and to the ideals of the Freedom Revolution which was started on October 10th, 1868.

Second: That this score of traitors who have committed treason against our Fatherland, in case they survive the downfall of their regime, will have to respond, even with their lives before the Ordinary Courts of Justice of Cuba.

Third: That as the Noble Cuban People will not ever surrender, because that Nation was not born to be slaves, we, the Cuban People, hereby make the present

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

We hereby swear before God Almighty to fight constantly, until death comes to us, to free Cuba from communism.

The fundamentals of this Revolution for Freedom are:

First: God Almighty, above all things, in Whom we believe as the essence of Life.

Second: The Fatherland, with all of its Laws, traditions, customs and history as a spiritual value, only surpassed by the concept of God.

Third: The Family, as the cornerstone of the Human Society.

Fourth: Human Rights, for each and every citizen, regardless of race or creed.

Fifth: The Law, as the foundation for the proper development of the Human Society.

Sixth: Democratic Government, with its three independent branches: Legislative, Executive and Judicial.

Seventh: Representative Democracy, through the exercise of Universal Suffrage, Periodically, Free and Secretive, as the expression of Popular Sovereignty.

Eighth: Freedom of Worship, Freedom of Teaching, Freedom of the Press and Free Enterprise.

Ninth: Private Property and Ownership, as the basic expression of Liberty.

Tenth: The improvement of living conditions for both rural and city working masses, with the just and necessary measures, keeping in mind the legitimate interests of both Labor and Capital.

Eleventh: The derogation and eradication of anything which is opposed to the political and religious fundamentals aforementioned, and specifically, the abolition of Communism and any other form of totalitarian manifestation.

Signed and sealed in Key West, Florida, on the 23rd of January, 1966.●

OUR NATIONS ECONOMY

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent analysis of the myriad of forces affecting the health of our nations economy by the noted economist Lester Thurow which ran in yesterday's edition of the New York Times.

When viewed in context with the news this morning showing last years economic growth at the lowest level since the recession year of 1982 and the upsurge in consumer prices in the last quarter of 1985, we see a confluence of forces which have the potential to threaten our economic choices and opportunities. In raising these highly interrelated economic concerns, it is neither mine nor, I am quite positive, Dr. Thurow's intention to solely act as a harbinger of an economic Armageddon.

The real message here, I believe, is that our economic system is experiencing a variety of strains and that any attempt to deal with the lack of growth in our economy must be in the form of a multifaceted assault on all of these matters by the public and private sectors working in concert. How totally fitting that such a piece should appear on the day of convening for the 2d session of the 99th Congress for the problems which Dr. Thurow outlines should in fact be the overriding priority agenda of this Congress. Let us forget the posturing as to who will blink first in responding to the mandates of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and get about the business of putting this Nation's fiscal house in order and restoring confidence in our financial institutions. Professor Thurow describes the disease. It is now up to each one of us to assume at least partial responsibility for the cure.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

THE 20'S AND 30'S CAN HAPPEN AGAIN

(By Lester C. Thurow)

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—I am often asked whether the financial panics of the 1920's and the Great Depression of the 1930's could happen again. For 20 years, I have answered that what happened then could not happen now. Today, I would not so answer.

The loan portfolios of American banks include more than $500 billion in farm and third-world debt, where default is easily imagined. As oil prices fall, what were good oil loans are rapidly becoming bad ones. Major banks are sinking under the weight of falling real estate values. Mergers and leveraged buyouts lead to firms that can barely meet interest obligations in boom periods and that could not meet them in a recession.

Give any banking system enough nonperforming loans and it will crack: It must pay interest to its depositors but has no income.

Government compounds the problem by refusing to recognize that it has a duty to insure honesty and a safe place to park one's money. Fraud has played a role in many of the banking collapses that have already occurred, and the citizens of Maryland and Ohio know that their money is not safe. Government insurance funds are minuscule in comparison with probable losses. The public thinks it has the full faith and credit of the Federal Government behind it, but legally it doesn't. The net result is a banking system that is surely as fragile today as it was in the 1920's.

Financial markets are filling up with instruments—junk bonds, index futures, bundled mortgages—and the participants understand what they are buying and selling just about as much as they do when they are playing a hand of poker. One can easily imagine a default, say in the junk bond market, that would bring the salability and hence liquidity of these instruments to an abrupt halt. Yet everyone—consumers, businesses, Government—continues to go into debt at record rates.

A nervous stock market booms while the economy sags. Stagnation, farm bankruptcies, financial speculation, nonperforming loans, large potential defaults, falling real estate values (remember the Florida land boom and bust of the 1920's)—the echoes of the Great Depression sound louder and louder.

In the 1980's, international debt and not the stock market is apt to be the hammer that shatters a fragile financial system. This country entered 1986 with $100 billion in international debt, borrowing $150 billion a year to finance its trade deficit and being able to violate the first commandment of a Swiss banker: "Never lend money to someone who must borrow money to pay interest." By 1989, America will owe more than $600 billion to the rest of the world and have to pay more than $60 billion in interest payments—a sum that will require the annual output of 1.5 million workers.

Just as no one could predict when the stock market would crash in the 1920's, so no one can predict when the foreign lending will stop in the 1980's. But stop it will, for no nation can forever borrow ever larger sums. Since the world's wealthiest nation has never been the world's largest debtor, and since the world's reserve currency has never been held by a debtor nation, no one knows the thickness of the financial ice upon which the world is skating, but any unwillingness to continue lending hundreds of billions of dollars, much less an abrupt shift out of dollars, would create an instant liquidity crisis.

Yet as my colleague Charles Kindleberger, an economist, has pointed out, there is today no international lender of last resort. Would conservative governments be willing to instantly lend hundreds of billions (Japan and West Germany to the United States; the United States to its banks) and effectively nationalize the world's financial markets in the event of a run on the dollar? To do so would be to violate the deeply held principle that free markets take care of themselves. But not to do so would be to watch the system collapse.

It is not hard to imagine that governments will do too little too late if what must be done involves massive interventions violating their own principles. Each government marches on as if it could still go it alone. But "every nation for itself" might have been the motto of the late 1920's.

Societies have a tendency to make fundamental mistakes at 60-year intervals, since everyone old enough to remember the previous mistake is by then either dead or senile. Sixty years ago, the world was marching toward financial disaster. To pretend it cannot happen again and that governments do not have to act to protect the integrity of the system is to guarantee that it will happen again.●

THE NEW FEDERAL BUREAUCRACY POWER GRAB

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, as the U.S. Congress considers legislation to regulate and govern the activities of this great Nation, there is an underlying belief that is critical to the continuation of our democracy. This belief is that people are basically honest. This Nation's Founding Fathers envisioned a system of liberty, freedom, free enterprise, and individual growth undergirded by a belief that citizens may be trusted. As a matter of fact, this country's foundation is based on the principle that the trust in people will be held higher than the trust in government.

There is legislation now being considered in Congress that runs contrary to this basic belief. The proposed legislation could penalize every citizen of the United States for honest mistakes. When I say penalize, I mean the Federal Government could exact huge assessment from the people beyond actual damages to the Government for anyone making an honest mistake. Two bills, the Program Fraud Civil Penalties Act—S. 1134, and Civil False Claims Act amendments—S. 1562, when taken together, produce an onerous pattern of Federal legislation.

To cite just a few of the provisions contained in the bills:

No proof of intent to defraud is required, and no proof of actual knowledge of falsity. The reduction in this standard opens up the possibility of the Government charging fraud for a simple honest mistake such as not checking a statement carefully enough or omitting some information deemed to be important.

The burden of proof is reduced to a preponderance of evidence—well below that which is required to protect the average citizen from the vagaries of a Federal official which sets out to punish and intimidate people.

The inspectors general of each Federal agency would be empowered to unlimited subpoena rights including unprecedented authority to require personal testimony and interrogation. This power is extremely pernicious and would lead to unmeasured harassment of the people. Further, the agency would not have to tell the person the purpose of the subpoena or identify any transactions. They do not even have to tell the individual whether or not he or she is a target or merely a bystander.

One bill covers any application or statement such as an application for employment, a veteran applying for VA medical care, a farmer on a farm program, the IRS, Social Security applications, or seeking a Federal loan for housing. About the only Government employees not covered are employees of the legislative branch.

An individual can be fined by a Federal agency without any court trial. The amount may be in $10,000 increments but unlimited in total amount. For example, if an individual filled out 10 employment applications and each contained the same misstatement, the person could be fined $100,000. For more complex situations involving grants, loans, contracts, and so forth, the penalties could reach millions.

One bill applies to any false statements, even where no claim is filed and the Government has suffered no loss. It is not aimed solely at people with contracts with the Federal Government, but will cover anyone who makes a statement which proves to be untrue which is related to any program which receives any Federal funds, even if administered by a local government or a private company.

The unfairnesses are many, the previous are just a few.

What is at stake is whether the Government will be granted extraordinary powers to determine and proclaim fraud where there is no fraud as defined for all other institutions and individuals in this country. In short, what is right and wrong for you and I as ordinary citizens is not the same under the Government's standard.

The further question is—should the Government be exempted from the constitutional guarantees laid down by our Founding Fathers? In 1789, the Bill of Rights proclaims that "No person shall be—deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." For something as fundamental as individual and civil rights we must be sure a change is absolutely necessary. Before changes of the order and magnitude proposed are made to apply to federally funded programs, and only to them, we should consider carefully why these radical changes are needed, and if so, why no similar changes are needed in the laws applicable to the rest of us. The debate should be broad. In addition to the fundamental issue raised here, Congress should carefully determine the impact of such legislation on Government programs. In addition, we should evaluate the legislation's impact on effectiveness of Government programs.

As we in Congress seek to reduce the size of Government, much turbulence will be created to bring the budget under control. During this difficult time period, the Federal bureaucracy will tend to point the finger to others to deflect criticism for their inadequacies to manage. The proposed legislation would open up the potential for a level of harassment and intimidation of U.S. citizens unparalleled in our history. The great Founders and past leaders of this Nation have consistently called for external vigilance regarding Government powers. In 1787, John Adams said:

The way to secure liberty is to give them—the people—power at all times to defend it in the legislature and in the courts of justice.

Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis some 60 years ago observed that:

The greatest dangers to liberty lie in the insidious encroachment of men, well meaning but without understanding.

In 1940, the respected judge of the U.S. Second Circuit of Appeals, Judge Learned Hand, recognized the dangers of blaming problems of society upon other individuals. He said "a community is already in its process of dissolution where each man begins to eye his neighbors as a possible enemy."

It is vital that we focus on the insidious encroachment of a growing bureaucracy that threatens our free society.

More recently, John F. Kennedy spoke to this issue when he said:

Although our civil liberties also serve important private purposes—above all they were considered essential to the republican form of government. Such a government required that the consent of the governed be given freely, thoughtfully and intelligently. Without freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, equal protection of the laws, and other unalienable rights, men could not govern themselves intelligently.

It is with this perspective that I share with my colleagues this deep concern about vesting new powers in the Federal bureaucracy which runs contrary to the underpinning of the United States of America and its people.

In summary, S. 1134 and S. 1562 if enacted would vest with the Federal Government special arbitrary powers that are inimical to the interests of this country and its citizens. Over 200 years ago, John Adams gave us a guiding principle concerning Government power when he said, "nip the shoots of arbitrary power in the bud is the only maximum which can ever preserve the liberties of any people." This we must do.●

LEGALIZED ABORTION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, January 22, 1986, marks the 13th anniversary of the disastrous Roe versus Wade decision legalizing abortion on demand throughout the 9 months of a woman's pregnancy. Over these 13 years we have all heard endless justifications for the views of one side or another. But the abortion debate focuses on a clear, concise, undeniable truth that each and every one of us must accept if we approach the issue with any degree of objectivity: The offspring of human beings are human beings. Abortion is the deliberate killing of a human being without regard for the right to life all human beings enjoy, and thus is the greatest civil rights issue we have known or will know.●

RETIREMENT OF ANN CATON

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, upon the retirement of Ann Caton, many people who have known Ann in the Senate wish to express their appreciation for her 25 years of service as an employee of the Senate.

Ann Caton at all times has discharged the important duties and responsibilities of her office with great efficiency and diligence.

Her exceptional service and her continuous dedication to duty have earned for her our respect, esteem, and our affection.

On behalf of all of her many friends in this institution, I wish to commend Ann Caton for her lengthy, faithful, and outstanding service to the U.S. Capitol Guide Service Section 2.●

PHILIPPINE ELECTIONS

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, at this morning's hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Philippine elections, I expressed my serious concerns about how the anticipated results in the Philippines can impact on America's military and economic interests in the Pacific. I wish to share these views with my colleagues.

The article follows:

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON, SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE—HEARING ON PHILIPPINE ELECTIONS

Mr. Chairman, I want to express my appreciation for today's timely hearing on the Philippine elections.

This committee has worked together with an admirable bipartisan spirit as we've addressed the crisis in the Philippines. As ranking member of the Asian Affairs Subcommittee, I have welcomed the intense scrutiny this issue has borne from concerned committee members. We are united—Republicans and Democrats—in our commitment to promote democracy for the Philippine people. And we are united on this committee in our determination to protect America's vital interest in our Philippine bases—an interest which I am convinced can best be secured by a prompt end to the Marcos dictatorship.

I want to take a moment at the outset to give voice to a concern that I know has been on many senators' minds—and on the minds of senior Administration officials who are anxiously monitoring the developments out of Manila.

That concern is that the Philippine elections are looking more and more like a setup, a sham, that they are shaping up to be elections like the kind they have in the Kremlin—"elections" where the oligarchy always wins.

Consider the events of the past few days:

Worried that the eyes of the world might witness the massive fraud tactics used so successfully in the past by the Marcos machine, Marcos lieutenants have barred all foreign government officials—and journalists—from observing the voting.

Anxious that the opposition candidates might be reaching the Philippine people, President Marcos has intimidated news executives throughout the country; as a result, the opposition candidate has only appeared on the state controlled news three times in the past ten days. She is not quoted, and no footage of her enormous crowds are shown. Philippine journalists who continued to cover her campaign have been summarily fired.

Similarly, all five of the nation's TV stations have refused to carry the oppositions' commercials, which have been held up for censorship review by a board responsible for purging sex and violence from TV films.

—The nations' four largest newspapers, all controlled by Marcos cronies, read like campaign newsletters for the dictatorship, blatantly denying equal access.

—Consider that plans for computerized vote counting to reduce cheating have been dropped. Consider that General Ver, implicated by investigators in the assassination of Senator Aquino, still runs the military. Consider that citizen observers trying to establish a poll monitoring system are subject to fingerprinting and mugshots. Consider that none of the Election Commission vacancies have been filled—thereby ensuring that COMELEC is but another tool for the Marcos machine.

What does it add up to?

Well, Mr. Chairman, I know that if this weekend's ballgame in New Orleans were to proceed with one team getting ten downs, and the other but one, with one team allowed twenty players at a time, and the other only a few, with one team starting their drives from the fifty yard line and the other from their own end zone, why then I don't think we'd call it a Super Bowl. I think we would recognize it as a fraud.

It is clear Marcos is not allowing a level playing field, even with all his power, all his millions, even with his most formidable opponent dead from an assassin's bullet. I think we have to accept the fact that the Philippine election is shaping up as a fraud, a systematic attempt to deny the Philippine people their right to a fair election, their right to a democratic future.

Such a fraud would be an enormous boon for the communists and would have a devastating impact on U.S. security interests. In this respect, Ferdinand Marcos remains the best friend Moscow has in the Philippines today. For in the perpetuation of this crony dictatorship lies the swiftest path for an ultimate communist takeover in Manila.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I think we have to be very realistic. It doesn't look like Marcos is going to allow a fair election because he'd lose it. I believe the Reagan Administration must make clear—publicly and promptly—that the U.S. will sharply curtail its relations with the Marcos dictatorship if it continues between now and February 7 to defraud the Philippine people. We must be prepared to halt all military aid to this dictatorship. And we must accelerate the process of developing alternatives to our facilities at Clark and Subic Bay. For if fraud carries the day, the future for Philippine democracy—and for vital American security interests in that nation—will be terribly bleak.●

ADDRESS BY JOHN HUME, IRISH STATESMAN

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to an event of some considerable importance in the history now unfolding in Ireland, more precisely in Northern Ireland. Today, of course, by-elections are being held in a number of the British parliamentary districts in Northern Ireland, balloting which Members of this body are watching with interest. It happens coincidently that during the congressional recess just concluded the Catholic University of America awarded the degree doctorate of laws, honoris causa, to the Irish statesman, John Hume, M.P., M.E.P.

John Hume is the leader of the principal nationalist party in Northern Ireland, the Social Democratic and Labor Party. He is, in point of fact, a democratic leader of far greater consequence than merely his offices might suggest. A leader in the truest sense of the word; showing his people in word and deed the way forward, through difficult times, toward what may be hoped to be a peaceful, just, and prosperous society. A democrat he is most fundamentally, in a place and at a time where others are not always, where a commitment such as Mr. Hume's entails risks American politicians can only imagine.

Mr. Hume's professional career began in the classroom and so he was perhaps more at home at Catholic University than might otherwise have been expected. He is also a teacher by vocation and inclination.

Upon receiving the honorary degree from the president of the Catholic University, the Rev. William J. Byron, SJ, Mr. Hume was invited to deliver the Brendan Brown Lecture, sponsored by the Columbus School of Law there.

With explicit reference to the anniversary celebrated on that day, January 15, 1986, the birth of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., Mr. Hume entitled his address "A Society Is Richer for Its Diversity." His message was drawn in equal parts from the writings of Dr. King and the experience of the Irish people.

His theme, as Mr. Hume explained to his American audience, was taken from the obverse of the copper penny, "the smallest coin in this country" which bears America's message of greatest value, the cement of your society—E Pluribus Unum—from many, one.

In an age in which the most enduring and vicious of armed conflicts have been revealed to be based not in ideology and geography, but in the diversity of the world's ethnic experience, John Hume's is a message of tolerance and respect for the diversity of mankind's traditions.

It is no less vital a message in the United States than it is in Ireland—or Africa, or the Middle East, or Southeast Asia or Central America.

For the benefit of Senators, and other readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, who would like to contemplate the words of Juhn Hume—a man whose life's work has won the lasting respect and admiration of so many Members of this body—I ask that the complete text of the Brendan Brown Lecture, delivered here in Washington, DC, on January 15, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

The lecture follows.

ADDRESS BY JOHN HUME—MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT FOR FOYLE, MEMBER OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT FOR NORTHERN IRELAND

It is a great honor for me to accept this Honorary Degree from an educational institution of such high standing and prestige as the Catholic University of America. It is also a great pleasure for me to receive this award and to speak to you in an institution which has such a distinguished record of service in a whole range of fields corresponding to my own background and to the causes which I have sought to serve in my political life.

Coming from Ireland, which over 40 million Americans are proud to claim as the land of their birth or ancestry, let me salute the work and achievement of Catholic University in documenting, in studying, in celebrating the heritage of those Americans. Irish studies were initiated here 1896, the first Department of Irish Studies in any university in the U.S. only seven years after this institution opened its doors and over the intervening period, right up to the present day, the scholars who have graced these halls have made a contribution to the study of the rich linguistic, cultural and literary heritage bequeathed to us by the different major strands and traditions that have gone to make up the Irish nation.

The themes of heritage, of diversity and its acceptance, of the fight to end discrimination and to promote respect and recognition for minorities, are all themes for which this university is rightly celebrated and on which I hope to touch in my remarks here today and which go to the heart of Ireland's present tragedy. We are gathered here today at the beginning of the International Year of Peace and on the birthday of a great American, Martin Luther King, a man of world stature, whose principle of non-violence in the struggle for justice has been an inspiration and guiding light to me personally in my approach to the resolution of conflict, whether in Ireland or the international sphere.

You are, in this country heirs to beneficiaries of great traditions and principles of constitutional government which stand out as of particular value and indeed, as a standard of emulation and application in our own affairs in Ireland today. Through a process of development that was never easy or free of problems, you have gone very far in giving real, practical effect to equality before the law for every citizen and to equality of opportunity. Yours is a state where there is a wider measure of national and political consensus, fashioned from rich and broad diversity. From many you have one.

In America, there has always been respect for this idea of unity in diversity and whatever the controversies may be about the value and application today of the old melting-pot concept, there is, I understand, increasing acceptance of the idea of cultural pluralism. Again not without difficulty yesterday or devoid of controversy today, you have achieved religious toleration and established the separation of Church and State. Written on your smallest coin in this country is your message of greatest value, the cement of your society—E Pluribus Unum—from many, one. The essence of unity is the acceptance of diversity. The tragedy of divided people everywhere, as in Ireland, is that they have pushed difference to the point of division and have not yet learned the lesson that is the essence of unity in every democratic society in the world is to accept and respect diversity. To those among you who come from an Irish-American background, let me say, with no disrespect to those of you here whose ancestry and heritage are different, that you come from a community, which brought to the building of America qualities encompassed in the poet Yeat's description "the indomitable Irishry" and left a record of achievement in which you may take justifiable pride, as we in Ireland certainly do. That is a subject for another time but let me briefly recall how they brought to the support of a thirst for justice, appreciation of the power of organisation, reflected in the development of the labour movement and of popular, democratic politics. They were not all angels but in the main, rejecting the fatalistic claim that power corrupts, accepting instead the dictum of their fellow Irishman G.B. Shaw, "Fools corrupt power," they understood and applied the use of power, of politics, for good, as when in this nation, just over twenty years ago, John F. and Robert Kennedy embraced the vision of Martin Luther King and developed and applied the powers of the federal government in the interests of justice and equality for the black people of America.

The Irish Americans have also understood and put to good use the power of education, its power for the material and social advancement of the individual and of his or her community. They did not seek to improve their position in American society through violence or through any attempt to obtain or exercise a dominant position. Instead they harnessed the non-violent power of education, first saving from their meagre incomes as laboureres or servants the money that was necessary to educate their sons and daughters and, later applying the resources of any improved position to endow institutions of education such as the Catholic University of America and indeed, to support investment, economic and social development and cultural activity in Ireland itself. And all this progress without throwing a stone. The achievements of Irish in America from the background of starving immigrants and deep deprivation to positions of power and influence in all walks of American is one of the greatest success stories of non-violence in America.

In Northern Ireland, the people of Irish nationalist tradition whom I represent have followed the same path. We also shared that thirst and respect for education and when, after World War II, the policies of the British Labour Government greatly widened access to education, we seized the opportunities thus afforded. A new and highly educated generation emerged from the nationalist minority, as it also emerged among the Irish here and more lately among the black minority here, which was not prepared to accept intolerance and disadvantage as their legacy or as a future for their children. That new generation embarked on a struggle to achieve equal rights in the North of Ireland, including the right to have their political and cultural tradition reflected and expressed in the structures by which they were governed. The methods chosen by the great majority of them were those of nonviolent protest and of democratic politics which have served so well for both the Irish and the blacks in America.

Before expanding a little on those parallels, let me sketch in briefly the background to the problems in Northern Ireland whose travail figures so frequently and so tragically in the newspapers here in America.

The story of Northern Ireland is the story of conflict—not one I must explain a religious conflict, even though the two communities who live there draw much of their character and their coherence from their religious traditions. It is rather a conflict between the aspirations of ordinary men and women—600,000 Nationalists, 900,000 Unionists—who have been trapped by a tragic error of history which saw their hopes and fears as mutually exclusive and irreconcilable within an Irish state but which obliged them nonetheless to live and compete side-by-side in one corner of Ireland. These two communities in Northern Ireland, Catholic and Protestant, Nationalist and Unionist, both behave like threatened minorities and only by regarding them and only by removing the fears which they both feel can a just and durable solution be found.

Northern Ireland was born out of the insecurity of the Protestant-Unionist minority in Ireland itself. Fearful of becoming a minority in the Irish State then emerging sixty years ago, distrustful of the intentions of their fellow Irishmen, zealous to protect the advantages they believed they had under British rule, the leadership of the Unionist community sought and achieved, through threat of force, the acquiesence of Britain in the creation of a new political, territorial and artificial entity in Ireland wherein they hoped they could shape their own destiny as part of the United Kingdom. But the new self-governing political entity thereby established, called Northern Ireland, was neither secure or homogeneous. Caught within its boundaries was a substantial Catholic and nationalist minority, which felt itself Irish, and which did not cease to be Irish simply because legislation elsewhere had drawn a line on a map and declared that henceforth they were British. Thus Northern Ireland, served only to extend and aggravate this conflict by compressing the clash of majority and minority within an even more narrow and more rigid territorial, economic and social confine. Much hated little room maimed us from the start.

For over fifty years the Unionist majority sought to entrench their position through political gerrymander and discrimination. Though inexcusable, it was inevitable that they should have acted in this fashion—as other majorities have at times acted—since their inheritance was not a land of promise but a polity of insecurity. It was inevitable also that each attempt they made, at the expense of their neighbors, to strengthen their role and protect their privileges should serve only to disrupt the structures of society as a whole and to create new tensions and new insecurities. This was the case also in the deep south of the United States not too many years ago where an insensitive and insecure white majority held away. I have already referred to the parallel emergence in Northern Ireland and in the American South of a new articulate generation with expectations raised through education and impatient and angry at the injustices they suffered.

The American civil rights movement in the 60's gave birth to ours. Your successes were for us a cause of hope. The songs of your movement were also ours. We also believe that "we shall overcome": that rallying song is sung every year at my Party Conference. Most importantly, the philosohy of non-violence which sustained your strugle was also part of ours. Our own history and our own circumstances gave a special power to the counsel of Reverend Martin Luther King that violence as a way of achieving justice is both impractical and immoral. As he put it:

"It is impractical because it is a descending spiral ending in destruction for all. The old law of an eye for an eye leaves everybody blind. It is immoral because it seeks to humiliate the opponent rather than win understanding; it seeks to annihilate rather than convert. Violence is immoral because it thrives on hatred rather than love. It destroys community and makes brotherhood impossible. It leaves society in monologue rather than dialogue. Violence ends by defeating itself. It creates bitterness in the survivors and brutality in the destroyers."

Can anyone looking at divided societies in the world today like Lebanon, Cyprus and Ireland doubt the wisdom of these words of Martin Luther King?

The world in the 60's responded with sympathy to our non-violent movement for civil rights as it did to yours. But whereas here in the United States the structures of your democracy were resilient enough to encompass the challenge of civil rights, in the unstable political environment of Northern Ireland, our struggle was perceived as a threat to the very survival of the society itself and as such was resisted by the institutions of the State.

In the ensuing clash, the Unionist majority, through the imposition of direct rule from London, lost their local parliament which they had come to regard as the symbol of their independence and as the guarantor of their heritage. Though many would still wish to regard Northern Ireland as their exclusive homeland, they lack the power and indeed the freedom to shape their destiny as they once hoped. Though they dominate the security institutions of the State still, they have not found security as a people. This insecurity has led them to oppose change, even when that change is constructive.

Nevertheless through pressure on the British Government including the presence of sympathetic opinion in America and the world at large, we were able to make, through non-violent methods, major progress on a number of fronts, especially on the original demands of our Civil Rights Movement. These included one-man, one-vote, fair allocation of publicly provided housing and an end to job discrimination. Before that, gerrymander was rife in Northern Ireland and local elections and unfair voting systems were used by the unionist ascendency to control housing and jobs on a sectarian basis. Housing conditions in many parts of the North were appalling. Today the housing situation throughout Northern Ireland has been transformed due to the creation of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, a proposal which my own party, the Social Democratic and Labour Party, put to the British government of the day and accepted by them, thereby taking public housing allocation out of the hands of local unionist politicians. This has meant a major transformation in the living conditions of people throughout Northern Ireland. The electoral and local government system has been drastically altered with the introduction of proportional representation ending gerrymandering at the local level and drastically reducing the power of political bigots. A public regulatory agency, the Fair Employment Agency, for which we fought successfully but for which we want more teeth, is and has been a valuable watchdog in exposing, and making more difficult, discrimination by public bodies.

While we made these very worthwhile advances, affecting the lives of ordinary men and women, we encountered, as I have said, a blockage from the unionist parties, to our legitimate calls and efforts to secure for the nationalist people we represent effective political, symbolic and administrative expression of their identity, including a fair share in the exercise of political power in the executive, as well as the legislative branch of government. Moreover, the reforms we secured were not, regrettably, generously and openly offered by the majority party but had to be imposed on them by the British Government and Parliament.

Against the background of the resulting clashes and in impatience at the results achieved by peaceful, political methods, the philosphy of non-violence was rejected by a minority in my own community who followed the old law of an eye for an eye, who in the end were inevitably brutalised by the process in which they engaged, who in their savage anger and barbarous deeds have come to reflect themselves all of the hatred and sectarianism they had sought to overthrow and who, in their pursuit of violence, demeaned the cause we hold dear and lost us many good allies around the world. Sustained by their violence this terrorist group is beset by the illusion that they can, one day, impose their will on Ireland as a whole.

This violence, together with the unionist intransigence which gave it birth and the too long continued inadequacies of British policies in tackling the underlying political problem, has left us a bitter harvest. The human losses and economic costs have been enormous. The most tragic loss is that of the deaths of over 2,400 men, women and children. These deaths, in an area with a population of 1½ million, are equivalent in proportionate terms to the killing of approximately 350,000 in the United States. In addition, almost 25,000 people have been injured or maimed. Thousands are suffering from psychological stress because of the fear and tension generated by murder, bombing, intimidation and the impact of security countermeasures. In Northern Ireland, we now have the highest number of prisoners per head of population in Western Europe—in an area where twenty years ago, serious crime was practically unknown. The lives of tens of thousands have been deeply affected. The effect on society has been shattering. There is hardly a family that has not been touched to some degree by death, injury or intimidation.

Those of you concerned with Irish Studies will find the corrosive effects on community, to which Martin Luther King referred, in mutual fear and suspicion among neighbours, in the polarisation of small towns and countryside, in the erosion of the pieties, decencies and courtesies of civilised living, searingly evoked recently, with the savage indignation of Jonathan Swift, in the recent novel by my fellow-Ulsterman and frequent sojourner to America, Ben Kiely, entitled "Nothing Happens in Carmincross". These are the fruits of violence and of alienation.

For terrorist violence, while it can never be condoned or accepted, too often springs from the alienation produced by intransigence or neglect, by the failure to tackle political problems through the political process, by the failure to accommodate adequately the identity and aspiration of communities and peoples whether it is nationalists in Northern Ireland, Palestinians in the Middle East, blacks in South Africa or Jews in the Soviet Union.

I would quote Martin Luther King again: "When an individual is no longer a true participant, when he no longer feels a sense of responsibility to his society, the content of democracy is emptied . . . when the social system does not build security but induces peril, inexorably the individual is impelled to pull away from a soulless society. This produces alienation—perhaps the most pervasive and insidious development in contemporary society."

Although a consequence of the injustices of others, alienation is a desperate and dangerous development within minorities because it weakens their coherence, erodes their faith in progress and gives terrorism the opportunity to take root. As it was expressed by W.B. Yeats: "Too long a sacrifice can make a stone of the heart."

When a society produces alienation in the individual, when it cannot provide for the equality and the differences of its citizens, "when the social system does not build security but induces peril," that society must be reshaped and transformed through new institutions which accommodate diversity and promote the best basis for reconciliation.

This is the only way forward in Northern Ireland. Let me demonstrate this by considering the alternatives offered. There is the unionist approach the majority community in Northern Ireland of ascendancy, of seeking the exclusive exercise of political power in Northern Ireland for themselves, of ignoring the existence of a communiy, comprising 40% of the area's population who have a different identity and a different aspiration. They hark back to the past and speak of the future only with fear and foreboding, a paranoia encapsulated by a poet in the lines now taken up in graffiti on the walls of the area's largest city: "To hell with the future and long live the past, May God in his mercy be kind to Belfast"

One can join in saying "Amen" to the last line but the conflict reflects a sad condition, a seige mentality, rooted in insecurity, in prejudice, in fear of domination by a Catholic majority in Ireland, so-called "Rome Rule". Even if, in light of history and of the terrorist campaign of the IRA, some of these fears are understandable, they are groundless. There can be no solution to our problem which seeks to destroy or to crush the Protestant heritage in Ireland. It would be unthinkable. Accommodation of difference is the only basis of peace and stability in our divided society.

Then there is the other alternative, that of the Provisional IRA and their political wing. The military wing bombs factories and the political wing shout about unemployment, the military wing shoot a teacher in a classroom, kill school bus drivers, kill people on campuses and then the political wing lectures us about education. The military wing maim and injure, they carry out attacks in hospital precincts and then the political wing talk about protecting the Health Service. On a Friday morning their housing spokesman complains about a $6 million cut in the budget of the Housing Executive in Northern Ireland as a whole. On the same Friday evening their military wing blows up $2 million of public money in a single street. The political wing attacks the British Government for reneging on an agreement with the Irish Government to bring natural gas from the South and the military blow up the inter-connector that connected the electricity systems, North and South. The political wing condemn the execution of a young black poet in South Africa but the military wing execute a young unemployed man in a back lane in my own city or a trussed up young couple in the back streets of West Belfast. The real strategy and objectives are clear. Have the military wing create as much discontent and deprivation as possible. The more unemployment the better. Then have your political wing feed off the people's discontent.

My party, the SDLP, born out of the Civil Rights Movement, has rejected these two purported alternatives which in fact offer no hope for the future. Like Martin Luther King, we had a dream, like Theobald Wolfe Tone, the father of Irish republicanism, our vision has been "to substitute for the denomination of Catholic, Protestant and Dissenter the common name of Irishman." Our chosen strategy encompassed Reform, Reconciliation, and Reunification along a path of steady progress, continually narrowing the gap between the reality and the dream, using the political means of dialogue, persuasion, negotiation, accommodation, compromise. Violence can never heal the deep wounds that divide a people. Only a healing process can in time end the division in Ireland.

Our analysis is that the first necessary step in that healing process is the creation of total equality of treatment of all the citizens of Northern Ireland, nationalists and unionists alike, from basic civil rights to full expression of their identity. I have outlined the worthwhile—but still far from adequate—reforms and changes achieved in earlier stages of this reform process. But even after these, Northern nationalists in Northern Ireland remained within a state with which they could not identify, with institutions, a security system, cultural assumptions and official symbolism which are alien to them and appeared in many ways designed to make them strangers in their own land, in a situation where they were denied any constructive means of expressing their Irish identity and aspirations, their cultural and political identification with the rest of Ireland. Thus, the process of bringing about practical recognition and respect for equality between the two identities and communities remains to be completed. To achieve this was the first objective we set for ourselves.

On the basis of that equality on that, because reconciliation can only be based on equality, comes the process of reconciliation, the second element, in my party's long-term programme, the breaking down of barriers between the different sections of our people. No one can underestimate the difficulty of that task. It will take time, but it is a task that involves everyone and that will lead, coming to the third major element, to the only Irish unity that really matters, the only unity that all pre-partition leaders spoke of, a unity that respects diversity and legitimises differences. That is a process and objective that no one need fear because everyone must be part of the building process. Those who claim that their role and objective in politics is to preserve, protect and develop the Protestant tradition in Ireland have surely much more interest in a process such as this than standing forever apart, paranoid about the future precisely because they have refused to grasp the nettle of settling their relationships with the people with whom they share the island of Ireland.

In the analysis I am setting out the process of reform and reconciliation could best be tackled through a framework corresponding to the framework of the problem and thus, through the British-Irish framework, through an approach that dealt and deals with the three major dimensions of the problem—relations between the two communities in Northern Ireland, relations between both parties, the nationalist and unionist traditions in Ireland as a whole and relations between Ireland and Britain. A promising start along these lines was made following discussions between the Irish and British Governments in 1980 but these efforts suffered a major setback in 1981 and 1982, as a result of the trauma arising from the campaign and deaths of the hunger-strikers imprisoned in Northern Ireland. As a consequence in that atmosphere three years ago, we faced a bleak situation and prospect, with alienation greatly accentuated and more widespread among all sections of the nationalist community and with the political situation apparently in a state of deadlock and paralysis.

My Party took a fresh initiative at that stage, designed to break the logjam and to carry our analysis into the realm of practical politics. We put forward the proposal which came to fruition as the New Ireland Forum, a deliberative body of elected representatives from the four major constitutional nationalist parties in Ireland, both North and South, representing over 90% of the nationalist population of Ireland. The purpose was to hold consultations on the manner in which lasting peace and stability could be achieved in a new Ireland through the democratic process and to report on possible new structures and process through which this objective might be achieved or, in other words, to set out a modern up-to-date and formal statement or blueprint, setting out the principles and structures on the basis of which the constitutional nationalist dream of a new Ireland could be achieved. After a process of scientific study, public hearings and political debate and compromise, that body produced, in May, 1984, an agreed report which attracted widespread acclaim and support including from President Reagan and from the United States Congress, in a Concurring Resolution of both Houses, the first on Irish affairs since the 1920's. Against the background of a fresh and generous assessment of the realities of the situation, this Report proposed ten key and necessary elements of a framework within which a new Ireland could emerge. These proposals were firmly rooted in the concept of unity in diversity. Indeed, the kernel of the Report was set out in one of its paragraphs, as follows:

"The solution to both the historic problem and the current crisis of Northern Ireland and the continuing problem of relations between Ireland and Britain necessarily requires new structures that will accommodate together two sets of legitimate rights:

The right of nationalists to effective political, symbolic and administrative expression of their identity; and

The right to unionists to effective political, symbolic and administrative expression of their identity, their ethos and their way of life.

The Report of the New Ireland Forum was adopted as policy by the Irish Government and taken as the basis for a process of negotiation with the British Government which after 18 months and not without some setbacks along the way, led to the signature of a formal international agreement between the two countries about Northern Ireland, on 15 November last, at Hillsborough in Northern Ireland, by the Irish Taoiseach, Dr. Garret Fitzgerald and the British Prime Minister, Mrs. Margaret Thatcher.

The Agreement is a major achievement of democratic, non-violent politics. It is a significant step forward on the road to lasting peace and stability. No one amongst us feels it is the final solution. The Agreement tackles the problem of alienation head on and seeks to secure, in line with the central requirement identified in the Report of the New Ireland Forum, equal recognition and respect for both the nationalist and unionist traditions so that nationalists can raise their heads knowing their position is, and is seen to be, on an equal footing with that of unionists. The Agreement provides, in a unique arrangement reflecting the particular and unique situation in Northern Ireland, for the establishment by the British and Irish Governments of an Intergovernmental Conference concerned with Northern Ireland and with relations between the two parts of Ireland. In the Agreement, the British Government accepts that the Irish Government will put forward views and proposals on matters relating to Northern Ireland within the field of activity of the Conference and the British Government, together with the Irish Government, agree that in the interest of promoting peace and stability, determined efforts will be made through the Conference to resolve any differences. The range of issues that are within the Conference's field of activity comprises most of the matters in which the public authorities of a State exercise responsibility and includes political, security, legal, economic, social and cultural matters. The Conference is serviced on a continuing basis by a Joint Secretariat located in Belfast.

These provisions, going beyond consultative role but falling short of an executive role for the Irish Government, take nothing away from the rights of unionists. Northern Ireland continues to be governed, as unionists still wish, by the British Government. The Agreement rather adds a dimension which by giving institutional recognition to the Irish identity of those of the nationalist tradition, without detriment to the identity, of unionists, will enable nationalists to participate fully in the affairs of Northern Ireland without prejudice to their aspiration to Irish unity.

These arrangements are, as I have indicated, unique in international relations and law as, I am sure, those here familiar with these fields will recognise.

The Agreement has secured the support of substantial majorities of the population in Britain and in the Republic of Ireland. It has been greeted with satisfaction by a majority of nationalists in Northern Ireland although there is, among many, a consciousness that much depends on its practical implementaion, with firmness and fairness, by both Governments. Internationally, there has been unprecedented support including again from President Reagan and from both Houses of Congress.

But, surprise, surprise, there has been a strong negative and hostile reaction among unionists in Northern Ireland. The unionist political parties have embarked on a determined effort to set the Agreement at nought, if necessary, as their spokesmen express, by making Northern Ireland ungovernable. One may regard this opposition from a community used to ascendency, to having all power in their own hands, as understandable, even as inevitable: it is certainly not justifiable or justified. The Agreement takes nothing away from the legitimate rights or concrete interests from unionists, nor does it diminish in any way their political, cultural or spiritual heritage.

Particular opposition has been expressed to the Irish Government having a role in regard to the affairs and administration of Northern Ireland. But this attitude ignores the identity and aspirations of the people I represent, who constitute about 40 percent of the area's population. If there is an apprehension that the role of the Dublin Government represents the thin end of a wedge pushing towards a united Ireland against the wishes of a majority, the answer is in the second major feature of the Agreement itself. This recognises, in a binding international instrument, that which is a matter of fact, that Irish unity would only come about with the agreement of a majority of the people of Northern Ireland; and that the present wish of a majority there is for no change in that status. In this Article the two Governments also declare that, if in the future, a majority of the people of Northern Ireland clearly wish for and formally consent to the establishment of a united Ireland, they will introduce and support in the respective Parliaments legislation to give effect to that wish. Thus the Article of the Agreement devoted to the status of Northern Ireland recognizes the identity and aspirations of both traditions there. It also makes it clear that Britain has no interest of her own, strategic or otherwise, in remaining in Ireland and that Irish unity is a matter for those Irish people who want it persuading those Irish people who don't, thus removing any justification whatsoever for the use of violence. You cannot unite people at the point of a gun.

There have already been three meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference, and it is clear that it is tackling the agenda for its work set out in other provisions of the Agreement and that it provides an effective framework for the resolution of problems through the techniques of democratic politics. The priority now is to stand firm in upholding and implementing the agreement. The unionists will have to be brought to see that, this time, they cannot defy the will of the British Parliament to which they profess loyalty, as they did successfully in 1912 and 1974. They must be brought to realise that they cannot have matters all their own way. In this way they can be liberated from the prison into which they have locked themselves and, one may hope, led to embrace true politics which they have been able to eschew up to now largely like the Whites in the Southern states. The Whites would never have been liberated without the federal government.

When they are ready to do so, I and my party stand ready to meet them and engage in discussions on how we share our future together. We must begin the process of breaking down the barriers between us, barriers of prejudice and distrust which are at the heart of the conflict that has disfigured Ireland for centuries. We have a choice. We can live together or live apart. We have lived apart for too long and we have seen the bitter consequences. Or we can live together with all the painful readjustments that this will require. It is the only road to peace and stability for whatever happens we will be sharing the same piece of earth for a long, long time.

I hope that what I have said has served in some small way to demonstrate the potential of democratic politics and of the philosophy of non-violence to make progress toward the resolution of what is perhaps one of the more intractable political problems in the world today. I believe that these same principles are applicable in the field of international relations.

Ordinary men and women in both our countries have, in the last few years, responded with extraordinary generosity to the problem of famine in Africa. It is no accident that it was an Irishman, Bob Geldof, who has done most to awaken the conscience of the world to the problem of world hunger. It is no accident that per head of population the Irish contributed more to the Live Aid appeal and to this entire famine relief effort than any other country in the Western World. As I said recently in a speech in the U.S. Senate building:

"Our country knew famine in the last century. It is for that reason that our country has been so moved by the present suffering of Africa. We know that our famines were not simply natural disasters. History shows that Irish people were starved, or forced to leave their native land, because of unjust distribution of land, poverty and extortion which forced the production of cash crops for the wealthy abroad instead of food for the hungry at home, trade structures which knew no morality, and unequal power relations between countries. These are the same injustices and absurdities which crucify Africa today. Our famine brought the starving to America and to the rest of the world. May the present famine bring America and the rest of the world to the starving."

World hunger demands change, not just charity. These problems make ours pale into insignificance as does the other great issue. The awesome stockpiling of this issue is intrinsically interlinked with world hunger. Over one million pounds per minute goes into the provision of weapons whose only potential is to destroy the earth. The transfer of those vast resources to the developing world would not only solve the problem of starvation but would transform world markets and end unemployment in the developed world as well.

We know from hard experience that the nuclear arms race did not begin with the election of Ronald Reagan or the discovery of plutonium. It begins with the acceptance of force or might as a means of maintaining or achieving political dominance. It does not take an etymologist to tell us that terrorism and deterrents in the end are about the same thing, force and fear. We know that when we are dealing with human conflict whether in a divided community, a divided country or a divided globe that it is the building of mutual trust and not mutual fear that will solve the problem of conflict—not just in Ireland, but on the globe—because we know that human beings are no different wherever they live. We are whether in Ireland or globally with Martin Luther King:

"We still have a choice today: non-violent co-existence or violent co-annihilation."●

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, January 27, 1986, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, no resolutions come over under the rule, the call of the calendar be dispensed with, and following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed 1 hour in length, with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minues each; and provided further that the morning hour be deemed to have expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on Monday, then, we will convene at 12 noon. The two leaders, under the standing order, will have 10 minutes each and, as I have indicated, there will be a special order and morning business.

Following that, we hope to resume consideration of S. 638, the Conrail bill. I understand there is one amendment that can be agreed upon. It may be that the distinguished Senator from Washington, Senator GORTON, may have a motion to recommit which can be debated on Monday. If, in fact, there is a vote requested on Monday, the vote will occur on Tuesday.

Then, on Tuesday, a cloture motion will be filed on the bill and the cloture vote will occur on Thursday. But I am advised by Senators SPECTER, METZENBAUM, and others that there are a number of amendments that will be considered, and rollcall votes will be requested, I assume, starting on Tuesday.

So I indicate to my colleagues now that we could have rather late sessions on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week. It would be my hope to dispose of the Conrail legislation next week. That is my hope; it may not be a reality.

In any event, if we could do that next week, then we could start on TV in the Senate. That should not take long, a day or two or three and, hopefully, after that, the Genocide Convention and then the constitutional amendment to balance the budget and prayer in school. Counting Conrail, there are five right up front that all require extended debate. So I am not certain how many we will actually be able to turn to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until the hour of 12 noon on Monday, January 27, 1986.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 4:06 p.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 27, 1986, at 12 noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, January 23, 1986

The House met at 11 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God of peace, God of glory, God of hope, give to Your people that which will sustain and gives strength. Gracious God, people of good will look for direction to solve the ills of poverty, illness, war, and human rights and turn to You for encouragement. May Your spirit point the way to righteousness, and may Your people have the faith to stand for the right not only with words but with deeds of love and concern. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will inform absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 223, nays 87, answered "present" 6, not voting 118, as follows:

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce there will be no 1-minute speeches until after today's legislation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 268. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of Congress to receive a message from the President on the State of the Union.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2013. An act to delay the referendum with respect to the 1986 through 1988 crops of Flue-cured tobacco and to delay the proclamation of national marketing quotas for the 1986 through 1988 crops of Burley tobacco.

□ 1125

DELAY OF REFERENDUM AND PROCLAMATION OF NATIONAL MARKETING QUOTAS WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN TOBACCO CROPS

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2013) to delay the referendum with respect to the 1986 through 1988 crops of Flue-cured tobacco and to delay the proclamation of national marketing quotas for the 1986 through 1988 crops of burley tobacco, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2013

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 317(d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1314c(d)) is amended by inserting after the third sentence the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing sentence or section 312(c) of this Act, the referendum with respect to national marketing quotas for Flue-cured tobacco for the 1986 through 1988 marketing years may be conducted not later than the earlier of (1) thirty days after any proclamation of the national marketing quota for Flue-cured tobacco for the 1986 marketing year made after the date of enactment of this sentence, or (2) March 15, 1986.".

SEC. 2. Section 319(a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1314e(a)) is amended by inserting after the second sentence of the third paragraph the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing sentence, the proclamation of national marketing quotas for Burley tobacco for the 1986 through 1988 marketing years may be made not later than March 1, 1986.".

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill, S. 2013, which will simply delay for 30 days the scheduled referendum of farmers on marketing quotas for the 1986 through 1988 crops of Flue-cured and burley tobacco.

Tobacco farmers in Kentucky have asked for this extension of time before holding the referendum in order to sort out the confusion about the future terms of the Federal Tobacco Program. Very frankly, Congress created this confusion by failing to do its job last year.

As many of my colleagues are aware, there is comprehensive legislation to reform the tobacco program in the budget reconciliation bill which the Congress failed to complete action on last session.

The tobacco reform legislation would make significant changes in the methods by which marketing quotas and price supports are determined. However, since that bill has not yet been passed, tobacco farmers are being asked to vote on the "rules of the game" before they know what the rules are. I don't think that is fair. The farmers have a right to know what they are voting on. Forcing them to vote in a referendum before they know how their livelihoods may be affected is unfair and simply cannot be justified.

I urge my colleagues to support S. 2013 and give tobacco farmers an opportunity to make an informed decision about their future.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I wish to go on record at this time to state that it was the intent of the House with respect to the legislation passed in the first session of this Congress regarding the burley tobacco price support reduction, that that price support reduction was temporary in nature and related to the 1985 crop of burley tobacco only.

It was not the intention of the House that such 1985 price support level for burley tobacco would be the benchmark for all future levels of price support if our basic legislation contained in the budget reconciliation bill was not enacted into law by early 1986.

In fact, my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 18, 1985, when the price support reduction bill (S. 1851) was being considered, makes this point clear:

I want to clarify that this bill only impacts on the 1985 crop of burley tobacco. If further legislation is not passed, the price support part of the program will revert to permanent law and the 1986 price support will be at the same level as it would have been if the 1985 level had remained at $1.78.

The Department of Agriculture's proposed price support level for the 1986 crop of burley tobacco, announced recently, unfortunately did not take the legislation history of S. 1851 into consideration, but certainly that oversight can now be corrected.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on S. 2013, the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY ACT

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 357 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 357

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2443) to limit the number of days a depository institution may restrict the availability of funds which are deposited in any account, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, each section of said substitute shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. No amendments to said substitute shall be in order except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate and amendments printed in the Congressional Record at least one legislative day prior to their consideration. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DANIEL). The gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to my friend, the able gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR], and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution No. 357 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee. The rule makes in order the Banking Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as the original text for purposes of amendment. The substitute will be considered by sections, and each section will be considered as having been read.

Mr. Speaker, the rule waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI which prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill. Only those amendments printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at least 1 legislative day before their consideration will be in order. Pro forma amendments for purposes of debate will be in order as well. The rule provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, this rule waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI. Clause 5(a) of rule XXI prohibits consideration of a measure that contains appropriations but was not reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The waiver is necessary because H.R. 2443 directs the Federal Reserve Board to establish an advisory council. Members of the council, while attending its meetings, would be entitled to compensation at a rate fixed by the Board but not to exceed $100 a day. These costs are small but necessary. In fact, funds already available to the Federal Reserve may be used. The provision is an appropriation because it directs that the money be used for a specific purpose. The advisory council would enable the Federal Reserve to consult regularly with consumers and the private sector while the Board designs a better system to expedite the availability of deposited funds. The work of the council could not be performed by any existing agency or advisory committee.

The resolution before the House limits amendments to those printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Members should be aware that germane amendments to amendments under consideration need not be printed in the RECORD. Of course, pro forma amendments for purposes of debate will also be in order.

Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself perhaps a little bit more in detail as to why it was that the Rules Committee required the printing of proposed amendments in the RECORD. We do not like to do that. We want the membership of this House to have the fullest possible and desirable opportunity to offer amendments to legislation that is before the House for consideration. But there are times when there are reasons why we do limit the amendments to those printed in the RECORD.

Now, Members should remember that even if that occurs, an amendment printed in the RECORD is subject to amendment, so if you can amend that amendment, you are not denied the privilege of doing that.

One of the occasions when we had a striking need to do that was when we had the immigration bill up before us. We had hundreds of amendments, complicated in character, extensive in effect, and if we had not had the amendments printed in the RECORD, Members would not have had a fair opportunity while the bill was before the consideration of the House to evaluate those various multiple amendments.

Now, in this particular case, this is a sensitive area of legislation. To put one amendment on this bill which is nongermane broadens the scope of the bill to determine what other amendments may be germane.

It may open that piece of legislation, which we started to consider as limited in character, to be very expansive in its existence and character; that is, laying open a whole gamut of new legislation in the field of banking.

This is a critical matter for the economy of our country. We simply felt that this bill, so far as I am aware, is not seriously controversial. Therefore, it would seem to us only reasonable, and I will show you the justification that has already occurred, whether the amendment already offered is being considered right now by the Parliamentarian and the Parliamentarian has advised us that he has some doubt about the germaneness of that amendment. He has not yet made up his mind, as of my last contact with him, about whether this amendment is germane or not. It could just be popped up on the floor by somebody and the Parliamentarian would hardly have the time to deliberate on it and consult the precedents and make whatever study he cared to make if the rule did not require the printing of amendments in the RECORD.

So we just thought that in a critical matter like this, we did not think we were doing serious harm to the rights of any Member to require the amendment to be printed in the RECORD so all Members would know what amendments are coming up and, of course, as I said, those amendments would be subject to amendment.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2443 and the accompanying report, including the Banking Committee amendment, have been available since November 26, 1985. If Members wanted to offer amendments, wanted to make inquiries about the contents of this bill, it has been in existence since the 26th of November.

The record of the Banking Committee shows that the issues in dispute are well-defined. Thus the printing amendment, we believe, is not an undue burden, but rather a benefit to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2443 directs the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve to design a system to speed up the availability of deposited funds. This bill is designed to help the people of the country who utilize the banking system of the country to get the use of their money without unnecessary delay on the part of the banking institutions handling those checks. Unnecessary and unreasonable delays in the availability of funds have harmed consumers and small businesses.

The Banking Committee found that State governments, Federal agencies, and the financial industry have tried unsuccessfully to curb these abuses.

H.R. 2443 provides for a coordinated Federal response to the problem. It is a timely issue and it should be debated. I, therefore, hope that in due course, this rule will be adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 357 is a modified rule under which the House will consider a bill creating a check-clearing schedule at the Federal Reserve that limits the amount of time banks can hold checks before giving customers access to their deposits.

Mr. Speaker, the bill made in order by this rule is an attempt by the Committee on Banking to improve the Federal Reserve system check-clearing process to insure depositors of more timely access to their funds.

The bill, H.R. 2443, is not all that controversial, but I must say that one of the provisions of this rule is somewhat unusual for a bill of this type.

Mr. Speaker, our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] has explained that this rule requires the printing of amendments in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 1 day prior to their consideration. The practical effect of this provision is that you needed to have your amendments in the RECORD yesterday in order to have them considered today.

I want to compliment our chairman, Mr. PEPPER, not only for his explanation today, but also for his statement here on the House floor yesterday. He helped put the Members on notice about this requirement, and we appreciate that.

Mr. Speaker, in some circumstances, a printing requirement of this kind for amendments is another way of limiting the amendment process. In other circumstances, a printing requirement serves the interests of all Members because it gives the managers of the bill a chance to compare the language of proposed amendments to the language reported by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, although I am generally opposed to this sort of advance printing requirement on amendments, I do want to say that the Committee on Rules included this provision on its own. Neither the chairman of the Banking Committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] nor the ranking Republican member of the Banking Committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] asked for this provision.

As a consequence of this rule, today's RECORD contains two complete substitutes and 12 additional amendments to the bill itself. The authors of the two substitutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] have reservations about the committee bill and the rigid schedule it contains.

The Wylie substitute gives the Federal Reserve Board the authority necessary to produce a system for faster customer access to deposited funds, but does not have the Congress write the technical requirements for them.

Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of requests for time, so I will conclude by reminding Members that this rule is unusual only because it requires the printing of amendments yesterday. Were the situation different, I would strongly oppose such a rule. In this case, however, I can see no good reason to delay consideration of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to express my objection to House Resolution 357, the rule accompanying H.R. 2443, the expedited funds availability bill.

At the outset, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I support the goals included in H.R. 2443 and I intend to vote for the bill on final passage. I have no illusion but that the rule will be adopted.

I support the concept of the bill because it is similar to some legislation which I offered early in the year in H.R. 15, which was the first bill introduced in this Congress on the subject; but, Mr. Speaker, I think that in this first rule of the 2d Session of the 99th Congress that we ought to be aware that this is a gag rule provision and it is preposterous to have a gag rule on a bill which is not controversial. Everybody is for expedited funds availability.

Now, I hope that this does not portend other gag rules on other subjects coming from the Rules Committee. As was pointed out by the gentleman from Missouri, the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] asked for a 1-hour rule with open debate, an open rule, which I supported when we testified before the Rules Committee yesterday.

There were apparently some rumors that maybe something from the interstate banking bill, H.R. 2707, or perhaps something from H.R. 20, might be added to this consumer bill.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] and I both agreed that any amendments like that would not be germane and that we would raise the necessary points of order so that nothing from those two bills would be included in this bill, that the interstate banking issue should be left for another time and the nonbanking issue should be left for another time.

Unfortunately, and I must surmise that the majority of the Rules Committee did not accept our word on this score, there is absolutely no need to have a rule which requires an amendment to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 1 day in advance of the consideration of the bill. To my knowledge, the Banking Committee has never requested anything but an open rule for legislation which is reported directly from our committee.

This kind of a rule does a disservice to all Members of Congress, Mr. Speaker. The expedited funds availability bill is basically a good bill, but it is not a perfect piece of legislation. Members ought to have an opportunity to offer germane amendments.

Now, it is possible during the course of the debate on the floor here today that some Member of this House might want to offer an amendment which he thinks would improve the bill. Under this rule, he would be precluded from offering such an amendment because it was not printed in the RECORD yesterday.

Now, I do not think that this is the right way to go about legislating. For that reason, I do raise an objection to the rule.

I also want to suggest that I will put my colleagues on notice that although I will not ask for a vote on this rule today, that if in the future a rule like this comes from the Rules Committee where the members of the Banking Committee have asked for an open rule, that I will oppose the rule.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to strongly oppose this rule on the basis of the rule.

Now, we will have a debate over the bill itself and there will be some amendments offered which may improve it, and that we can do later.

It seems to me to set on the opening day of this session an unthinkable precedent to start this session with what is a modified closed rule; in fact, even the chairman of the Rules Committee, and I was glad to hear him say it, said that he does not like a rule like this. I think a rule like this, a modified closed rule that attempts to stop amendments that are offered by members of the committee or others, in fact, could have a place in a complicated tariff bill or a bill that required a computer run in advance to decide on a formula or some kind of a tax bill.

Now, I have only been in this House 3 years, but I cannot remember a bill like this, which is just simply a new authority for the Federal Reserve, to be closed or gagged. This is not a tariff bill. This is not a tax bill. There is not a single computer run of a formula that has to be run in advance.

Mr. Speaker, this amounts to—and I know the chairman of the Rules Committee does not intend it this way—but it amounts to a very partisan rule in a very partisan way to open the session.

I do not think anyone in this House wants to start this session on such a partisan note.

This is going to be and ought to be a serious session, a session in which the American people are looking at us to solve on both sides of the aisle the issues of the deficit, the issues of trade, the issues of terrorism, the issues of Central America, the issues of liability reform, and to start off on a bill like this, which is a bill that has some controversy, but not a lot, on the very first day back and to flex our partisan muscles through the Rules Committee is not the way to lead to a good session. It is not the way to lead to a debate on the major issues of the day in which the Congress as a whole can come together on the issues.

I very much urge the House to follow the advice of the chairman of the Rules Committee and to say, "Mr. Chairman, we also don't like a rule like this."

This rule, a closed rule, in effect is not in order in this bill or a bill like it. We do not like it and we would ask the Rules Committee to come back with a bona fide open rule so that the process of the House can work its will.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is going to make any difference as far as what finally happens, because those who wanted amendments, they found out about it, they rushed up and put their amendments in. I do not think any amendments that are nongermane are going to be offered or could be or would be accepted in any event. That is what we have the rules of the House for; but this is a precedent-shattering way to start a session that should be a session in which this Congress is expected to grapple with the issues of the day and not fall into partisanship on the very first day.

I am disappointed that the Rules Committee would bring a rule like this on this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge a "no" vote on this rule for precisely, I think, the underlying reason that the gentleman from Texas was just saying.

This rule represents politics as usual. The fact is that America, I think, as it looks at Congress in the year of Gramm-Rudman and Congress as we move toward trying to learn how to balance a budget and what may be the most intense Congress in terms of the issues we deal with that we have had in a very long time.

America is dividing up, not only on Democratic and Republican grounds, not on liberal or conservative grounds. I think there is a bipartisan tendency in America on a nonideological basis to divide up on the issue of whether you want politics as usual or whether you are ready to get the job done to change things so that we can get America in shape so our kids and our grandchildren have a chance for a decent life.

The fact is that there are two grounds for voting "no" on this rule. First of all, this rule is a serious first step by the Committee on Rules and the power structure of the House to begin to take power away from the Committee of the Whole, to begin to make it harder and harder for the average Member to have impact, to hide from the C-SPAN cameras and the public and the news media, to go to small rooms in corridors seldom wandered into and have three, four, or five people decide what amendment is appropriate, what is really correct.

There is a second reason. In my judgment, and I say this, I guess I was finally compelled to move, by the Common Cause magazine cover story, "From Rags to Riches," the cover story, which every Member of this Congress should look at because it raises fundamental questions about the Congress, about what we have been doing for the last year, about the issue of whether or not the American people should trust their representative body.

I would like to suggest, without naming any individual Member or getting involved in any details, that it is inappropriate for this House to take up any issue from the Banking Committee until changes have been made either in the Banking Committee or the Ethics Committee as reported.

For us to start this year by pretending we are engaged in business as usual, in politics as usual, and the same old stuff, I think justifies the kind of anger that the Common Cause magazine cover story "From Rags to Riches" indicates. The American people have the right to expect the average Member of this House to force some minimum level of responsibility and some minimum level of accountability without regard to what might happen in closed rooms and behind closed doors.

In my judgment, every Member of this House should set the tone for this year by voting "no" on this rule because on the procedural grounds of taking power away from the Committee of the Whole and on the specific grounds of this particular committee at this particular time, it is wrong for this bill to come to the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me for an additional comment.

Since the earlier debate, it has come to my attention that the members of the Banking Committee on the other side of the aisle did not ask for this rule. I wonder if there is a member of the Banking Committee that I could yield to to respond to that.

It is my understanding that no one on the Banking Committee asked for a closed rule on this matter.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman is on the floor. I did not see the chairman. My understanding is that the chairman is here.

The Banking Committee had requested an open rule on this particular matter. I am going to vote for this rule, but if the question is what the Banking Committee requested, my understanding is that the Banking Committee, through its chairman, asked for an open rule.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am sorry. I was out conferring with the ranking minority member on the legislation, but I think if anybody were to look at the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings before the Committee on Rules, they would see that the request from the Banking Committee was for an open rule, 1 hour of general debate, a very pure and simple request.

Mr. BARTLETT. I very much appreciate the gentleman's clarification and appreciate the Banking Committee's request for an open rule, which is what we like.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I had no control over the decision.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] has described this bill correctly. It is a business-as-usual rule around here and now we are finding out just how much business as usual.

If I now understand the colloquy that has just taken place, we have a rule before us that the Banking Committee did not request. The explanation that was given to us was that the reason why we had to limit the availability of amendments in this particular rule was because we were afraid that some amendments might come in that would broaden the scope of the bill. Evidently the Banking Committee had no such fears and the Banking Committee asked for an open rule.

Yet the Committee on Rules, which is largely dominated by the leadership of this body, has decided that instead, the Committee of the Whole shall be limited, that we shall not be able to address issues that might otherwise legitimately come before this body and that we will proceed with business as usual and that we will end up gagging the Committee of the Whole once again with this rule. This is, in fact, business as usual.

I think if the committee wants to broaden the scope of this bill, we ought to have the right to broaden the scope of this bill. In fact, there are some things dealing with the Federal Reserve that a number of us think ought to be looked at, that the monetary policy of this country needs to be examined, and if there is some way within this rule that we could get at some of those Federal Reserve questions and get at the questions of interest rates that are driving farmers out of business and driving small businesses out of business, that we ought to indeed deal with those out on the floor, but we are not going to be able to because we cannot bring those up in the Committee of the Whole.

This is a business-as-usual rule. Here we go again into another year and we are going to deal with things just as though nothing was happening in the country, just as though nothing has happened with regard to a balanced budget and all these issues that are coming before us.

I will tell the Committee of the Whole something else. There is a provision down in this rule that grants a waiver to allow appropriations within an authorization bill. That is right. We are going to violate the procedures around here and allow spending of money within an authorization bill, actual appropriations within an authorization bill, and waive the rules of the House in order to do that. That is what we are doing, and we do not have a Budget Act waiver for it, and the reason why, I am told, we do not have a Budget Act waiver is because we have language in the bill which says that they do not really need to spend the money. The fact is, though, we have allocated $100 a day for members of the commission who would participate under some provision in this bill. That is appropriations in an authorization bill. It is specifically waived by this rule. It specifically goes to the issue of spending.

I would suggest a "no" vote on this rule. It is precisely the right vote. It is the wrong rule at the wrong time and it ought to be voted down.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to clear something up here. The advisory council that is contained in the legislation is not paid from appropriated funds. The funds are from the Fed, and as we know, the Fed has its own funds. They are not appropriated funds. Therefore, to the best of my knowledge, I do not think a waiver is required.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would yield, the fact is that the waiver is in the rule. This rule waives rule XXI, which is specifically waiving the provisions.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further time. What I am saying is that even though the waiver is in there, it is an unnecessary waiver. It is not needed because there are no appropriated funds. The funds are coming from the Federal Reserve Board and they do not come under the jurisdiction of Appropriations. They have their own funds.

I cannot say why the Committee on Rules chose to put that waiver in there, but it is an unnecessary waiver.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to understand that from what I am told, the Parliamentarian feels as though that waiver is, in fact, necessary in here, and if it is unnecessary we have another flaw in the rule. So far we have learned that the rule is flawed because the Banking Committee did not request a closed rule, yet they got one, and now we are finding out there is a waiver in there that the chairman of the Banking Committee says is not needed.

So it seems to me that we have a terribly flawed rule out here, and it gives us one more reason for voting "no." It is high time, I think, we get out act together. I go back and say again that this is business as usual. It is typical of the way this House has performed, and no wonder the American people get disgusted.

□ 1200

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

To the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would say I have just checked with the Parliamentarian and he agrees the point I made about the Fed is absolutely correct, and that as far as the advisory council is concerned there is no waiver necessary on that point. That is the point I was making.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsyvlania.

Mr. WALKER. Then why is it in there?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Do not ask me. I am just telling you that it is not necessary.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] answer?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I say to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], the reason the Rules Committee put a waiver is because this provision was in the bill and the Parliamentarian said it needed a waiver, and we gave it a waiver in the rule.

Mr. Speaker, one of the distinguished gentlemen speaking in the well, as I understood it, made some reference to this looked like it was a partisan rule. I wonder if that gentleman has checked the amendments that were filed before 6 o'clock yesterday evening to this bill, and by whom they were filed? I have verified it at the desk, and there are 15 amendments that were offered yesterday, and every one of them was by a Republican.

That does not look very much like it was intended to squeeze out the Republicans who might have something to say about this bill.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfortunate that legislation designed after lo these many years to correct an inequity on behalf of the consumers of this Nation is becoming embroiled in a debate that has nothing whatsoever to do with the merits of the bill. We have waited too long. The consumers of this Nation have seen the banks of this Nation use their money to make money. The consumers of this Nation have had fees tacked onto their accounts for checks returned for insufficient funds when all along the funds were in the account, but the bank said to the consumer, "You cannot have that money yet because we want to use it for a period of time to make more money for ourselves."

Now, ladies and gentlemen of the House, since 1978, the Federal Reserve Board has been studying this issue. We finally got sick and tired of it. They told us this last year, year before last and when they came back before us again this past year, said give us more time to study.

Ladies and gentlemen, the time has come for us to say to our constituents when you deposit a Treasury check, you do not have to wait 2 weeks to use your money; it is there the next day.

I hope that we are not going to lose sight of the primary issue here, and that is the unfairness, the inequity to the consumers of this Nation. Let us at long last put an end to the use of the float by the banks and give people the benefit of their hard-earned moneys.

I thank the chairman of the Rules Committee for yielding.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 9 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the Rules Committee for yielding me this time.

I just want to concur with the chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs that it is important that we keep our eye on the ball, and the ball in this case is to make sure that the consumers, the customers of banks and savings and loans and thrifts are getting a fair deal. I think on balance this bill ensures that.

Some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have suggested today that they do not like this rule, and quite frankly, neither do I. With those people who came to the well and suggested somehow there are partisan politics involved in the crafting of this rule, I say you are wrong. Speaking as a Democrat, quite frankly, I would much rather have the kind of rule that the chairman of our committee requested. It did not happen, but it is not because of partisan politics.

I appreciate the explanation of the chairman of the Rules Committee as to why the rule was proposed that is before us today, even though I do not fully concur with the rationale and the reasoning. I would like to say in response to one of the observations on the other side of the aisle that there are, indeed, other paramount issues that have been reported out by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, major legislation that awaits action of the Rules Committee. I would like to yield to the chairman of the Rules Committee to find out when we might expect some action on two of those bills. One is H.R. 20, the so-called nonbank banking loophole closer, and the other companion bill is legislation dealing with the phase-in of interstate banking. I yield to the chairman for some update on those pieces of legislation.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the distinguished gentleman for his inquiry and the distinguished chairman for his excellent statement here a moment ago.

There are three critical bills that are pending now before this House in various stages of consideration. One of them is the bill about interstate banking which has the trigger to make lawful intrusion of interstate banking into the several States. That came out of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

The other one is the nonbank banking bill. We have been anticipating that there would be a decision of the Supreme Court. It came out yesterday, and the chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee before our Rules Committee yesterday asked us to give consideration now to H.R. 20, which will regulate nonbank banking now that the Supreme Court has said it may exist in large volume in the country. And I have no doubt but what the Rules Committee will give early consideration, I say to the distinguished chairman, to his request made yesterday.

The other one is the bill about holding checks. The real reason that we granted a limitation on amendments, that is, requiring them to be offered in the RECORD yesterday, we did not want these three issues to be jumbled and not considered each on its merits. They are all important pieces of legislation. Had we not required this submission of amendments, some amendments could have slipped in on the floor, even without the chairman perhaps detecting it which would have changed the whole scope of that legislation, and perhaps encouraged the other body to enlarge its consideration of the same thing.

When we deal with these critical matters about banking, we ought to be dealing with them straightforward and fairly, and we are going to see to it that that is done.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPER. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I might state that in my opening remarks to the Rules Committee yesterday, you made it very clear that neither H.R. 20 nor, I think, it is H.R. 2347, I may be wrong on the number, but the interstate banking bill, neither one of those could be considered germane, in order, in any semblance, in any way, shape, matter, or fashion.

I also gave my word to the Rules Committee that I would resist any attempt by the other body in conference to add either of those, because I have maintained all along as well that they should be considered separately on their merits. So I did want to make it clear that I was prepared here to be very alert, very alert that the rules of the House be observed, and that there be no nongermane amendments of the type the chairman of the Rules Committee referred to as being tacked onto this bill. I just want my committee members and everyone in the House to be aware of the fact that that commitment was made to the Rules Committee.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCHUMER. I thank my distinguished colleague from Delaware.

First I would like to reiterate what the chairman of the committee said. I am an advocate of interstate banking, opposed to the gentleman from Florida's position. As far as I know, there was no attempt by anybody who advocated interstate banking to amend this legislation and add any kind of interstate banking for it.

I am for one very heartened by what the chairman of the Rules Committee has said, that he believes that that bill, as well as H.R. 20, which the Supreme Court decision importunes us to consider shortly, will be considered by the Rules Committee shortly for an up or down vote so that we get a chance to go on the floor. That having happened, I would say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that what the gentleman from Florida has said as well as the chairman I think should clear the air. There is no attempt to dictate to the minority or to any Member of this body what should be added or subtracted to the bill before us, provided it is germane.

That does not deal with the two issues embodied in H.R. 20 and interstate banking, and all of the other issues, and any feeling that we were trying to muzzle the matter is incorrect. I think what happened is it was a matter of crossed signals, and I would say to every one of my colleagues, and I will just conclude quickly, the issue here is whether the consumers of this country get their rights. And whether we agree with that or not, let us not let other budget, interstate banking or other extraneous issues interfere.

I very much appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPER. I yield to the chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, just briefly, I would like to again say to the Members of this House, everybody has assured each other and let us now assure the people of this Nation, the consumers of this Nation, and let us let them know that our first act in this Congress is to do something for them rather than to take something away from them.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPER. I yield briefly to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, because somehow the debate has gotten away. I very much appreciate what the chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee has said on the issue of this being partisan, and I will say it again, the rule does have nothing to do with the bill at all, the gentleman is correct. I very much appreciate and we all appreciate the chairman of the committee asking for an open rule.

I also appreciate what the gentleman from New York said, but he said there is no attempt to dictate what can or cannot be offered that is germane. This rule dictates, this rule is a modified closed rule for no apparent reason. The rules of the House in clause 7, rule XVI, would prohibit any nongermane amendments. That is what we have the rules of the House for. This House ought to start off this session on the right foot, and bills that deserve an open rule, which is almost all legislation as the chairman of the Rules Committee and the chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee have said, ought to get an open rule so that all Members are permitted the opportunity to offer germane amendments. That is what we have the rules for, and that is what we have a Rules Committee for.

I think the Rules Committee ought to start over and bring us back a rule that can debate the merits of the bill and not attempt to suppress debate.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. CARPER. Let me say in conclusion, if I may, I intend to support this rule without enthusiasm. I would add as a Member of an authorizing committee, it is frustrating for me, and I suspect for every Member of authorizing committees in this House to work on legislation, to mark up legislation, to report it out to the floor, to the full House, and months after having done so, to still be waiting for the full House to take action on that legislation.

I am pleased to hear the chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee indicate, as well as the chairman of the Rules Committee, indicate we are going to get half a loaf, perhaps, on the bills that we have reported out of the Banking Committee. I certainly hope that the chairman of the Rules Committee and the ranking minority member and so forth will consider giving us the other half of a loaf so that we can at least debate the issue of a phase-in of interstate banking here before the Members of this body and before the public at large.

I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to associate myself with the remarks made by the gentleman from Delaware when he spoke of the frustration many of use on the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee have experience as a result of having the legislation we worked very hard on and passed out of that committee come to this floor, only to have it bottled up in the Rules Committee.

We have heard here this morning that this rule was not desired by the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, and I accept the statements of the chairman and the other Members on the other side of the House that this is the case. Certainly it was the case over on this side.

We know there is a waiver in here to clause 5 of the rule XXI. The chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee says that it is not necessary. The chairman of the Rules Committee says that it is necessary, or at least the Parliamentarian advised them that it was necessary.

I think there are some real questions about this rule, and I think we ought to go back and start over. If, indeed, we do not need a modified closed rule, then let us not have a modified closed rule, and let us have a full debate on this bill and a full debate on the amendments which may be offered.

We heard the chairman of the Rules Committee suggest that there were 15 amendments filed yesterday on this bill, all by Republicans from this side of the aisle. That was cited as a reason we need a modified closed rule, to stop more amendments from being offered. That sounds to me like an attempt to try and stifle debate on this bill. Of course, there were amendments that had to be filed on order to protect our rights under this rule. I do not think all of those amendments will be offered today, and certainly would not have been offered under an open rule. But the reason for an open rule is to allow full and free debate by this body on complex legislation such as this.

I believe the issue certainly is the substance of this legislation, as the chairman and the gentleman from New York have suggested. The issue is the substance of this legislation, but the issue is also very much the procedures of this House and the way in which legislation is considered. I think the American people, while they want legislation dealing with this issue, also want the process in this body to be open and to be fair.

This rule is not, and I would urge that we defeat this rule and start all over again.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I want to echo the comments of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR] about the restrictive nature of this rule.

The chairman of the Banking Committee did not request a rule requiring prior printing of amendments in the RECORD, and I think most Members who were interested in this legislation were under the impression that the Rules Committee would grant the simple 1-hour open rule that had been requested.

However, the Rules Committee took it upon itself to write this condition into the rule whereby, if you didn't have your amendments in the RECORD by midnight last night, you will not be able to offer amendments today.

I think in this case the Rules Committee did have some legitimate concerns about the bill being broadened by amendment to include some controversial matters that are not related to check clearances. And we were assured by Chairman PEPPER that we were not setting a precedent by this rule.

Mr. Speaker, because this is a relatively noncontroversial bill, and because most Members interested in offering amendments were personally notified of this prior-printing requirement yesterday, and have had their amendments printed in the RECORD, I will not oppose this rule today. But I did want to take this opportunity to make it quite clear that we are not going to make a practice of this in the Rules Committee. While it may be fair to those Members who are on a committee and come to the Rules Committee and have already prepared their amendments, it is grossly unfair to the other House Members who may not focus on a bill until it is too late to get their amendments in the RECORD. They should have the same right as committee members to offer their amendments on this floor. And I, for one, intend to see to it that that right is protected in the future. This isn't a partisan issue, it's an institutional one that hits Democrats and Republicans alike in their ability to represent their constituents in this House and to exercise their rights and responsibilities as legislators. Let's not forfeit that fundamental component of our democratic process.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri have additional requests for time?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, what we have heard in the debate is that the section with regard to clause 5(a) of rule XXI, as the chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs says, is unnecessary. We have also heard that the language there limiting Members' access to the amendment process also is unnecessary in the rule. I think we have established that now in the debate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all the language in the rule after the comma on line 11 through the period on line 17 be excised from the rule. That would take out all of the language relating to clause 5(a) of rule XXI and also would take out the limitation on Members having to file their amendments in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that that language be excised from the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I think it then becomes clear precisely what we have been saying on this side is true, that this rule is designed to keep us from offering amendments on the floor and the language in rule XXI is in fact needed language in the rule.

What we have is, we were told all of this is unnecessary, but in the unanimous-consent request, it is the chairman of the Rules Committee who has said that it has to be in there. Please vote against the rule.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, may I say again to my distinguished colleagues on the other side, I stated a few moments ago that the Parliamentarian of this House advised our committee, with whom we are in constant consultation, that that $100 provision in the bill needed a waiver. In order to help the bill, we provided the waiver. Did we do anything wrong by doing that?

The next thing is, on the other side, I will say to my distinguished brethren, all of the complaint about this rule has been that it is stifling the minority. Well, is it not rather strange that a stifled minority had the ability yesterday, within the limitation of the rule, to offer 15 amendments? It seems to me they were fairly well alerted if they offered 15 amendments, and if those distinguished Members could offer their 15 amendments, I do not know why others could not have if they had wanted to. Knowing how alert my brethren on the other side are, I know they could have done it if they had chosen to do so.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I am sorry I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude this debate. The gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Banking, a moment ago stated here today, "Let us do something to protect the people of this country whose checks, whose money, is being held up unduly in many banks." That is what this bill is all for. We simply want to keep this subject a distinct subject for the House to deal with. We will get around to the others dealing with them separately and distinctly.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR] have additional requests for time?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have whipped this dog about long enough. I think we can recognize that the rule probably, in retrospect, was in error, that the rule was drawn in such a manner as to protect germaneness for other legislation which might or might not have been offered. Seriously, I doubt that it would have been offered. Had it been offered, I doubt it would have been in order. But nevertheless the Rules Committee did draw the rule in such a manner as to try to be overprotective, in my judgment, of nongermane legislation on different areas which would have probably never been a part of this bill. I think the Rules Committee ought not to have done that.

However, I do think we have a piece of legislation that is before us that is important to the consumers of this Nation. It was brought before the Rules Committee by the Committee on Banking for consideration. I think it should be considered. I think it is well deserved legislation. I commend the Committee on Banking for bringing this legislation before us. I think we can move forward now with consideration of the bill before us which is to protect consumers of this country and their right to utilize the funds once they are made and deposited into a financial institution.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that we have a fair rule and critically needed legislation before this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 199, nays 129, not voting 106, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Addabbo for, with Mr. Grotberg against.

Mr. Pickle for, with Mr. Lewis of Florida against.

Mr. Mica for, with Mr. Ritter against.

Mr. Moody for, with Mr. Weber against.

Mr. Garcia for, with Mr. Wortley against.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. GILMAN changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DANIEL). Pursuant to House Resolution 357 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2443.

□ 1242

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2443) to limit the number of days a depository institution may restrict the availability of funds which are deposited in any account, with Mr. DURBIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, millions of hard-working Americans carry their paychecks down to the bank every week in anticipation that they can use the funds to buy groceries, pay the rent, buy clothes, and other necessities.

In all too many cases, they don't have access to the money they have earned. It is tied up by banking policies, check hold policies, that say the customer has to wait days, and days and, sometimes, weeks and weeks, before the bank says the money is available.

H.R. 2443 is designed to change this outlandish policy—this age-old game of allowing banks to play with and profit from your money, the float—while the customer waits.

Some may suggest that these are just minor inconveniences and that the Congress really ought not be worried.

For the well-heeled with big balances in their checking accounts, the need for this legislation may, indeed, seem remote. But, for the millworker, the salaried employee, the retiree of modest means, and to others who must pay their basic living expenses out of their weekly or monthly income, these arbitrary check holds are a disaster.

It is a traumatic, costly and embarrassing experience for the consumer who becomes a pawn in any bank's check hold schemes.

I can guarantee that the legislation has real meaning for Mrs. Lucy Cody of Boston. Last year, she deposited $1,413.45 in a Boston bank. Most of these deposits were in cash, but about $400 was in checks and an American Express money order. Mrs. Cody assumed that the deposits, since they had included a preponderance of cash would be credited without delay. So she proceeded to write checks on the account, only to have the checks returned. She ended up with $296.30 in return check fees and the embarrassment of having checks for such items as her son's Boy Scout uniform dishonored by the bank. It all happened because her bank had placed an arbitrary 2-week hold on the account.

Over the past few years, the House Banking Committee and Members of the House have received a flood of letters from consumers describing the inconvenience and financial hardship they face when a financial institution holds their deposited checks for an inordinate period of time. Some come from those hit with bounced check charges as high as $30, an exorbitant fee when the Federal Reserve tells us it only costs 36 cents to return a bad check. Others come from those who can least afford having their money tied up for weeks on end—our elderly, our youth, and our citizens living paycheck to paycheck.

These letters come from all over the country, representing your congressional districts as well as mine.

This is not organized, canned, computer-generated mail. This mail comes from individuals—housewives, senior citizens, working men and women, small business people, parents and students. The stationery varied from standard, to lined pads to scraps of paper.

Don't think the victims of check holds are simply unsophisticated consumers. It can happen to even the most knowledgeable.

I have a letter from a man in Philadephia who says he is a former banker and his wife a former bank regulator. He was caught with a pile of overdraft fees when his bank decided to place a 14-day hold on an IRS tax refund. He had written checks on the deposit assuming, as any reasonable person would, that the bank would give immediate credit for a U.S. Treasury check.

It's not an isolated case. From my own State of Rhode Island, I have a letter from a couple in Pawtucket who thought that their $1,212 tax refund check drawn on the good U.S. Treasury could be treated as cash. But their banker said no. This is the bank where these people have their mortgage loan on their home, their loan on their automobile and where they did all their banking business. They were told they would have to wait 5 to 10 days while the check cleared, just to make sure the United States didn't go out of business before it cleared.

But, don't blame just the banks in Philadelphia and Rhode Island. Chicago has its Refrigerator and its own version of the check hold game. I received a letter from a copy editor at the Chicago Tribune who deposited a check for $5,000 into his account at a Chicago bank. Five days later, this individual attempted to withdraw $50 from the bank's ATM but was unsuccessful. Puzzled, he called the bank and was told that it had put a 10-day hold on not only the $5,000 deposit but also on the $1,400 already in his account. Not only had the bank tied up this individuals entire account because of the $5,000 deposit, but he was informed by the company that issued the check that it had cleared its account just 4 days after it was deposited in the Chicago bank.

It is for this reason that 125 of us were cosponsors in the 98th Congress and 146 in the 99th Congress. After extensive hearings in the 98th and 99th Congress, we today respond to these letter writers, whose complaints are certainly justifiable, by passage of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

H.R. 2443 is based on the simple premise that customers are entitled to have access to their deposited funds as rapidly as modern technology allows. The bill mandates the maximum number of days a financial institution can hold a deposited check, cash, or funds transferred by wire without freeing up the funds.

For the first 3 years of the bill, local checks will be available for withdrawal in just 1 to 3 business days. Most out-of-State checks can be withdrawn on the seventh business day after deposit.

After 3 years, local and in-State checks will be available for withdrawal the next business day after deposit, and all other checks by the fourth business day after deposit.

I would like to stress that when the House Banking Committee passed H.R. 2443, we had no intention of making life difficult for the financial community. Indeed, we have acknowledged that financial institutions need time to learn whether a check has cleared. For this reason, H.R. 2443 shortens, rather than eliminates hold periods. And, these shortened periods are phased in over a 3-year period.

Those lobbying against the bill are falsely claiming that shortened hold periods will increase the number of bad checks passed. However, the House Banking Committee repeatedly heard testimony that shortened check hold periods do not lead to an increase in fraud. Indeed, Jill M. Considine, New York State Superintendent of Banks, reported that 130 of 160 New York institutions surveyed had suffered no losses whatsoever from the State's 1984 check hold law. Of those institutions reporting losses, the average 6-month loss was only $1,811. New York's success is no small matter—the State boasts the largest banking market in the country and is home to four of the five largest bank holding companies.

This is not to say that check fraud does not exist. In an effort to be of assistance in controlling check fraud, the committee adopted an amendment granting the Federal Reserve Board authority to act to prevent check fraud. H.R. 2443 empowers the Fed to suspend for 45 days the mandated check hold schedule for a class of checks when such checks are directly related to a nonacceptable level of losses as a result of check fraud. Taken together with the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, which includes a new section on bank fraud specifically intended to apply to check kiting cases, H.R. 2443 gives the Federal Reserve and law enforcement agencies sufficient authority to respond to fraud-related concerns.

For this reason, I strongly oppose the "good-faith" amendment being bandied about. This amendment would allow a financial institution to disregard H.R. 2443 and hold a deposited check for as long as it wants if, and it's a big if, the institution has "reasonable cause" to doubt whether the check is good. Come on. This is "doublespeak" in the best Orwellian tradition. What the amendment really means to say is that if you are from the wrong side of the tracks, speak with a foreign accent, or are of a certain color, your check is considered suspect. The amendment's potential for discrimination is only limited by the ingenuity of those practicing it. Worst of all, no one at the financial institution is held accountable when this discrimination is practicted. Do we want this supposedly noncontroversial amendment to interfere with a person's basic civil rights?

I don't want a bank teller being able to take away the rights of one of my constitutents simply because he might come into the bank dressed in work clothes, with muddy boots fresh from a construction job. That's the kind of thing that can happen when inexperienced tellers are given the job of sizing up a customer as the so-called good-faith amendment provides.

Let's look at the facts. Over 99 percent of all checks written are paid the first time through the collection process. Or, put another way, only 0.86 percent, or approximately 350 million checks are returned unpaid each year. Of these returned checks, 50 percent are paid the second time through. And, the average returned check is only for $100 or less.

My heart can't bleed for an industry that makes $290 million a year in check float by holding onto money that is rightfully yours—not to mention $3.5 billion a year reaped from returned check fees. These are fees created when the banks played the float game with your money.

I am sure some of you have heard the argument that H.R. 2443 will force bankers to raise customer's fees to make up for losses caused by fraud. I can only suggest that since fraud will not increase under our bill, our friends in the financial community are just looking for another excuse to hike up fees. Don't forget that the cost of basic banking services is skyrocketing, that the poor and elderly are being hard hit by the multiplication of service charges and minimum balance requirements, and that the banking industry is increasingly turning it back on all but the wealthy fat cats.

These skyrocketing fee increases wouldn't be due to greed, would they?

H.R. 2443 will not place an undue burden on financial institutions, will not cause an increase in check fraud and will not warrant an increase in bank service charges. It will, however, free up customers' deposited funds in a shorter period of time, will force financial institutions to disclose their check hold policies and will allow the consumer to sue the bank, thrift or credit union should they fail to abide by the tenets of H.R. 2443.

I hope you will join your 146 House colleagues, the National Conference of State Legislatures, credit union and consumer groups, among others, in supporting H.R. 2443.

I also hope you will lend your support to the thousands upon thousands of consumers whose checks have been held for weeks on end for no reason, to those who have faced up to costly bounced check charges because indiscriminate holds were placed on their accounts. And to those low- and middle-income consumers living from paycheck to paycheck who face severe difficulties when their money is held for inordinate periods of time.

□ 1255

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge my colleagues to vote in favor of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

As the sponsor of the first bill of the 99th Congress to include a provision dealing with funds availability, H.R. 15, I am well aware of the abuses some financial institutions impose on consumers in the form of unreasonably long hold periods on deposited funds. During hearings we learned that some financial institution prevent depositors form withdrawing funds deposited by check in their financial institution, sometimes for periods as long as 3 weeks, while the institution itself has the use of these funds in the form of provisional credit usually within 1 or 2 days after the deposit is made. The depository institutions explain that hold periods are necessary to protect the institution from checks that "bounce" or are returned for insufficient funds. Hopefully, the marketplace will be able to develop, before too long, a mechanism whereby "bounced" checks can go through the system as quickly as honored checks.

Ordinarily, I would advocate a free market approach to this problem. However, during our hearings on this problem I was pursuaded that this approach may not be enough incentive for all institutions to provide consumers with their funds as soon as possible. In my community there has not been a problem and availability is the norm. Unfortunately there are some rotten apples in every barrel. In part, that is why I introduced H.R. 15, which mandated depository institutions to develop and disclose all availability policies and that the Federal Reserve Board formulate a system with the goal of providing 1-day availability on locally drawn checks and 3-day availability for deposits made with all other checks.

Under the leadership of Chairman ST GERMAIN, the Banking Committee reported out an alternative solution to this problem. I want to take this opportunity to commend the chairman for his efforts in this regard. The bill, as reported, is an exemplary consumer protection measure, the goals of which I fully support.

In short, H.R. 2443 provides for a 3-year phase-in period during which depository institutions must make deposited funds available to consumers within reasonable time periods. At the end of 3 years, all local checks must be made available not later than the business day following the business day in which the check is deposited. A similar rule applies for Government checks and institution originated checks, such as cashier's checks and certified checks. Other checks, primarily drafts drawn on nonlocal institutions, must be made available after 3 business days.

Furthermore, complete disclosure of an institution's check hold policies must be made to all customers, and the Federal Reserve Board is given enhanced authority to suspend the operation of the act for up to 45 days at a time where it is determined that the availability schedule is causing increased losses due to fraud.

I would like to add at this point that H.R. 2443 has the support of the American Association of Retired Persons, the National Small Business Association, the AFL-CIO, and consumer groups such as the Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America. These groups represent the consumers this bill is designed to protect—our constituents—who are counting on us to address the problems of unreasonably long hold periods on deposited checks.

While this is basically a good bill, there is still room for improvement. The Federal Reserve Board has expressed concern that the availability schedules contained in the bill are too rigid and do not give the Board sufficient flexibility to deal with the inevitable complexities that are sure to arise in the future and that presently occur with the check return process. Nevertheless, I believe that H.R. 2443 represents legislation that strives to provide a solution to a very pressing problem.

The members of the Banking Committee have put in a lot of time and effort into shaping a bill that provides protection for consumers without making it impossible for honest institutions to protect themselves from dishonest customers. In that regard Mr. SHUMWAY will offer an amendment which will make that concept even more clear. In any event, I would urge Members to support H.R. 2443 so consumers will have the full use of their deposited funds at the earliest practical time.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ].

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and I rise in support of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, which would prohibit banks from placing unreasonable "checkholds" on customer deposits, is an important and necessary piece of consumer protection legislation. The act is important because it would at once prohibit current checkhold abuses by mandating equitable funds availability schedules, and promote the operation of free market forces in the banking industry by requiring banks prominently to disclose their hold policies to their customers. The act is necessary, because despite repeated prodding from Congress, and from banking regulators, the industry as a whole has not voluntarily corrected the current abuses.

Most of us, at one point or another, have experienced at least annoyance or inconvenience at being denied access to funds deposited in our bank accounts days or even weeks after the deposits were made. For the millions of banking customers who pay their basic living expenses out of their weekly or monthly income, inordinately long hold policies constitute far more than a mere inconvenience. Such practices can result unjustifiably in bounced checks, damaged credit ratings and foregone purchases of necessities. Clearly, the current abuses fall hardest on the middle- and lower-income customers who are least able to wait for their funds.

The banking industry has failed to demonstrate a legitimate need for current checkhold practices, which often result in the freezing of deposits for 2 weeks or more. Long hold policies cannot be justified as being necessary to prevent losses due to returned checks or fraud, since current technology permits the processing of most checks within just a few days. Nevertheless, some banks continue to freeze accounts for 2 weeks or more after deposits are made. Even without current technological advances, the banking industry's actual experience with returned checks suggests that the risk of loss from such occurrences is minimal. Information presented to the Banking Committee demonstrated that more than 99 percent of all checks are paid the first time through the collection process, and 60 percent of the remaining fraction of 1 percent are paid upon second presentment. Moreover, a number of banks have voluntarily adopted policies granting customers immediate or nearly immediate access to check deposits, a fact which belies claims that lengthy holds are necessary.

One can only surmise that the real reason for the imposition of long checkhold periods lies elsewhere. The Federal Reserve Board estimated that the banking industry may receive up to $3.5 billion per year in service charges for returned checks. Inordinately long hold periods increase the chances that customers may write checks for which there are insufficient accessible funds, and may result in service charge income to the banks. In addition, the Banking Committee determined that the industry "earns" over $290 million per year by taking advantage of the "float"—that is, by investing customer funds that have been received by the bank, but not yet made available to the customer.

Bank income attributable to the freezing and related use of customer funds is inequitable. The Expedited Funds Availability Act would curb this inequity by mandating funds availability schedules that are rationally related to actual check processing requirements. The act's notice provisions should foster competition among banks for the funds of more discriminating consumers. These remedies are reasonable and necessary and long past due.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support H.R. 2443 as reported out of the Banking Committee.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE].

Mr. LAFALCE. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

As a sponsor of legislation in 1984 and 1985 to improve the availability of funds to bank customers, I am pleased that the House Banking Committee has approved a bill to end the so-called float game. As was well documented during committee hearings, virtually every bank customer at one time or another suffers inconvenience or expense, or both, at the hands of bank float managers. I am convinced that a legislative solution to the problem is necessary, and I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.

To illustrate the nature of the problem, let me point to two specific examples. I heard from one constituent who received a large check—close to $50,000—from the settlement of an estate. The check, drawn on a trustee account in one bank, was subject to a 2-week hold period when my correspondent deposited it in a bank across the street. The sad, almost unbelievable part of this story was that the recipient of the inherited windfall was in fact indigent, had been living on the streets, and had little more than the clothes he wore and a few dollars in his pocket when the trustee of the estate found him.

In yet another case, a Philadelphia woman wrote to tell me that when her purse was stolen, she closed her checking account only to find that when she opened another at the same bank, a hold of 10 days was placed on the $1,900 of so-called available funds from the enclosed account. The woman suffered double jeopardy while the bank got to play twice with the same dollars.

These stories represent particularly egregious examples of the problems faced by bank customers. They are not the norm, yet virtually every bank consumer suffers at some time or another inconvenience or expense at the hands of bank float managers. That is why this legislation is essential.

I would like to point out for the record, however, that my own preferred approach was structured differently from this bill. As a matter of philosophy and practicality, I proposed that the Congress establish a mandate and general guidelines for the regulators to follow in speeding the availability of deposited checks. To accomplish this, I introduced legislation modeled on the New York State law which directed the Federal Reserve Board to formulate an availability schedule for consumers' deposits. In contrast, the legislation reported by the Banking Committee establishes by legislation a very stringent schedule, and provides little regulatory flexibility in dealing with problems that might arise. Although I strongly support the bill, I feel that, as a general principle, the complexity of the check clearance system requires that the regulators be given more discretion than they are allowed under H.R. 2443.

For this reason, I plan to support the amendment my distinguished colleague from California, Mr. SHUMWAY, intends to offer which would permit bankers to waive the availability schedules established under the bill in instances where there is a reasonable belief that a check has not or will not clear because of check kiting, fraud, or bankruptcy. Under the bill as approved, banks in such instances would not have the option of placing a temporary "hold" on a check, but would be required to reject it outright or accept it for collection, a practice that is accompanied by a fee charged to the consumer. In my mind, the consumer would suffer less inconvenience and cost if institutions were allowed to make a reasonable exception to the mandated availability schedule. Legislation passed by the States has incorporated such a "good faith" exception, and I would hope that as the bill moves through the Congress, such an exception will be included. There are a few other amendments I believe desirable, and I have enumerated them in separate remarks in the committee report.

Despite my reservations, it is imperative that Congress take action to deal with this problem. I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. McKINNEY].

□ 1305

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this legislation and I would like to congratulate my colleague from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Banking Committee, and my colleague from Ohio, the ranking Republican member of the Banking Committee, for their efforts in bringing this bill to the floor today.

H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, is a classic legislative response to the outraged cries of the public we represent. It is a measure of the frustration that has built up as a result of the excessive delays depositors usually have in gaining access to their deposited funds. Even as the financial industry made increasing use of high technology to expedite transaction information, that same technology did not seem to be applied to the handling of checks.

Since there was no established timeframe for financial institutions to follow in processing checks, each institution set its own policy regarding clearance. The period the person depositing a check might have to wait before being able to use his money could vary from a few days to more than 2 weeks depending on a number of factors. In some cases, access to any funds in his account could be denied during the hold period.

As the American public became more aware of how its money was being used, and for whose benefit, more attention was focused on check clearing policies. Adding insult to injury, excessive delays in making funds available frequently caused checks to be returned for insufficient funds, which resulted in substantial penalties. Our committee's report accompanying this bill cites a number of these situations.

I am certain that each Member has heard a horror story from constituents about this problem. In many cases, the policy of the financial institutions seem to have been developed with no logical basis, or at least no modern basis. As I was preparing for this debate, I remembered a problem faced by one of my constituents several years ago which underlined the irrational behavior of some bankers.

My constituent took to her bank a $10,000 U.S. Treasury note due to mature the next day. Her bank accepted the Treasury note and informed her that it would take a week before she could draw on the funds. After inquiring through my office about any Federal guidelines or regulations, my constituent presented to the same bank, 3 months later, Treasury notes totaling $50,000 that were at maturity. This time she was told it would be 10 days before she could use her money. Angered, she disputed that and cited information given by my staff. She wrote to tell me that her funds were available within 3 days. The different periods alone should illustrate that something needs to be done. But to make it worse, we were talking about U.S. Treasury funds! In my opinion, this person should have been able to get almost instantaneous credit after the notes had matured and were given to her bank.

There are many other stories I could tell, but the point is usually the same. For no reason that we can understand, other than greed perhaps, someone else wants to use our money for a few days or so. That bothers my constituents, my family, myself and, I think, most Americans.

The objections of the financial institutions and their trade associations are a few days too late. If we cause a few problems with this bill as a result of fraudulent or criminal activities, the impact will be minimal compared to the consumer benefit.

Banks and thrifts in Connecticut have been innovative in approaching the needs of their customers in the past. They were in the forefront in developing interest-bearing checking accounts and variable rate mortgages; many offer so-called "life-line" accounts. I think that they will work to develop competitive check clearing practices as well.

The bill we are considering is not an extreme measure. It simply tells financial institutions to stop dragging their feet at their customers' expense. I find it to be ironic, as we stand here on the threshold of the 21st century, that some banks are still kicking and screaming about being dragged into the 20th century. Well, guys, welcome to reality. And don't come crying to me if some other industry swallows up your business while they eat your lunch.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation and to commend my chairman, Representative ST GERMAIN for bringing this important consumer protection legislation to the floor.

The Expedited Funds Availability Act strikes a reasonable balance between the rights of bank customers to have rapid access to money they deposit in a bank and legitimate efforts to insure that our banking system is not subject to check fraud. This is accomplished by establishing clear standards for the financial institutions and the Federal Reserve Board which take into account current check clearing practices and require the development of more efficient technologies to provide more rapid access to the customer's money.

This legislation will provide immediate benefit to the American consumer by providing next day availability for deposits made with cash, wire transfers, checks drawn upon branches of the same institution located in the same area, U.S. Treasury checks, State or local government checks, cashiers, certified, tellers, and depository checks. The consumer will also immediately benefit from the bill's provision which requires that checks drawn on local banks be available within 3 business days and nonlocal checks be available for withdrawal within 7 business days.

The interim standards in this measure reflect what is technically possible now and requires that the American banking system will not force their customers to wait longer than necessary to be able to use his or her own money.

The American consumer will benefit even more in the near future because this legislation mandates the development of a more efficient national check clearing system. Within 3 years every consumer will have next day availability for all local checks and fourth day availability for nonlocal checks.

Mr. Chairman, I'm sure many of the people we represent have had the extremely frustrating experience of depositing a check in our account which is subject to an unreasonably long "hold" period. At the very least, this causes a bank customer inconvenience. But it can likely result in more serious ramifications and embarrassment if the customer writes a check based on the assumption that the money he deposited has been credited to his account.

Long hold periods have even become a serious problem for Veterans and Social Security recipients, pension recipients, and persons on a fixed income. For these kinds of checks there is no reason for the bank which cashes the check should not provide timely credit, surely, these Treasury checks will be honored by the Federal, State, or local government which has issued them. In many instances, the bank receives credit for these checks the same day and rarely will it take longer than a single day. Under the policy established by this proposal institutions which have placed holds on these kinds of checks will no longer be able to force senior citizens to wait for their Social Security money. Other persons are also harmed by unreasonably long check holds. Small businessmen, families, who live from paycheck to paycheck and must watch every penny, people new to a community, and people buying a home or making other large purchases must have access to their money as soon as possible.

If the check clearing system was so inefficient that it took 14 to 21 days for an out of town check to be credited to a bank then these long hold periods would be justified. However, with today's technology banks receive credit for most checks within 24 hours. The concept embodied in this legislation is that a customer should have access to his money as soon as the bank receives credit for it. Many banks try to provide this service currently and this legislation will not create a burden for those financial institutions. However, those banks which have been playing the float with the consumer's money should earn their profits, not simply achieve it by such credit freezing tactics.

This legislation has been criticized as a overreaction to a minor problem. Opponents of this bill acknowledge that banks do receive credit for deposits before they credit the money to the customer's account. Opponents claim that "everybody does it and besides the loss of a couple of days interest on your paycheck doesn't amount to much money." In essence the opponents are saying "where's the beef?"

This situation is similar to the butcher with the heavy thumb or an inaccurate scale. If the butcher shorts you a couple of ounces each week on hamburger, you will probably never notice. But, if you add up those couple of ounces it comes to a lot of beef over a year. It also means a lot of unearned extra profit for the butcher each week. We don't allow butchers to do this. The Government test the butchers scales for accuracy and requires that he keep his thumb off the scale when weighing our hamburger.

This legislation does the same thing for banks. This legislation recognizes that this hold may not amount to much money on a single paycheck, but when you add up those delays every week or month and you add up thousands or millions of paychecks you can quickly see then the long hold periods mean a substantial amount of money to American bankers and a substantial loss to the American consumer. This bill means that the banker has to use an accurate scale, and he can't inappropriately profit by holding unreasonably consumer access to their deposits.

Mr. Chairman, a good deal is being said during the debate concerning fraud and criminal actions that may occur regarding check cashing. This proposal, the expedited availability of funds, has little or no relationship with stemming such improper and illegal actions. This is a misleading argument, no financial institution is required to cash checks they feel are fraudulent—in fact they are under legal mandate to do the opposite.

The problems with unreasonable hold policies has been explored by the Banking Committee for several years. Under the leadership of the chairman, the committee has urged the Federal Reserve Board and our Nation's financial institutions to develop more responsible policies. Regrettably, they have not taken the initiative to do so. As a result of the public's concern and the unresponsiveness of the financial community and the financial institution regulators, the Banking Committee believes that Congress must act to protect the interests of the American consumer. The legislation we bring before you today does just that and I urge my colleagues to support the legislation.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us today has been widely cosponsored by Members of Congress. It reflects a subject which has been before this body for some period of time. It reflects the efforts of a number of hearings that we have held in the Banking Committee, and I think it indeed is a worthy goal.

There are five States that have taken similar action, and we understand that many States anticipate discussing delayed funds availability statutes in coming sessions.

There can be no doubt about the fact that banks in many cases have taken advantage of consumers. They have had a free float, and I think the fact that many of us have had personal experience in that regard testifies that that unfair practice exists, and that some banks have engaged in it. Indeed in my own case, I have a son who worked between school terms, earned some money, and deposited that money in a moneymarket account in a small savings and loan. I was with him one day when he went to that S&L to make a withdrawal, and I noticed there on the teller's window a sign that said that out-of-State personal checks can be held for as long as 30 days before they will be deposited to the account of that particular depositor.

Now, one would think that in a free-market setting, a depositor having that kind of notice before him would be tempted to go elsewhere. And sure enough, in the case of my son's savings and loan, just a few weeks after this experience we were given notice that that S&L was going to be the subject of one of the administrative mergers that had been negotiated by the FSLIC, and it was swallowed up in another and larger institution.

I think, therefore, that Members of this House should realize that the forces of competition cannot be ignored. Banking is a competitive industry, and especially so since deregulation, and indeed many Members of this body as well as the other body have approached this subject in a more free-market setting than would be presented by this bill.

My problem with H.R. 2443 is that it really places banks in a straitjacket. It denies them any kind of discretion with reference to their business, and in that regard it denies the influence of those market forces that have had a role in the past.

I think the bill can be amended to be a very satisfactory bill, and I am proposing an amendment that I will offer when we get into the 5-minute rule. That is not the good-faith amendment that the chairman referred to that was offered in the committee, but it is a more narrowly drawn amendment, specifically describing three situations and requiring a reasonable belief on the part of the bank before this procedure could be invoked. The time limitations would still be in place. My amendment does not gut the bill in that regard. Banks would still be subject to administrative enforcement by the Federal Reserve and other agencies. They would be exposed to civil liability, including class actions, should they misuse this particular discretion.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is a step in the right direction toward making this bill palatable and usable and serviceable to all Americans, both bankers and consumers.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding me this time.

I think this is important consumer legislation. I am pleased that we are starting this session of Congress with this kind of positive legislation to help the average American consumer. For too long, too many institutions have thought that the consumer would just stand idly by, and seeing his or her resources deposited in a bank and not available to be used, but with the bank making a profit from it. That does not mean that every bank has been doing this nor that every consumer has been hurt, but the fact is that it is a real problem.

This legislation addresses it in a very reasonable way. There is a 3-year phase-in so that banks can adjust to what they are going to have to do. Most banks are already complying with what is down the road or close to doing so. They will be able to comply with this legislation; but consumers will now be able to count on a national legal standard. When they deposit a check in a bank, they will know when that money will be available to them. They will not be embarrassed. They will be able to plan their affairs.

This is the kind of legislation that Congress should be passing. It is responding to a real need. It is being done in a responsible and gradual way. Banks are left with the ability to respond to fraud. They should reject for deposit instruments that they believe are fraudulent, but they should not burden each and every consumer with an unfair tax on his resources for all those good checks which people are depositing day in and day out in their bank accounts, with the hope and in fact the right to have that money immediately available for use or available as quickly as our technology can make it available.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I think everyone is in agreement that something must be done to clamp down on instances where banks and other depository institutions engage in abusive check hold practices. And although most banks provide reasonable access to deposited funds, I, like most of my colleagues, believe there are enough bad applies to make national availability schedules necessary. However, H.R. 2443 goes well beyond what is reasonable and necessary, and I cannot support it in its current form.

This bothers me, Mr. Chairman, because I was an early cosponsor of this legislation. Also, after witnessing the success of California's new delayed funds law, I felt reasonable legislation could be enacted giving the Fed broad authority to implement a better system for expediting funds. However, I was extremely disappointed that the Banking Committee abandoned the basic principals of this legislation, which is to eliminate abusive check hold practices.

If H.R. 2443, as currently drafted, becomes law, it will rigidly mandate the creation of a system that will be extremely costly to implement. These are costs that will undoubtedly be passed on to the one group we are trying most to protect: the consumers.

For instance, the interim schedule for all depository institutions is unrealistic, and will restrict the ability of banks to protect themselves from the risks of bad checks. As a result, I have been told by several banks that those types of checks which are currently accepted for deposit, subject to an availability delay, will in many instances be rejected. Under such circumstances, banks would accept these checks on a collection basis only, a method that is extremely slow and costly. For all other checks, this bill will encourage banks to place blanket holds to limit the additional risks brought on by its enactment.

For banks, this legislation will require a multibillion dollar investment in computers, software, and electronic check-clearing equipment, the cost of which will be passed on to consumers. In addition, the Fed is mandated to develop and implement an expedited check return system in 3 years, a feat which is, at best, unrealistic given the technology limitations of the current archaic check return system. The cost of this requirement, $30 million a year according to the Congressional Budget Office, will be passed on to the banks which will, of course, pass it on to the consumer.

Ultimately, these requirements could lead to the creation of a national electronic payments system, thereby eliminating the use of paper checks. And again, this will require a huge investment that will be passed on to—you guessed it—the consumer.

I urge my colleagues to consider what it would mean to the average consumer if this legislation becomes law. There is a more reasonable and cost-effective approach which would address both the abusive and systemic problems inherent in the current payments system. Such an approach would consist of stricter bank disclosure rules so that customers are aware of check hold policies. Also, the Fed should be given broader powers to address the more technical aspects of an improved check return system, and to determine necessary exemptions.

H.R. 2443, in its current form, is clearly excessive and burdensome, and I urge my colleagues to oppose it.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], a member of the committee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act. I, along with many of my colleagues on the Banking Committee, was an original cosponsor of this bill, and a similar bill introduced in the 98th Congress. The Banking Committee has held extensive hearings on this bill in each of the last 2 years. I am pleased that this important piece of legislation is before the full House.

I wish to especially commend my chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island, who has done yeoman's work in moving this legislation. He has once again shown himself to be a champion of the consumers of this country, and I look forward to working with him on other consumer issues throughout this second session.

Mr. Chairman, as some of my colleagues have already indicated, H.R. 2443 is long overdue legislation. For too long, banks and other depository institutions, have played the infamous "game of float," in which they earn money—estimated to be several hundred million dollars—by denying consumers access to their own money. While not every financial institution is engaged in this practice, enough of them participate in the game of float to affect the lives of millions of ordinary people.

It is, after all, ordinary citizens who suffer the most from delayed availability of their funds, for they lack the clout of wealthy or corporate customers who can assure early access to their own money. To ask those who can least afford it to suffer through long delays, is to turn fairness on its head.

H.R. 2443 as reported out of the Banking Committee would go a long way toward restoring a measure of fairness in this whole area. If the bill becomes law, banks would no longer be able to place holds on Social Security and other Government checks. Nor would they be able to take cash from hard-working people, and deny them the right to withdraw it for several days. In short, Mr. Chairman, H.R. 2443 would put an end to a whole set of outrageous and unfair practices.

While H.R. 2443 is not perfect, it does offer, I believe, a workable solution to a major problem. There are several, often repeated objections to the bill, however, which I would like to address briefly.

One is that the imposition of a mandatory schedule lies outside the traditional realm of legislative craftsmanship. The formulation of any such schedule, it is argued, should be left to the regulators in this case the Federal Reserve.

No Member of this House has more respect for the Fed than I do. However, in this area, the Fed has been dragging its feet for more than 8 years. It has shown little inclination to take action to end the clear abuses that have been all too well documented.

And, during that time, the problem has actually been getting worse. The Vice Chairman of the Fed, Mr. Preston Martin, testified before our committee, that consumer surveys commissioned by the Fed show an actual increase in the number of consumer complaints over the last 2 years. Thus, as Mr. Martin went on to say, "voluntary efforts do not appear to be providing a rapid solution to this problem." That is an understatement, to say the least, since the problem seems to be getting worse.

If voluntary actions are not solving the problem and if the regulators will not move aggressively in this whole area, then there is little choice but for Congress to act.

Another objection frequently raised against the bill is that the availability schedule is too rigid and will, in the end, cost consumers more than it confers in benefits.

I believe the availability schedules are reasonable. The requirement that all domestic checks be made available within 3 business days of deposit, would not take effect until 3 years after enactment. I think that is a reasonable time period to allow depository institutions to prepare to adopt procedures to meet the 3-day goal. The other provisions of both the temporary and final schedules, seem more than fair, especially, since the banks have been profiting so greatly from the current float game.

In addition, there are, as others have pointed out, numerous exceptions allowed by the bill. One exception is that no bank need worry about turning over more than $5,000 a day to a customer, no matter how large his deposits. I was pleased that the committee adopted this common-sense protection for banks and other depository institutions.

The specific exceptions contained in the bill together with the authority given the Fed to suspend certain classes of checks from the bill's schedule, provide sufficent flexibility.

Nor should Congress fail to act, as is frequently suggested, out of deference to the States. While a handful of States have indeed enacted strong measures, the fate of similar measures in other states is uncertain at best.

H.R. 2443 would not preclude State action. It merely sets minimum national standards of availability. Individual States would still be able to enact more stringent measures designed to address local problems.

In sum, H.R. 2443 is long overdue. I join my chairman in urging this House to pass this important piece of consumer legislation.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILER].

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, the basic objective of the legislation before us today is to expedite the consumer's access to funds deposited in a financial institution. This is a worthy goal, one that I can wholeheartedly support.

We have all heard the horror stories concerning delayed funds availability. And while I believe these stories exaggerate the pervasiveness of the problem, few would argue with the proposition that something should be done to eliminate the problem that does exist. What is at issue today is not whether Congress should adopt measures to facilitate the expeditious availability of deposited funds to consumers; Rather, the issue before us is how this objective can best be accomplished.

It is on this question of method that I have serious problems with H.R. 2443. Unfortunately, the Expedited Funds Availability Act contains provisions for the establishment of excessively rigid funds availability schedules. This represents an unnecessarily draconian and interventionist approach to what is a limited, albelt frustrating, problem.

I am particularly concerned about the imposition of these rigid availability schedules, because there are strong indications that they simply may not be feasible under either the current check clearing system or any expedited system that the Federal Reserve is capable of developing within the next several years. As a result, the availability schedules contained in H.R. 2443 would expose depository institutions to an increased risk of losses from fraud.

Of course, there are many depository institutions throughout the country which currently give consumers prompt, if not immediate, credit for deposited funds. I have discussed this issue with several bankers back in the Third District of Indiana, and they have told me that the rigid funds availability schedules in H.R. 2443 would not pose a serious problem for them, because they now grant immediate credit to depositors in most cases. However, these banks are community banks in relatively small towns and cities, and they generally know their customers and communities well.

There are other depository institutions, particularly those in more urban settings, which would be exposed to a particularly high risk of losses from fraud as a result of the rigid schedules called for in H.R. 2443.

Some proponents of such schedules downplay the risk of losses to depository institutions by pointing to the fact that less than 1 percent of all checks are returned. However, what they fail to mention is that this small percentage of bad checks represents hundreds of millions of individual checks and billions of dollars. Returned checks written for less than $100, which under the Expedited Funds Availability Act's standard schedule will be available to the depositor the business day after deposit, alone represent about 185.5 million checks and hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

Returned checks can translate into significant losses for depository institutions. Some larger banks recently have reported annual losses of a few million dollars due to returned checks. These are substantial losses. Excessively inflexible availability schedules threaten banks with even greater losses due to bad checks and fraud.

And if banks and other depository institutions find themselves losing significant sums of money due to an unnecessarily inflexible funds availability schedule, they will to the greatest degree possible pass on these costs to consumers through the imposition of higher fees for other kinds of services. I do not recall receiving one constituent complaint regarding delayed funds availability; however, I have received several complaints about new and increased bank service fees.

A more effective approach to the problem of delayed funds availability lies in the adoption of measures that improve the operation of the marketplace with limited Government intervention. The most important step we can take is to require better disclosure of funds availability policies. I am pleased that H.R. 2443 does contain provisions that would require depository institutions to clearly and promptly disclose their funds availability policies.

Improved disclosure of bank policies regarding check holds will result in a more competitive and efficient market for bank services. Armed with complete information on the availability policies of banks, consumers will be better able to make rational decisions about where to do their banking. With improved disclosure, banks that impose excessively long holds on checks will be forced by competition either to change their policies or watch their customer bases erode.

Aside from improved disclosure, another step in the right direction would be to require the Federal Reserve to develop an expedited return item system. This provision, I am pleased to say, is also included in H.R. 2443.

I would add that to the extent that funds availability schedules are imposed on despository institutions, these should be determined by the Federal Reserve. The Fed has considerably more hands-on experience in this highly technical area than does Congress and would be better able to adapt schedules to special situations.

While I have serious problems with the method prescribed by H.R. 2443 for remedying the problem of delayed funds availability, I intend to support this bill today. I believe that this is the best bill one can expect the House Banking Committee to report, but I do not believe that it is the final legislative word on the issue. I am optimistic that the other body eventually will adopt an expedited funds availability bill that focuses on improved disclosure and provides more flexibility to the Federal Reserve in the establishment of availability schedules. And I am hopeful that when the House revisits this legislation, perhaps sometime later in this session, it will take up a conference report that better reflects my position on how the problem of delayed funds availability should be addressed.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to a distinguished member of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH].

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this measure. It is long overdue, and as many of the prior speakers have mentioned, some of the things we saw in our committee hearings stand out so strong that this sort of measure is crying to be passed. We saw that some 75 percent of the institutions surveyed in one report hold out-of-State checks for 6 business days or more and some 20 percent hold those checks for more than 2 weeks time.

Now, those are funds of individuals, average consumer funds, being held by those institutions way beyond what the norm is in Alabama and its institutions I am proud to say in Alabama, in my own survey, Mr. Chairman, I determined that the norm is about 1 day at best at the most when funds have been credited; but across this country institutions have taken advantage of consumers.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this legislation and urge its passage.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I can see and I think we can all see the bandwagon that everyone is trying to jump on of this so-called consumer legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this legislation in the strongest form. This legislation is one of those bills that sounds good at first glance, but the result of the legislation, frankly, is contrary to the interests of the consumers that it serves to protect. The legislation is indeed fashionable, but it is terribly misguided.

Let us begin with what this legislation does. This legislation recognizes that a problem does exist on occasion in which a check is held needlessly for a consumer for processing; but the solution, Mr. Chairman, is worse than the problem, because the solution is to impose one national mandated standard for every consumer, for every institution, for every type of account, for every single situation in this country and leaving consumers with no choices.

Let me suggest that there are some problems that will occur if this legislation is passed and signed into law.

First, it will increase costs to the consumers, some estimates by as much as a billion dollars nationwide. Many banks, most banks do not have the sophisticated computer equipment that is needed to meet these mandatory and inflexible schedules.

It also increases consumer costs because it vastly increases the probability of fraud and check kiting schemes for which the consumers ultimately pay.

I commend to my colleagues the good faith amendment that my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] may well offer. I think good faith to exempt check kiting and fraud schemes is a helpful amendment.

Second, this legislation is not the best legislation we could have drafted. We could have drafted, and in fact should draft, simple disclosure legislation, disclosure to consumers as to what the rules are when they make their deposits, which would take care of the problem.

Consumers do have the right to know what their bank's policy is when they make their deposits and then the consumer can make an informed choice. If a consumer chooses to have one kind of account in one kind of institution, then that consumer has a choice and if those costs are lower, the consumer pays those lower costs.

Third, the bill is not flexible. The Federal Reserve has told us that it is not flexible. The Federal Reserve has told us that it will not work. The Federal Reserve has told us, and I quote from a letter from President Martin:

> Currently, the vast majority of local checks are not received by the payor institution until well after the start of business. It is extemely doubtful that it would enhance check collection systems to provide for delivery of all checks.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, this legislation in a perverse way, which is designed to be proconsumer, is in fact an anticonsumer piece of legislation. It will increase costs. It will eliminate consumer choice.

The legislation could be resolved by disclosure legislation. I am hopeful that my good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] will offer a substitute that would solve the problem, that would provide for disclosure and consumer choice.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

□ 1330

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have heard from a series of speakers here in the well today, from those of us who have known, either in our own families or in our own friendships, people who have deposited a big check into their checking account, have waited for several days to pay their own bills, and upon doing so have found that their checks are returned to them for insufficient funds.

For everyone in this body or in this country to whom that has occurred, this bill is for you. Over 2 years ago, in my freshman term, I introduced legislation designed to address this selfsame problem. My original bill focused on three areas.

First of all, it directed the Federal Reserve to begin developing the kind of system that will expedite the availability of funds.

Second, my original bill required disclosure, so that we as customers, and banks and savings and loans and credit unions, could shop with our feet and find the institution that offered us the very best deal possible.

Finally, my original bill said that those interest-bearing accounts into which we deposit checks, we as customers must get interest on our deposit as soon as the institution has that same advantage.

The bill before us today goes well beyond my original ideas. Nonetheless, I am delighted to be an original cosponsor of the bill and commend Members on both sides of the aisle for the work that has been done on it.

Among the things that have been retained from my original initiative were disclosures of check-hold policies so we can indeed shop with our feet. In addition to that, now in this bill when the banks or financial institutions receive use of the funds, we as customers will begin receiving interest on our moneys in interest-bearing accounts.

What is new, as several Members have mentioned, is that now the Federal Reserve is directed to develop and phase in over 3 years a system which will provide for a maximum delay of 3 banking days as the time which can elapse before we as customers can use the money in our accounts.

Several points, I think, need to be mentioned and reiterated here today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER] has expired.

Mr. CARPER. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] if he might yield 1 minute to me.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, several points I would like to make. One, we are not picking here on banks, and some of the worst offenders of this practice are not just banks, but the savings and loans and the credit unions. I think the horror stories we have heard and talked about today apply not to the majority of institutions but, rather, to a minority, and we are directing our attention especially to them.

There are, indeed, valid reasons for some delay in availability of funds. Not everyone who goes into a bank to cash a check is honest, and some very honest people unfortunately bounce a lot of checks.

Is this bill perfect? No, I think we will readily acknowledge that it is not. Is it better than the status quo? It darn sight sure is.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would just say that I think that this bill does deserve the support of the majority of the Members. I am delighted, again, to have been an original cosponsor of this bill, and I commend the chairman and all parties who have been a part of moving this bill through.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we heard the chairman of the Banking Committee earlier recite the need for this legislation, and we heard the specific examples that were recited, the horror stories of things that take place in the banking system where a bank indiscriminately holds funds that are deposited, and even puts a hold on all other funds of a customer in the same account.

These examples outrage citizens and, frankly, I think they should. But the very fact that they have been cited here today as examples of individual cases tells us something. They are exceptions to the rule. They are exceptions to the policy that most banking institutions follow. Certainly problems exist, and I think all of us in this body would admit that there are problems, but these problems do not warrant placing a straitjacket on the banking and savings and loan institutions of this country and, I might add, on the customers of those institutions. This legislation would be such a straitjacket.

The bill has glaring flaws. There is no provision to permit the banks to take protective action when a check may be uncollectible because of insolvency or fraud or because of bankruptcy. Such an amendment will be offered here in a few moments, and I certainly hope this body will act favorably on that amendment.

The legislation leaves no regulatory flexibility. The system that we have is a complex one. Over 100 million checks a day go through banks, and billions and billions of dollars clear banks. By and large, I think we all would agree that the system works pretty well.

The weak point in the system is the return of bad checks. We heard in the hearings in the committee that there are operational problems on the physical return of bad checks, and that causes holds to be placed on checks and sometimes that works unfairly to a customer where it should not have been placed on it.

If we need a national standard, it should be just that: a standard; guidelines to some regulatory body like the Federal Reserve, that has some responsibility for enforcing this. But we should not get into the business of writing these rules very specifically and putting them into law. We need to give some flexibility to the Federal Reserve System for implementing this policy.

I support the concept of this bill. Banks in my State are highly competitive and can live with this, but I suggest that we need to give more flexibility to the Federal Reserve Board and more protection against fraud or insolvency before we adopt this legislation.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES], a member of the committee.

Mr. TORRES. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, and applaud Chairman ST GERMAIN for his expeditious work on this important legislation. The bill ensures that banks will not impose unreasonably long holding periods on checks deposited for collection.

This bill represents a significant victory for consumers. It is estimated that unfair hold practices have plagued upward of 10 million Americans at some time. Bank restrictions on the availability of funds have caused senior citizens, students, and working people to lose money. These people live from paycheck to paycheck and need their money immediately.

In particular, many older Americans rely solely upon Government pension, dividend, or interest checks for the basic necessities of life. Accordingly, it is essential that the proceeds from these checks be made available to customers in a timely manner in order to avert undue hardship.

Such hardship is routinely the result of current check hold practices. The Federal Reserve Board has estimated that 99 percent of all deposited checks are collected by banks within 2 business days. And yet, a 7-day hold is not unusual. That means that a bank has 5 days to invest the depositor's money and profit from it before the depositor has access to it.

I urge my colleagues to support this long-overdue legislation. Let's eliminate this anticonsumer practice and give our constituents expedited access to their money.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS].

Mr. PARRIS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I will have additional comments on this legislation during the amendatory process, but I take the floor at this time to consider how this bill is affected by the rule that was just adopted. Let us just review quickly how we got to this point and where we are.

Yesterday, at about 1 o'clock, we were given approximately 5 hours to file amendments, to print them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This morning at noon, just an hour or two ago, we adopted a closed rule, which is a gag rule that permits no more amendments. Now we have only 1 hour to debate this very important matter.

Mr. Chairman, the U.S. Constitution, article I, section 9, clause 3, prohibits the Congress from adopting a law by a bill of attainder or ex post facto. But that is exactly what we have here. This outrageous process requires us to file an amendment in the RECORD before we have the rule to even consider the legislation. That is a terrible precedent and it is, in fact, an ex post facto application of the rules of this House, which unfortunately are not subject to questions of constitutionality.

I want to congratulate publicly the chairman of the Banking Committee of this House for not being a part of that bizarre exercise, and hope that the Rules Committee will never again be constrained to utilize that process.

Let me just make one other observation, Mr. Chairman. There are some problems with unwarranted check holds, but this bill is classic legislative overkill. This bill is just about as unrealistic as expecting Arthur Murray to hire the Chicago Bears to teach the shuffle in his dance classes. It is as unrealistic as expecting "the Refrigerator" to eat lean cuisine to get ready for the Superbowl this week end.

This bill is terrible, and we will have in the next several hours an opportunity to discuss and consider why. I hope the House will reject this rule.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. KAPTUR].

Ms. KAPTUR. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANTON], a member of the committee.

Mr. MANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, of which I am an original cosponsor. As a member of the Banking Committee, I want to commend Chairman ST GERMAIN for his leadership in bringing this important legislation to the floor. For the past several years, the chairman of the Banking Committee has led the fight for legislation to put an end to the inordinate hold periods some banks place on deposited funds and the hardships these delays cause consumers.

At one time or another, most of us have experienced difficulty in gaining prompt access to funds deposited in our accounts. In most instances, these delays are unnecessary and inexcusable. Banks are usually credited for checks they receive within 1 or 2 days. Furthermore, more than 99 percent of all checks clear the first time through the collection process. Despite these facts, many depository institutions hold checks for more than a week before making the funds available to the depositor.

As a result of long check hold periods, many depositors are forced to delay necessary purchases or payments for utilities and other services. This is especially burdensome for low-and middle-income depositors who have limited savings to drawn on. Furthermore, inordinate check hold periods cost consumers billions each year in returned check fees. It is time to put an end to this unfair practice.

As the Representative of the Ninth Congressional District in New York, I fully appreciate the benefits of limiting check hold periods. New York was the first of five States to enact an expedited funds availability law. The statute has greatly benefited consumers in New York who now have prompt access to funds deposited in their accounts. Furthermore, banks in New York have not experienced any increase in check fraud due to the limit on check hold periods.

H.R. 2443, would limit the hold period on most local checks, checks of $100 or less, and Government checks to no more than 1 business day.

The bill further requires the Federal Reserve Board to establish a system within 3 years that will make all local checks available for withdrawal 1 day after deposit and nonlocal checks available the fourth day after deposit.

I urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 2443.

□ 1340

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM].

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, the act that we have before us today is not perfect, but the fact is that it is a step in the right direction, in my judgment, for consumers.

I disagree with some of my colleagues who have been overly criticizing this bill today. We do have problems with check-hold periods. We have problems for consumers with the fact that there are large time gaps and more float, and more profit for some of our financial institutions in the system today than is warranted in a day in which we have all of the electronic wizardry, and computers we have, and the systems of communication.

That does not mean that every bank and every institution is a problem institution, or that every case is an unwarranted hold. But the fact is that there is nothing wrong with our having as a function of Federal Government oversight and regulation of the financial institutions of this country a system in place for a timetable for banks to conform and to provide the service to their customers in the length of time that they hold a check and process it.

So, I strongly support this legislation, although I do favor the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] which is coming up, because I think that the bill needs a little more flexibility for banks. And I am going to offer an amendment myself that is really a technical one that goes at a problem that I see in the bill related to the Federal Reserve being given a direction, which I favor, to come up with an expedited funds availability system, while later on in the same legislation, an omission that came about in the legislative drafting after committee work would allow for the fact that no checks and no notice of nonpayment actually has to be made or physically returned from the deposited institution.

So, I find that is a problem. I think we want to say that not all have to be returned, but we do not want to say that we are implying that none have to be. We certainly want the Federal Reserve System and the banks to make every good-faith effort to return as many of these as possible in a timely fashion and get notice of nonpayment out in a timely fashion, and do not want to put an unnecessary loophole.

So, I am going to offer an amendment that I think will be accepted. It really is a technical amendment to insert one word that will make that very clear when the time comes.

I urge the passage of the legislation. I think it is a good bill.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD], a distinguished member of our committee.

Mr. BARNARD. I thank the chairman for the availability of this time.

There has been good and sufficient argument today as to why this legislation is needed and why it should be passed. There is likewise good precedent for this legislation. Already some of the important States of this country have taken note of the consumer abuses and have put in place legislation, and much of it has guided the deliberations of our committee on this legislation.

I want to point out one thing, however, that has not been pointed out at this time, and that is this bill is going to call for a study by the Federal Reserve as to what is the modern, up-to-date capabilities of our check-collection system. I question whether or not, with all of the advance technologies that we have at our disposal today, our regulatory authorities have done a good enough job in trying to expedite the collection of checks. Sometimes I wonder if we have not put this on the back burner because of other more pressing things.

Today more and more checks are still flooding the process. We had an estimate a number of years ago and that estimate has been far, far overexpanded today.

The challenge before us should be that we should have as modern a technological process as possible in trying to expedite the collection of funds, and this bill does that. It does that in two ways.

First of all, it requires reports from the Federal Reserve to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs as to how this schedule is working. If there are some problems with the schedule, we will get reports on it and promise some recommendations on how to change it.

But just as important, the bill calls for a payment system advisory council. This is important because here representatives from the industry, as well as the regulatory agencies, will be able to come together and see if we cannot perfect a better way to collect checks. So, this, I think, is one of the safeguards that consumers, as well as the banking institutions, will have as a protection by this bill.

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

H.R. 2443 is carefully crafted legislation which is designed to end one of the most abusive practices known to the banking industry and consumers alike—the check float.

The bill as approved by the House Banking Committee provides for a reasonable hold schedule that is to be implemented over a 3-year period and is consistent with check hold schedules that have already been adopted by a number of States.

Furthermore, this legislation obligates depository institutions to disclose their hold policies and end much of the consumer confusion and frustration associated with this problem.

The Federal Reserve Board estimates the 99 percent of all checks are cleared within 1 or 2 business days; there is no justification for the wide discrepancies and often lengthy check hold policies of financial institutions across the country. If depository institutions have access to use these funds, so should the institutions' customers.

H.R. 2443, while forcing depository institutions to adhere to a strict check hold schedule, also grants the Federal Reserve the neccessary authority to provide safeguards against any check-related fraud or losses due to bankruptcy. Any efforts to weaken these safeguards or give banks the discretionary authority to exercise its own judgment would only open a loophole that helped create the check hold problem in the first place.

Passage of this important legislation will provide some relief for consumers and help alleviate some of the frustration associated with check holds, such as overdraft charges and late penalties charged for checks returned because of unknown hold policies.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation and finally put an end to this unfair practice.

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Chairman, the Expedited Funds Availability Act may be one of the best consumer protection bills to come before the Congress in many, many years. As an original cosponsor of H.R. 2443, I believe that passage of this bill will provide an equitable solution for consumers who have been victimized by unreasonable "check-holding" on deposited funds.

I would also like to commend Chairman ST GERMAIN for his lead on this complex issue, and his determination to see that the needs of consumers and depository institutions were balanced—so that adequate protective measures would be provided to both. Additionally, special thanks must be extended to my friend and colleague, Representative ROBERT GARCIA, who saw that an amendment I requested was included to extend all of the consumer benefits in this legislation to residents of the U.S. Virgin Islands and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

The need for this legislation has become evident through continuous reports of abuse, increasing over the past several years, that have been received from across the country. Perhaps the saddest instances concern the poor and the elderly who, often living on fixed incomes, have had checks written in good faith returned because of an unreasonable hold on a check that more often than not was issued by the U.S. Federal Treasury.

Although the banking industry maintains that H.R. 2443 will increase institutional losses as a result of the shortened period in which a bank can "hold" a depositor's access to funds, the irrefutable fact remains that banks do not often lose money on returned checks. According to a recent Bank Administration Institute study, it is estimated that banks actually earn $3.4 billion annually from charges imposed in connection with returned checks. Furthermore, H.R. 2443 provides the Federal Reserve Board with the authority to suspend application of these time limits for 45 days, on any classification of checks with unacceptable levels of loss which can be directly related to check availability schedules.

This is an issue where the Congress can take a stand in behalf of the American consumer. I think that it is time for us to do that now.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, despite the lofty goals of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, I have concerns about the bill as reported out of the committee.

I don't deny that there is some showing of abuse. Some banks have unnecessarily held checks overlong. However, the incidence of needless delay, or abuse, is not great. H.R. 2443 may increase the incidence of NSF checks, causing those costs to be loaded on all the consumers who use the institution. Spreading the costs of deadbeats on the huge majority of bank-using consumers is not my idea of consumer protection.

I believe the bill could be greatly improved, and that consumers could be adequately protected if banks were allowed more discretion to hold checks under certain circumstances where they have reason to believe there was a real risk of noncollection. I understand an amendment will be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] which would provide such discretion, and I support his efforts.

I also am concerned that the 6-day ceiling will become a floor. That, too, is not my idea of consumer protection. Sometimes, the urge to legislate needs to be resisted. This bill, after amendment, could be useful, but there are risks, and it is not the highest priority for the House.

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Chairman, today's legislation is about time—the time it takes to clear checks—in-town, out-of-town, travelers, cashiers', Government and payroll—those little slips of paper that mean so much to all of us.

H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, sets uniform standards for the check clearing process. Wisely, Congress recognizes that a national payments system demands national standards. It's not fair that a depositor and his funds soon be parted in Indiana are not in New York. Financial services customers may have accounts in banks, thrifts, and credit unions outside their home State. Varied and conflicting State laws only add to the general confusion. Time is ripe for a single straightforward national system.

Some of my colleagues may have heard from their hometown bankers and thrift executives who are less than thrilled about this bill. They criticize this bill's timetable as impossible to meet. I disagree.

The bill states that within 3 years, there will be next-day availability for in-State checks and 3 day availability for out-of-State checks. Depository institutions are protected, too. Certain new accounts, checks over $5,000, checks drawn on foreign banks, and checks drawn on accounts with frequent overdrafts are excluded from the timetable. Just to make sure that financial institutions are not adversely affected by the hordes of fraudulent check writers, the Federal Reserve can suspend certain portions of the act to prevent losses from check fraud. I think that this is a most balanced approach.

In the late 1960's, the Federal Reserve found a way to speed up the collection process. Consumers who played the float game found it much more difficult.

Banks playing the float game need the same kind of rules. And that is what H.R. 2443 is about—playing for time so that financial services customers start with the same advantage as their financial institutions.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2443, a bill which would regulate the amount of time that a bank may hold the funds authorized by check for a depositor. This is an important bill which will be of considerable benefit to consumers while causing no unusual hardship to depository institutions.

I would like to take this opportunity to alert all of my fellow Members of my strong support for this legislation. There is rarely any reason to hold checks for as long as common practice seems to dictate. In doing so, consumers are short changed, and this practice just has to stop.

Mr. Chairman, we are now in the age of electronic fund transfers, we are in an age where funds are transferred from person to person and from institution to institution with great speed and accuracy. There is no reason whatsoever that depositories should hold a check for extended periods. Statistical evidence indicates that only about 1 percent of all checks are ever returned, and that a far fewer number of them are uncollectible.

This is an important bill whose time has come.

I urge all of my fellow Members of Congress to support this bill.

Thank you.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I rise as a cosponsor and supporter of this bill, H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

Simply put, this legislation provides important and long overdue protection for our Nation's consumers. For too long, our banks have been allowed to place holds on deposited checks for days or even weeks, unnecessarily preventing their customers from drawing on those funds. Meanwhile, the banks are able to invest this money almost immediately, allowing them to earn interest on the money they are withholding from their customers. In fact, it is estimated that banks earn over $290 million a year by taking advantage of the so-called float.

More importantly, though, this hold on checks has resulted in considerable inconvenience and financial hardship for millions of Americans who are denied access to money that is rightfully theirs. A 1985 survey by the Consumer Federation of America found that bounced check charges average over $13. The 9.7 million checks bounced every year because of check holds thus cost consumers $125 million annually in overdraft charges alone.

Worst of all is the impact check holds have on persons living on fixed incomes. As an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I am particularly concerned about how check holds unfairly burden our Nation's elderly. In many cases, seniors and so many others on fixed or low incomes live from one benefit or pay check to the next. If that money cannot be used for a lengthy period of time, as is often the case, these people cannot meet basic living expenses. This situation is not only wrong, it is dangerous.

In theory, hold periods are designed to allow banks to collect funds on deposits by check. That sounds reasonable enough. But, wait a minute. The Federal Reserve board estimates that 99 percent of all deposited checks are collected by banks within 1 or 2 businesses days. What then do 75 percent of the institutions surveyed by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group hold out-of-State checks for 6 business days or more; and why then do some check hold periods last as long as 20 business days? The answer appears simple: it's another way of the banking industry to satisfy its seemingly insatiable greed.

Frankly, I am not surprised. For the past year, I have been studying the way banks treat, or I should say rip off their credit card customers. While the cost of money to the banks is about half as much today as it was in 1981, credit card interest rates charged by the banks have actually gone up during that same period of time. The banks claim that the cost of administering their credit card business is high, but the only thing high is the banking industry's profit margin. Credit cards are one of the most lucrative money-making ventures conducted by the banks; so much so in fact that the banks are aggressively seeking new customers by sending out preapproved credit cards—a terribly inefficient business practice that has led to even higher credit card interest rates.

My calculations show that credit card issuers are overcharging their customers in interest by some $2 billion a year. That is why I have authored a bill, H.R. 1197, to cap credit card interest rates at 5 percentage points above the Federal Reserve's discount rate. This cap would be 12.5 percent under present economic conditions, or more than 6 percentage points less than the 18.6-percent national average.

The simple fact of the matter is that banks, like any other business, must be prevented from gouging its customers, whether it is in the form of exorbitant credit card interest rates or a lengthy hold on check deposits.

The provisions contained in H.R. 2443 are totally consistent with this philosophy. Under this bill, maximum holds on checks will range from next business day to 6 intervening business days for the first 3 years after enactment. The bill then limits holds to next-day availability for in-State checks, and 4-day availability for most out-of-State checks.

Significantly, H.R. 2443 also provides certain protections for the banks. For example, the measure authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to suspend the schedule for expedited availability of checks under emergency conditions, or if they find that check fraud losses are substantially increased under this measure. Further, the expedited availability of checks would not apply to certain deposits in new accounts; amounts over $5,000 per day; accounts with frequent overdrafts; and checks drawn on foreign banks. In addition, the bill instructs the Federal Reserve Board to improve the Nation's check clearing system to provide still more protection for the banks.

Mr. Chairman, this bill will protect the rights of consumers; it will look out for the interests of the banking industry; and it will create a quicker, more efficient system of processing checks. In short, it is a bill that deserves our overwhelming support.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

We live in an era of rapidly evolving technology, one in which funds can be transferred electronically in the blink of an eye.

Financial institutions understand this. Their representatives have repeatedly petitioned Congress to recognize the technological changes which have occurred in the industry. They argue that the banking system of the 1980's cannot be regulated by the laws of the 1930's.

In some instances, those arguments have merit. But just as Congress should recognize that sophisticated technology has made interstate banking, for example, a fact of life, so should bankers recognize that holding depositors' checks for lengthy periods does not reflect modern conditions.

Consider a few pertinent facts in the banking world of 1986.

First, most checks are cleared by banks within a couple of days.

Second, 99 percent of checks are paid the first time through the clearance process. Of those returned, three out of five are paid upon second presentment.

Third, according to the Federal Reserve, it costs a bank 36 cents to return a check. This figure includes losses to the bank incurred as a result of the return.

Why, then, do bank depositors experience check holds of up to 10 days and returned check charges of $10, $20, or even $30?

It is not difficult to understand the reason when we consider statistics provided by the Federal Reserve Board in 1984. According to the Fed, banks holding depositors' checks earned at least $290 million by taking advantage of the "float"—the period between when the bank has access to funds and when the consumer can use the money. Banks typically invest the funds and earn interest at market rates on depositors' money during the float period.

In addition, a recent study by the Bank Administration Institute indicates that banks earn $3.4 billion annually from charges imposed in connection with returned checks.

Those who bear the biggest burden in arbitrary check charges are wage earners living from paycheck to paycheck. If a bank decides to put a lengthy hold on a deposited check, and the wage earner unwittingly attempts to write checks against the amount deposited, the returned check charges for five checks, for example, can easily total more than $100. When one is working with a household budget with little margin for error, such a financial setback can be temporarily debilitating.

For the well-to-do, returned checks pose less of a problem. As Federal Reserve Board Governor Preston Martin told the Banking Committee in October:

> If you have CD's (certificates of deposit) with the bank and you don't employ your leverage as a customer to get that cost off your statement, you deserve to have the cost on the statement.

Most people lack the clout to convince banks to waive check charges. The Banking Committee heard testimony which described the case of a Chicago man who decided to move his account from a bank which routinely placed 3- to 5-day holds on his paycheck even though his employer's bank was located only a block away. Figuring that it would be easier to bank at his employer's bank, he opened a new account there with a cashier's check.

It was not good enough. The new bank then put a 1-week hold on the cashier's check. It now places a 3- to 5-day hold on his wife's checks drawn from another bank.

It is difficult to assess the total consumer loss which results from lengthy check holds. In addition to the returned check fees, consumers also lose interest from interest-bearing accounts and must often pay late fees to utilities and other creditors because of bounced checks.

The Expedited Funds Availability Act recognizes that changes must be made in the law to bring about reasonable check-holding policies.

The legislation provides customers with next-day access to checks of $100 or less, to checks drawn on in-State branches of the same institution, to cashiers and certified checks, and to Government checks.

In the first year following enactment, banks would have up to 2 business days after deposit to clear other local checks. In the following 2 years, checks would have to clear in no more than 1 business day. The legislation defines as local checks drawn from institutions within the same State or from within 1 of the Fed's 48 check-clearing regions.

Delays of up to 6 days would be allowed within the first 3 years after enactment for checks drawn on accounts from institutions in other States or check-clearing regions. During that time, the Fed is required to establish a permanent check-clearing process that would give customers access to all funds within 3 days.

This is a reasonable piece of legislation which meets the needs of consumers while phasing in the change so as to ease the transition for lenders.

I urge a "yes" vote on H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, how much time do I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] has 3 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remaining time on our side.

Mr. Chairman, overnight, I had a chance to read the so-called Dimension case.

Mr. Chairman, I think the bill before us today may have an additional implication which I would like to point out for the benefit of this record. H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, may have the practical effect of legislatively overriding part of the so-called Dimension case (Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System versus Dimension Financial Corp.) handed down yesterday by the Supreme Court in an 8 to 0 decision. Because of language in this bill, H.R. 2443 overturns that portion of the Dimension decision relating to demand deposits and thus would shut down all nonbank banks which make traditional commercial loans.

Let me explain my reasoning. Chairman ST GERMAIN's legislation, among other things, relates to the availability of deposits placed by consumers in depository institutions. Consumers can place their funds in accounts known as demand deposits, negotiable order of withdrawal [NOW] accounts, or share drafts, among other things.

In the Dimension case with respect to the demand deposit aspect of nonbank banks, the Supreme Court held that the statutory language speaks in terms of deposits that the depositor has a legal right to withdraw on demand. The Court then noted that NOW accounts and similar transactional devices specifically reserve a legal right to the depository institution to require advance notice of a withdrawal request of up to 14 days. Therefore, the Court held that these transaction accounts are not demand deposits as defined in the Bank Holding Company Act, even though, as a practical matter, NOW accounts are functionally equivalent to demand deposits. The Court concluded that the Federal Reserve Board had no authority to broaden the definition of a demand deposit to include NOW accounts and similar deposits.

Under H.R. 2443, demand deposits, NOW accounts, and share draft accounts are all treated identically. The legal distinctions which existed yesterday, as far as the Supreme Court is concerned, disappear today if the House acts favorably on this legislation. Funds will have to be made available to depositors for all of these accounts at the same time. Under H.R. 2443, a depository institution loses its legal right to put a 14-day hold on NOW deposits. Therefore, the legal distinction between NOW accounts and other forms of checking accounts which formed the basis for the Supreme Court's Dimension decision no longer exists. The plain language of the bill makes this clear, notwithstanding the discussion in the committee report to the contrary. The logical conclusion is that the Dimension case would no longer be binding in this instance due to a change in law and, in effect, would be legislatively reversed by the plain language of H.R. 2443.

The bottom line is that the legislation before us today closes one part of the so-called nonbank loophole by further reason to support preventing financial institutions from making commercial loans and offering NOW accounts without becoming a "bank" under the Bank Holding Company Act. All nonbank banks which make traditional commercial loans would be shut down because of H.R. 2443.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, Mr. ST GERMAIN, for his foresight in crafting the Expedited Funds Availability Act. While I am not sure that this is the proper vehicle to begin overturning at least part of the Supreme Court's Dimension case, it is not a bad first step.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill. It is carefully drafted legislation. It protects the consumer, and it does safeguard banks in case of unforeseen circumstances.

As I look at it, if Members of this House cannot vote for this consumer protection bill, then I do not think they can vote for any bill. I urge its adoption.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2443. For too long, consumers have been denied access to their funds, while bankers have profited by placing long and unjustified holds on checks deposited by consumers. These holds go far beyond any legitimate requirement necessary to protect against loss, and are enforced for profit, not protection.

According to the Federal Reserve, 99 percent of all deposited checks are collected by banks within 2 business days of deposit. Nevertheless, banks impose unrealistically long holds on checks, in some cases of up to 20 business days, or 4 weeks. This enables them to invest the funds while denying consumers access to their money.

Banks benefit not only from the profits they earn on the hold, or float, but on the overdraft charges imposed on checks written on the held funds. Consumers are charged an average of $13 per check for bounced checks written on held funds. At some banks, these charges are as high as $30 per check. These overcharges cost consumers $125 million annually. What is most disgraceful about these charges is not their shocking size, but the fact that the checks are bounced for being written on "uncollected funds," when the funds have been collected.

My own State of Illinois has decided to put an end to this scam. On November 25, the Governor of Illinois signed legislation making sweeping changes in Illinois banking law. The legislation contains important consumer protections, including a provision limiting holds on checks deposited by consumers. With enactment of that provision, Illinois becomes only the sixth State to legislate maximum check holds.

Under the law, consumers will no longer have to suffer inordinate holds on their deposits. For any account that has been opened at least 90 days, financial institutions can hold checks issued by the United States, Illinois, or local Illinois governments for no more than 2 banking days. For other checks drawn on Illinois banks, the hold cannot exceed 5 banking days, and for checks drawn on out-of-State banks, no more than 8 banking days. The bill takes effect on July 1, 1986.

Much credit for the Illinois legislation must go to Illinois House Majority Whip Ralph C. Capparelli, whose 13th legislative district includes much of my 11th Congressional District. Representative Capparelli is to be congratulated for his efforts in passing this bill.

I am pleased that Illinois consumers and consumers of five other States have the benefit of State funds availability legislation. But that means that consumers of 44 other States do not. The Truth in Lending Act, the Equal Opportunity Act, and the other provisions of the Consumer Credit Protection Act show that uniform, Federal, minimum standards are vital in consumer banking legislation. The Expedited Funds Availability Act is in that mold and is sure to benefit consumers nationwide. At the same time, States will be free to establish more favorable consumer protections regarding the length of check holds.

I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 2443. During the hearings on the bill, I heard overwhelming evidence of the need for this legislation. Having participated in the markup of the bill in both the Financial Institution Subcommittee and the Full Banking Committee, I know that it is carefully balanced to eliminate unreasonable check holds without subjecting financial institutions to any risk of increased fraud losses.

H.R. 2443 is an important piece of consumer legislation. As chairman of the Consumer Affairs Subcommittee, I support H.R. 2443 and urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER], a member of the committee.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHUMER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, while I'm certainly aware of the problem of excessive "holds" on financial instruments which certain depository institutions impose, I must rise in opposition to H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

Quite simply, there is not a need for Federal legislation of this sort. Unnecessary delays in clearing checks and other financial instruments is a localized problem, one which varies from State to State and which is best dealt with by State authorities. Six States have already enacted check hold funds availability legislation best suited to their particular concerns and another dozen legislatures have discussed possible legislation. Moving forward with this legislation will only preempt State efforts to construct the best possible means for addressing this problem.

In addition to preempting the State's right to regulate this matter, I also believe this legislation would ultimately raise costs for consumers. H.R. 2443 imposes rigid, unrealistic time schedules on depository institutions. In a system where 40 billion checks are written on 40,000 financial institutions yearly, this bill would require depository institutions to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in processing systems capable of meeting these rigid, federally imposed payment schedules.

This legislation is also lacking in that it does not contain a "good faith" exemption for protecting depository institutions from losses where there is an honest and legitimate belief that a check is uncollectable.

Who pays for this massive investment and for uncollectable checks? It's the consumer, of course.

Access to funds in a timely manner is something we're all interested in, and I don't just mean as legislators. Clearly, different financial institutions have different policies on the availability of funds. But why should we treat banking services differently from other goods and services in the marketplace?

As most depository institutions already realize, providing prompt access to deposited funds is good business. If there are a few institutions who aren't clearing checks expeditiously, why not let consumers exercise the most persuasive and compelling sanction of all—let them move their business elsewhere.

Along these lines, disclosure requirements would be much more effective in dealing with "a few rotten apples," as opposed to mandating rigid, unrealistic, and costly mandatory availability policies.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, first let me salute our chairman for the leadership that he has shown on this issue. Hopefully, this year will be the year of the consumer in banking law. Hopefully, this will be the first of many pieces of proconsumer legislation to emerge from the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs to pass this body and pass the other body.

Without the leadership of our good chairman, this year of the consumer in banking law might well not happen.

I would like to say to my colleagues, I think many of you have laid out very cogently the reasons for this legislation. Let me just try to put them in context.

We are living in a world of banking deregulation. This Congress may choose not to act, but the regulators and the economy move along and banking has become deregulated.

Consumers are hit with fees of every kind, changes in rules, and changes in laws, changes in policy. It is very hard for a consumer who would spend all of his or her time keeping track of these changes to adapt to those laws, let alone a working man or woman who has a family to raise.

It, therefore, behooves this body, this Congress, to do things that will be helpful to the consumer to make sure that a modicum of fairness exists in this wild and wooly world of deregulation. Elemental fairness in saying if you have deposited money and the banks have taken credit for your money, you should have access and interest. That is all this bill does. It deserves passage in an unamended form.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each section shall be considered as having been read.

No amendments to said substitute are in order except pro forma amendments and amendments printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at least 1 legislative day prior to consideration.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

The text of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

H.R. 2443

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Expedited Funds Availability Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) the writing and depositing of checks is an important element in the efficient operation of the American economy;

(2) many people rely on the rapid availability of funds deposited in their accounts for the basic necessities of life;

(3) notwithstanding the fact that depository institutions usually receive provisional credit from the Federal Reserve for checks they receive within one to two business days after such checks are deposited with them, many depository institutions have imposed inordinate delays on the availability of those funds to depositors;

(4) the incidence of returned checks, which depository institutions often use to justify their delayed funds availability policies, amount to approximately one percent of all checks written in the United States, and a substantial portion of these returned checks are paid on second presentment;

(5) with few exceptions, efforts by State governments, Federal agencies, and the financial industry have been unsuccessful in curbing the abuses which have been found in the area of delayed funds availability; and

(6) a coordinated Federal response is the most reasonable way to assure that depositors throughout the United States are treated fairly in gaining access to funds in their accounts.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) adopt temporary, maximum time limits for the availability of funds deposited by check;

(2) replace those temporary time limits with standard availability ceilings within 3 years after the effective date of section 4;

(3) require depository institutions to fully disclose their funds availability policies to depositors;

(4) permit States, and individual depository institutions, to adopt funds availability policies which allow depositors to gain access to funds earlier than prescribed by Federal law or regulation; and

(5) prescribe appropriate enforcement mechanisms to ensure compliance with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 3. DEVELOPMENT OF PERMANENT EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY SYSTEM.

(a) PERMANENT EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY SYSTEM.—

(1) DEVELOPMENT REQUIRED.—The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall immediately begin to develop an expedited funds availability system which will meet the funds availability schedule established in subsection (b).

(2) TIME LIMIT ON IMPLEMENTATION.—The expedited funds availability system shall be implemented as soon as possible, but in no event later than 3 years after the effective date of section 4.

(b) SCHEDULE.—

(1) AVAILABILITY OF LOCAL CHECKS.—Funds deposited in an account at a depository institution by checks drawn on a local originating depository institution and checks described in any subparagraph of section 4(c)(2) shall be available for withdrawal not later than the start of the business day following the business day on which such checks were deposited.

(2) AVAILABILITY OF NONLOCAL CHECKS.—For all other checks, not more than three business days shall intervene between the business day on which such checks are deposited in an account at a depository institution and the business day on which the funds involved are available for withdrawal.

(c) REGULATIONS.—In connection with the establishment of the expedited funds availability system described in subsection (a), the Board shall consider (among other proposals) requiring, by regulation, that—

(1) the Federal Reserve banks and depository institutions shall take such actions as are necessary to automate the process of returning unpaid checks;

(2) each depository institution and Federal Reserve bank shall place its endorsement, and other notations specified in regulations of the Board, on checks in the positions specified in such regulations;

(3) within one business day after an originating depository institution is presented a check (for more than such minimum amount as the Board may prescribe)—

(A) such originating depository institution shall determine whether it will pay such check; and

(B) if such originating depository institution determines that it will not pay such check, such originating depository institution shall directly notify the receiving depository institution of such determination;

(4) regardless of where a check is cleared initially, all returned checks shall be eligible to be returned through the Federal Reserve System; and

(5) originating depository institutions shall be permitted to return unpaid checks directly to, and obtain reimbursement for such checks directly from, the receiving depository institution.

(d) CHECK RETURN; NOTICE OF NONPAYMENT.—No provision of this section shall be construed as requiring that, with respect to checks deposited in a receiving depository institution—

(1) such checks be physically returned to such depository institution; or

(2) any notice of nonpayment of any such check be given to such depository institution within the times set forth in subsection (b).

(e) REPORTS.—

(1) IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS REPORTS.—

(A) REQUIRED SEMIANNUALLY.—The Board shall transmit a report to both Houses of the Congress not later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act and every 6 months thereafter until the schedule established in subsection (b) is implemented.

(B) CONTENTS OF REPORT.—Each such report shall describe the actions taken by the Board to achieve the schedule established in subsection (b).

(2) EVALUATION OF TEMPORARY SCHEDULE REPORT.—

(A) REPORT REQUIRED.—The Board shall transmit a report to both Houses of the Congress not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act regarding the effects the temporary schedules established under section 4 have had on depository institutions and the public.

(B) CONTENTS OF REPORT.—Such report shall also assess the potential impact the implementation of the schedule established in subsection (b) will have on depository institutions and the public, including an estimate of the risks to and losses of depository institutions and the costs and benefits to consumers.

Such report shall also contain such recommendations for legislative or administrative action as the Board may determine to be necessary.

SEC. 4. EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY.

(a) NEXT BUSINESS DAY AVAILABILITY FOR CASH DEPOSITS; WIRE TRANSFERS.—Except as provided in section 5, in any case in which—

(1) any cash is deposited in an account at a receiving depository institution staffed by individuals employed by such institution, or

(2) funds are received by a depository institution by wire transfer for deposit in an account at such institution, such cash or funds shall be available for withdrawal not later than the business day after the business day on which such cash is deposited or such funds are received for deposit.

(b) CASH DEPOSITS AT AN ATM.—In any case in which cash is received at an automated teller machine for deposit in an account at a depository institution, such cash shall be available for withdrawal not later than the business day after the business day on which such cash is so received.

(c) FIRST YEAR SCHEDULE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (f) and section 5, funds deposited by check in an account at a depository institution before the end of the 1-year period beginning on the date this section takes effect shall be available for withdrawal not later than the business day provided in the applicable paragraph of this subsection.

(2) NEXT BUSINESS DAY AVAILABILITY.—Funds deposited in an account at a depository institution by check shall be available on the business day after the business day on which such funds are deposited in the case of—

(A) a check for not more than $100;

(B) a check deposited in a branch of a depository institution and drawn on another branch of the same depository institution if both such branches are located in the same check processing region or in the same State;

(C) a check which—

(i) is endorsed only by the person to whom it was issued; and

(ii) is drawn on the Treasury of the United States;

(D) a check which—

(i) is endorsed only by the person to whom it was issued;

(ii) is drawn on the treasury of a State;

(iii) is deposited in a receiving depository institution which is located in such State and is staffed by individuals employed by such institution; and

(iv) is deposited with a special deposit slip which indicates it is a check drawn on the treasury of a State;

(E) a check which—

(i) is endorsed only by the person to whom it was issued;

(ii) is drawn on the treasury of a unit of general local government;

(iii) is deposited in a receiving depository institution which is located in the same State as such unit of general local government and is staffed by individuals employed by such institution; and

(iv) is deposited with a special deposit slip which indicates it is a check drawn on the treasury of a unit of general local government; and

(F) a cashier's check, certified check, teller's check, or depository check which—

(i) is endorsed only by the person to whom it was issued;

(ii) is deposited in a receiving depository institution which is staffed by individuals employed by such institution; and

(iii) is deposited with a special deposit slip which indicates it is a cashier's check, certified check, teller's check, or depository check, as the case may be.

(3) AVAILABILITY OF LOCAL CHECKS.—Not more than 2 business days shall intervene between the business day on which funds are deposited in an account at a depository institution by a check drawn on a local originating depository institution and the business day on which such funds are available for withdrawal.

(4) AVAILABILITY OF NONLOCAL CHECKS.—Not more than 6 business days shall intervene between the business day on which funds are deposited in an account at a depository institution by a check drawn on a nonlocal originating depository institution and the business day on which such funds are available for withdrawal.

(d) SECOND AND THIRD YEAR SCHEDULE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (f) and section 5, funds deposited by check in an account at a depository institution during the second and third year after the effective date of this section shall be available for withdrawal not later than the business day provided in the applicable paragraph of this subsection.

(2) NEXT BUSINESS DAY AVAILABILITY.—Funds deposited in an account at a depository institution by a check described in any subparagraph of subsection (c)(2) shall be available for withdrawal as provided in such subsection.

(3) AVAILABILITY OF LOCAL CHECKS.—Not more than 1 business day shall intervene between the business day on which funds are deposited in an account at a depository institution by a check drawn on a local originating depository institution and the business day on which such funds are available for withdrawal.

(4) AVAILABILITY OF NONLOCAL CHECKS.—Funds deposited in an account at a depository institution by a check drawn on a nonlocal originating depository institution shall be available for withdrawal as provided in subsection (c)(4).

(e) TIME PERIOD ADJUSTMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Board may, by regulation—

(A) shorten any time period established under subsection (c) or (d);

(B) extend by one business day any time period established under subsection (c) or (d), or shortened under paragraph (1), with respect to any deposit made at a shared or nonproprietary automatic teller machine; and

(C) extend by one business day any time period established under subsection (c) or (d), or shortened under paragraph (1), with respect to any deposit made at any depository institution described in clauses (ii) through (vi) of section 19(b)(1)(A) of the Federal Reserve Act.

(2) EXPIRATION AFTER 3 YEARS.—The authority contained in paragraph (1)(C) shall expire 3 years after the effective date of this section.

(f) SUBSECTION (c) AND (d) SCHEDULES SUPERSEDED BY SECTION 3 SYSTEM.—If the expedited funds availability system established under section 3(a) is implemented before the end of the 3-year period referred to in paragraph (2) of such section, the schedules established in subsections (c) and (d) (other than subsection (c)(2)) shall not apply after the date such system is implemented.

SEC. 5. SAFEGUARD EXCEPTIONS.

(a) NEW ACCOUNTS.—In the case of any account established at a depository institution by a new depositor, the following provisions shall apply with respect to any deposit in such account during the 30-day period beginning on the date such account was established:

(1) NEXT BUSINESS DAY AVAILABILITY OF CASH ITEMS.—Except as provided in paragraph (3), in the case of—

(A) any cash deposited in such account;

(B) any funds received by such depository institution by wire transfer for deposit in such account; and

(C) any funds deposited in such account by cashier's check, certified check, teller's check, depository check, or traveller's check, such cash or funds shall be available for withdrawal on the business day after the business day on which such cash or funds are deposited or, in the case of a wire transfer, such funds are received for deposit.

(2) AVAILABILITY OF OTHER ITEMS.—In the case of any funds deposited in such account by a check (other than a check described in paragraph (1)(C)), the availability for withdrawal of such funds shall not be subject to the provisions of section 3(b), 4(c), or 4(d).

(3) LIMITATION RELATING TO PARAGRAPH (1)(C) CHECKS IN EXCESS OF $5,000.—In the case of funds deposited in such account during such period by checks described in paragraph (1)(C) the aggregate amount of which exceeds $5,000—

(A) paragraph (1) shall apply only with respect to the first $5,000 of such aggregate amount; and

(B) not more than 8 business days shall intervene between the business day on which any such funds are deposited and the business day on which such excess amount shall be available for withdrawal.

(b) DEPOSITS BY CHECKS IN EXCESS OF $5,000.—In the case of funds deposited on any business day in an account at a depository institution by checks the aggregate amount of which exceeds $5,000, sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall apply only with respect to the first $5,000 of such aggregate amount.

(c) CHECKS REDEPOSITED AFTER INITIAL RETURN.—In the case of a check which was returned unpaid by the originating depository institution, sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply to any subsequent redeposit of such check in an account at a depository institution.

(d) REPEATED OVERDRAFTS.—In any case in which, on three separate and distinct occasions within any 6-month period, any account (or successor account as defined by the Board, by regulation) of a depositor has been the subject of checks which were written by such depositor and which were in excess of the available funds in the account involved, sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply to any such account for a period of 6 months following the last occasion involved.

(e) FOREIGN CHECKS.—Sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply in any case in which a check is drawn on a depository institution, or an office of a depository institution, located outside of the United States.

(f) EMERGENCY CONDITIONS.—Subject to such regulations as the Board may prescribe, sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply to amounts deposited in any receiving depository institution in the case of—

(1) any interruption of communication facilities;

(2) suspension of payments by another depository institution;

(3) any war; or

(4) any emergency condition beyond the control of the receiving depository institution, if the receiving depository institution exercises such diligence as the circumstances require.

(g) PREVENTION OF FRAUD LOSSES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Board may, by regulation or order, suspend the applicability of this Act, or any portion thereof, to any classification of checks if the Board determines that—

(A) depository institutions are experiencing an unacceptable level of losses due to check-related fraud, and

(B) suspension of this Act, or such portion of this Act, with regard to the classification of checks involved in such fraud is necessary to diminish the volume of such fraud.

(2) SUNSET PROVISION.—No regulation prescribed or order issued under paragraph (1) shall remain in effect for more than 45 days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, legal holidays, or any day either House of Congress is not in session).

(3) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—

(A) NOTICE OF EACH SUSPENSION.—Within 10 days of prescribing any regulation or issuing any order under paragraph (1), the Board shall transmit a report of such action to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs of the Senate.

(B) CONTENTS OF REPORT.—Each report under subparagraph (A) shall contain—

(i) the specific reason for prescribing the regulation or issuing the order;

(ii) evidence considered by the Board in making the determination under paragraph (1) with respect to such regulation or order; and

(iii) specific examples of the check-related fraud giving rise to such regulation or order.

SEC. 6. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

(a) EFFECT ON POLICIES OF DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS.—No provision of this Act shall be construed as—

(1) prohibiting a depository institution from making funds available for withdrawal in a shorter period of time than the period of time required by this Act; or

(2) affecting a depository institution's right—

(A) to accept or reject a check for deposit;

(B) to revoke any provisional settlement made by the depository institution with respect to a check accepted by such institution for deposit;

(C) to charge back the depositor's account for the amount of such check; or

(D) to claim a refund of such provisional credit.

(b) REGULATORY RESPONSIBILITY OF BOARD FOR PAYMENT SYSTEM.—

(1) RESPONSIBILITY FOR PAYMENT SYSTEM.—In order to carry out the provisions of this Act, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall have the responsibility to regulate—

(A) any aspect of the payment system, including the receipt, payment, collection, or clearing of checks; and

(B) any related function of the payment system with respect to checks.

(2) REGULATIONS.—The Board shall prescribe such regulations as it may determine to be appropriate to carry out its responsibility under paragraph (1).

(c) AFTER-HOURS DEPOSITS.—For purposes of this Act, any deposit which is made on a Saturday, Sunday, legal holiday, or after the close of business on any business day shall be deemed to have been made on the next business day.

(d) PROHIBITION ON FREEZING CERTAIN FUNDS IN AN ACCOUNT.—In any case in which a check is deposited in an account at a depository institution and the funds represented by such check are not yet available for withdrawal pursuant to this Act, the depository institution may not freeze any other funds in such account (which are otherwise available for withdrawal pursuant to this Act) solely because the funds so deposited are not yet available for withdrawal.

(e) EMPLOYEE TRAINING ON AND COMPLIANCE WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF THIS ACT.—Each depository institution shall—

(1) take such actions as may be necessary to fully inform each employee of such institution of the requirements of this Act; and

(2) establish and maintain procedures reasonably designed to assure and monitor employee compliance with such requirements.

(f) AVAILABILITY AT START OF BUSINESS DAY.—Wherever any provision of this Act requires that funds be available for withdrawal on any business day, such funds shall be available for withdrawal at the start of such business day.

SEC. 7. EFFECT ON STATE LAW.

Any law or regulation of any State which requires that funds deposited or received for deposit in an account at a depository institution chartered by such State be made available for withdrawal in a shorter period of time than the period of time provided in this Act or in regulations prescribed by the Board under this Act shall—

(1) supersede the provisions of this Act and any regulations by the Board to the extent such provisions relate to the time by which funds deposited or received for deposit in an account shall be available for withdrawal; and

(2) apply to all federally insured depository institutions located within such State.

SEC. 8. PAYMENT OF INTEREST.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in any case in which funds are deposited in an interest-bearing account at a depository institution, interest shall accrue on such funds beginning not later than the business day on which the depository institution receives provisional credit for such funds, except that no provision of this Act shall be construed as requiring the payment of interest on funds deposited by a check which is returned unpaid.

SEC. 9. DISCLOSURE OF FUNDS AVAILABILITY POLICIES.

(a) NOTICE FOR NEW ACCOUNTS.—Before an account is opened at a depository institution, the depository institution involved shall provide written notice to the potential customer of the specific policy of such depository institution with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited into the customer's account.

(b) PREPRINTED DEPOSIT SLIPS.—All preprinted deposit slips that a depository institution furnishes to its customers shall contain a summary notice, as prescribed by the Board in regulations, that deposited items may not be available for immediate withdrawal.

(c) MAILING OF NOTICE.—

(1) FIRST MAILING AFTER ENACTMENT.—In the first regularly scheduled mailing to customers occurring more than 30 days after the effective date of this section, each depository institution shall send a written notice containing the specific policy of such depository institution with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited into such customer's account.

(2) SUBSEQUENT CHANGES.—Each time—

(A) a depository institution makes a significant change in the specific policy of such depository institution with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited into such customer's account; or

(B) any period prescribed in section 4(c) or 4(d) is shortened or lengthened by the Board under section 4(e), such depository institution shall send a written notice to its customers of such change not less than 30 days before the date such change becomes effective.

(d) POSTING OF NOTICE.—

(1) SPECIFIC NOTICE AT MANNED TELLER STATIONS.—Each depository institution shall post, in a conspicuous place in each location where deposits are accepted by individuals employed by such depository institution, a specific notice which describes the time periods applicable to the availability of funds deposited in a customer's account.

(2) GENERAL NOTICE AT AUTOMATED TELLER MACHINES.—In the case of any automated teller machine at which any funds are received for deposit in an account at any depository institution, the Board shall prescribe, by regulations, that the owner or operator of such automated teller machine shall post a general notice that funds deposited in such machine may not be immediately available for withdrawal.

(e) NOTICE THAT FUNDS MAY BE AVAILABLE SOONER THAN REQUIRED.—Each written notice required under this section shall contain a statement, in such form as the Board may prescribe, that informs depositors that deposited funds may be available sooner than the time prescribed under the policy of the depository institution.

SEC. 10. MODEL DISCLOSURE FORMS.

(a) DEVELOPMENT.—The Board may publish model disclosure forms and clauses for common transactions—

(1) to facilitate compliance with the disclosure requirements of this Act; or

(2) to aid customers by utilizing readily understandable language.

(b) VOLUNTARY USE.—Nothing in this Act requires the use by any depository institution of any model disclosure form or clause published by the Board under subsection (a).

SEC. 11. PAYMENTS SYSTEM ADVISORY COUNCIL.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—(1) The Board shall establish a Payments System Advisory Council to advise and consult with the Board in the exercise of its functions under this Act.

(2) In appointing the members of the Council, the Board shall seek to achieve a fair representation of the interests of depository institutions, consumers, commercial depositors, and the technology industries.

(b) GENERAL PROVISIONS.—(1) The Council shall meet from time to time at the call of the Board.

(2) Members of the Council who are not regular full-time employees of the United States shall, while attending meetings of the Council, be entitled to receive compensation at a rate fixed by the Board, but not exceeding $100 per day, including travel time.

(3) Such members may be allowed travel expenses, including transportation and subsistence, while away from their homes or regular place of business.

SEC. 12. REGULATIONS.

(a) REGULATIONS.—The Board shall prescribe regulations—

(1) to carry out the provisions of this Act;

(2) to prevent the circumvention or evasion of such provisions; and

(3) to facilitate compliance with such provisions.

(b) OVERRIDE OF UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE.—Except as provided in section 7, this Act and regulations prescribed under this Act shall supersede any provision of the law of any State, including the Uniform Commercial Code as in effect in such State, which is inconsistent with this Act or such regulations.

(c) CONSULTATION.—In prescribing regulations under subsection (a), the Board shall consult with the Payments System Advisory Council, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and the National Credit Union Administration Board.

SEC. 13. ADMINISTRATIVE ENFORCEMENT.

(a) ADMINISTRATIVE ENFORCEMENT.—Compliance with the requirements imposed under this Act, including regulations prescribed by and orders issued by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System under this Act, shall be enforced under—

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act in the case of—

(A) national banks, by the Comptroller of the Currency;

(B) member banks of the Federal Reserve System (other than national banks), by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; and

(C) banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (other than members of the Federal Reserve System), by the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(2) section 5(d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, section 407 of the National Housing Act, and section 17 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), in the case of any institution subject to any of those provisions; and

(3) the Federal Credit Union Act, by the National Credit Union Administration Board with respect to any Federal credit union or insured credit union.

(b) ADDITIONAL POWERS.—

(1) VIOLATION OF THIS ACT TREATED AS VIOLATION OF OTHER ACTS.—For purposes of the exercise by any agency referred to in subsection (a) of this section of its powers under any Act referred to in that subsection, a violation of any requirement imposed under this Act shall be deemed to be a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act.

(2) ENFORCEMENT AUTHORITY UNDER OTHER ACTS.—In addition to its powers under any provision of law specifically referred to in subsection (a) of this section, each of the agencies referred to in such subsection may exercise, for purposes of enforcing compliance with any requirement imposed under this Act, any other authority conferred on it by law.

(c) ENFORCEMENT BY THE BOARD.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this Act is specifically committed to some other Government agency under subsection (a) of this section, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall enforce such requirements.

(2) ADDITIONAL REMEDY.—If the Board determines that—

(A) any depository institution which is not a depository institution described in subsection (a), or

(B) any other person subject to the authority of the Board under this Act, including any person subject to the authority of the Board under section 6(b) or 9(d)(2), has failed to comply with any requirement imposed by this Act or by the Board under this Act, the Board may issue an order prohibiting any depository institution, any Federal Reserve bank, or any other person subject to the authority of the Board from engaging in any activity or transaction which directly or indirectly involves such noncomplying depository institution or person (including any activity or transaction involving the receipt, payment, collection, and clearing of checks and any related function of the payment system with respect to checks).

(d) PROCEDURAL RULES.—The authority of the Board to prescribe regulations under this Act does not impair the authority of any other agency designated in this section to make rules regarding its own procedures in enforcing compliance with requirements imposed under this Act.

SEC. 14. CIVIL LIABILITY.

(a) CIVIL LIABILITY.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, any depository institution which fails to comply with any requirement imposed under this Act or any regulation prescribed under this Act with respect to any person is liable to such person in an amount equal to the sum of—

(1) any actual damage sustained by such person as a result of the failure;

(2)(A) in the case of an individual action, such additional amount as the court may allow, except that the liability under this subparagraph shall not be less than $100 nor greater than $1,000; or

(B) in the case of a class action, such amount as the court may allow, except that—

(i) as to each member of the class, no minimum recovery shall be applicable; and

(ii) the total recovery under this subparagraph in any class action or series of class actions arising out of the same failure to comply by the same depository institution shall not be more than the lesser of $500,000 or 1 percent of the net worth of the depository institution involved; and

(3) in the case of any successful action to enforce the foregoing liability, the costs of the action, together with a reasonable attorney's fee as determined by the court.

(b) CLASS ACTION AWARDS.—In determining the amount of any award in any class action, the court shall consider, among other relevant factors—

(1) the amount of any actual damages awarded;

(2) the frequency and persistence of failures of compliance;

(3) the resources of the depository institution;

(4) the number of persons adversely affected; and

(5) the extent to which the failure of compliance was intentional.

(c) BONA FIDE ERRORS.—

(1) GENERAL RULE.—A depository institution may not be held liable in any action brought under this section for a violation of this Act if the depository institution demonstrates by a preponderance of the evidence that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error, notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error.

(2) EXAMPLES.—Examples of a bona fide error include clerical, calculation, computer malfunction and programming, and printing errors, except that an error of legal judgment with respect to a depository institution's obligation under this Act is not a bona fide error.

(d) JURISDICTION.—Any action under this section may be brought in any United States district court, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, within one year after the date of the occurrence of the violation involved.

(e) RELIANCE ON BOARD RULINGS.—No provision of this section imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or interpretation thereof by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, notwithstanding the fact that after such act or omission has occurred, such rule, regulation, or interpretation is amended, rescinded, or determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.

SEC. 15. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "account" means any demand deposit account and any other similar transaction account at a depository institution;

(2) the term "Board" means the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System;

(3) the term "business day" means any day other than a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday;

(4) the term "cash" means United States coins and currency, including Federal Reserve notes;

(5) the term "cashier's check" means any check which—

(A) is drawn on a depository institution;

(B) is signed by an officer or employee of such depository institution; and

(C) is a direct obligation of such depository institution;

(6) the term "certified check" means any check with respect to which a depository institution certifies that—

(A) the signature on the check is genuine; and

(B) such depository institution has set aside funds which—

(i) are equal to the amount of the check; and

(ii) will be used only to pay such check;

(7) the term "check" means any negotiable demand draft drawn on or payable through a depository institution;

(8) the term "check processing region" means the geographical area served by a Federal Reserve bank check processing center or such larger area as the Board may prescribe by regulations;

(9) the term "Council" means the Payments System Advisory Council;

(10) the term "depository check" means any cashier's check, certified check, teller's check, and any other functionally equivalent instrument as determined by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System;

(11) the term "depository institution" has the meaning given such term in clauses (i) through (vi) of section 19(b)(1)(A) of the Federal Reserve Act;

(12) the term "local originating depository institution" means any originating depository institution which is located in the same check processing region or in the same State as the receiving depository institution;

(13) the term "nonlocal originating depository institution" means any originating depository institution which is not a local depository institution;

(14) the term "originating depository institution" means the branch of a depository institution on which a check is drawn;

(15) the term "receiving depository institution" means the branch of a depository institution in which a check is first deposited;

(19) the term "United States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and

(20) the term "wire transfer" has such meaning as the Board shall prescribe by regulations.

SEC. 16. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) DATE OF ENACTMENT.—Sections 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 15, and 16 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) 90 DAYS AFTER DATE OF ENACTMENT.—Sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 13 shall take effect 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) 180 DAYS AFTER DATE OF ENACTMENT.—Section 14 shall take effect 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d) REGULATORY AUTHORITY OF THE BOARD.—Notwithstanding subsections (b) and (c), any provision of this Act which authorizes the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to prescribe regulations shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MC COLLUM

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCOLLUM: Page 6, line 24, after "with respect to" insert "all".

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a very simple, technical amendment. It involves the fact that the Federal Reserve Board, under this legislation, is directed to prepare a system for expedited funds availability. That system would encompass any number of possibilities.

Later on in the legislation, we have given some leeway for the attitude that we otherwise would maybe be imposing here on banks that in the case of checks that are deposited in receiving institutions, they would not be required to return all of those checks or to file notices of nonpayment necessarily within the time limits that we have set forth, or within the system that the Federal Reserve plans.

It was not my intent in committee when offering amendments dealing with this to allow it to be that broad, and the amendment I am offering today, and that I am about to yield to the chairman on, simply will restrict it and instead of any check having to be returned, it will simply say all checks do not have to be.

So we do give the message to the Fed and other people that we intend for them to return most of those checks if they possibly can and give notice when they can.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOLLUM. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman so clearly stated, it clarifies that no provision of section 3 should be interpreted as requiring all depositors' checks be returned or that notice of nonpayment be given with certain time frames.

Mr. McCOLLUM. That is correct.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. That being the case, Mr. Chairman this side of the aisle is very happy to accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. McCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. McCOLLUM].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SHUMWAY

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY: On page 18, line 15, add a new subsection (h) to section 5 as follows:

"(h) Sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply to a check if the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that the drawer or drawee of the check has become, or is about to become, subject to bankruptcy, receivership or similar proceeding, or when the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that a situation involving fraud or kiting exists."

Mr. SHUMWAY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was considered in the Committee on Banking, I offered an amendment that would allow banks to exempt themselves from the schedules prescribed in this bill if they had some good faith reason to believe that the instrument presented for deposit would not be paid.

Members of the committee objected to that amendment. They felt that the good faith discretion on the part of the bank might lead to abuses. When the vote was taken, the majority of the committee opposed the amendment. Perhaps it was too broad.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, coming before this body today I have recast this amendment and excluded therefrom any reference to good faith. That is why I say once again this is not a good faith amendment. It has been very carefully drawn to apply to only three situations.

Those three situations would require a reasonable belief on the part of a bank and would close much of the discretion and latitude that members of the committee feared banks otherwise would use to take advantage of consumers.

Those three situations are these: First, if the institution, bank, or whatever, has a reasonable belief that the drawer or drawee is about to become insolvent, bankrupt, or enter into receivership and thereby prevent the bank from recovering on that instrument.

Second, if the institution has some reasonable belief that a situation involving fraud exists. That would be quite apparent by means of detecting forgery or perhaps check alteration or some other things the bankers are trained to look for.

Third, if the institution, again, has a reasonable belief that a situation involving check kiting exists. Usually this is indicated by an unusually high activity in some depositors' accounts. This amendment would simply say to banks that if they believe, if they have a reasonable belief, that one of these three situations applies, they could exempt the instrument from the hold schedules which otherwise would apply.

The amendment would allow the exception to be exercised only on an individual check-by-check basis. It would not permit banks to exempt entire classifications of checks from the requisite schedules.

Mr. Chairman, without this amendment we are going to have a situation, if a bank discovers reasonable cause to believe that a check is uncollectable after it accepts that check it will have no recourse. It must provide access to the funds, and then upon dishonor of the check it must then be put in a position to attempt reimbursement.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, in cases of fraud, check kiting, certainly in a case of insolvency, the chances of bank reimbursement are very, very low indeed.

This produces unfortunate results for both the bank and the consumer. First it would require that banks, in case of one of these doubts applying, would restrict for deposit a check which has been presented for them. Perhaps they would accept it on a for-collection basis only. Those of you not in the banking industry might not realize this, but that requires a very slow and manual process of essentially walking a check through the collection procedures. It takes time, it is very costly; it entails delays and hardships which result to both the bank and the consumer alike.

Second, without this kind of an amendment, we are going to be looking at banks suffering increased losses. You know, as I know, that these losses will be passed on to consumers. We express regret in this body over the fact that banks are now exacting service fees from their customers in many, many areas. We wish that were not the case. But by passage of this bill we are going to give them another reason or excuse or area to pass on more service fees.

I think if we really mean our criticism of these service fees we need to build some balance into this bill to allow banks this degree of discretion.

I would only ask Members of this body to look at this amendment in its true light. It is not designed to gut the bill. The basic purposes and schedules of the bill remain in place. It is not designed to be a probank, anticonsumer amendment. It does not give banks unfettered discretion. They still must meet the "reasonable" standard criteria which, I would suggest again, is much more narrow and tightly controlled than the "good faith" criterion that was referred to, and it is a criterion recognized in the law.

I think this amendment represents a minimal step toward a workable program, and I would urge its passage by the body.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act. This bill addresses an important consumer problem caused by a lack of uniformity among financial institutions regarding the time in which they make consumer's funds available to them after they deposit a check. This time lag, often referred to as the "float time" essentially freezes consumers' funds arbitrarily and unnecessarily. I say "unnecessarily" because 99 percent of all checks are paid the first time through the collection process, and of the 1 percent which are returned, 60 percent are paid upon the second presentment. To hold funds for a period of time longer than it takes the bank to receive credit for the check in light of these statistics is to impose an unreasonable hardship on consumers, who naturally rely on quick availability of their funds.

I commend the chairman and the committee for their hard work on this bill. They have structured a bill which protects the interests of both the consumers and the financial institutions. By phasing in shorter check float periods, they have provided an important opportunity for study of the impact of the proposal. Further, they have provided the Federal Reserve Board the power to quickly respond with suspension power over the phased-in schedule, should specific problems or losses occur due to check fraud. The bill also penalizes persons who repeatedly overdraw their accounts by suspending the bill's protection for 6 months for their account. But most importantly, the bill defines a national standard for availability of funds to consumers rather than rely on the arbitrary decision of individual institutions to hold up funds for unlimited periods of time.

Mr. Chairman, as usual, it is not an entire industry that sponsors the grossest violations, but rather, a few which create the most damage. These few, however, have caused difficulties in delaying funds for between 5 and 10 million Americans and many millions more who have had to wait for unreasonable periods of time to access their money. The time is clearly ripe for this well-thought-out and carefully crafted solution to this problem. Again, I commend the chairman for a job well done and would urge all of my colleagues to vote in favor of this legislation.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, certainly the distinguished gentleman from California, in offering this different version of his original amendment, is well meaning in his efforts. However, even though he has limited the so-called good faith effort to more specific goals, it still is so broad that it is going to be difficult for the effective administration of this bill if a bank would like to hide behind any of these provisions.

For example, "reasonable belief." It is just literally impossible to define and totally incapable of being applied in an objective, consistent, and fair manner by the hundreds of thousands of bank tellers in the country. The words "about to become subject to bankruptcy" or "about to become subject to receivership;" this is information and knowledge that requires a degree of clairvoyance, if any of us really possess that, and certainly tellers in a bank.

Discrimination will undoubtedly be widespread with certainly no relief for arbitrary and capricious action.

Banks are endeavoring in this amendment, maybe not obviously, but certainly, if the passage of this amendment is made, banks would be taking a preferred position in the bankruptcy proceedings.

"Similar proceedings" is so broad and vague that it would conceivably cover such actions as separation, divorce, child support proceedings, foreclosure, lien actions, IRS informal meetings, civil actions of unlimited nature, and so forth. To permit check holds based on rumor or "often complex" proceedings is to sanction continued check hold abuse.

We have already given the Fed an opportunity to study the application of this bill and make recommendations, and if we find that legislation such as this might be needed, we will have an opportunity down the road to receive it. But to amend this legislation with such broad language at this time is certainly taking much of the meaning out of this bill.

In all actuality, there is a recourse for banks if they have some doubts. They can always turn down the deposit. At the teller's window they can initially stop the deposit and therefore would not have to be exposed to this liability.

I would hope that the members of the committee would give serious consideration to this because I am afraid it might be providing mischief to the effective operation of this bill.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that in an explanatory letter to the membership that emanated from the author of the amendment, reading from the explanatory amendment, it says that first an institution may have information that the writer or drawee depositor of a check is insolvent, has or is about to declare bankruptcy.

Now, you see, you have got to be a real crystal ball gazer on that one. "Or that the assets of the drawer of the check are in legal dispute." That covers anything under the Sun; "legal dispute," those are all-embracing words. Any excuse whatsoever.

Ladies and gentlemen, if we adopt this amendment we are indeed saying that we were just kidding about helping the consumers of this Nation because any teller, as I said in my opening statement, any teller with no experience at all can say, "Well, I have reason to believe that there is a legal dispute." By the way, I say to the gentleman, if the check is deposited and that teller later on can decide there is reasonable belief that there is a legal dispute and the funds are not available, it is in the processing stage and they can hold it up for 1 week or 2 weeks, and as a result thereof that individual, had he been told ahead of time, that is, the depositor, could certainly have gone to another bank and said, "Well, do you believe I am a good person and I have no legal disputes? If so, I will deposit my check, and you will have to comply with the act."

So this, is full, full of infirmities and really and truly would do nothing other than to make nil the whole purpose of the bill.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Mr. Chairman, I join my colleagues in expressing my support for the intention behind this legislation. However, I have several reservations about whether, despite our good intentions, we have produced a good bill. We have the opportunity here to correct one of the major flaws in the bill by adopting the Shumway amendment.

The Shumway amendment is a straightforward, commonsense approach that will allow depository institutions to minimize losses that may occur from fraud and insolvency. It provides an exemption from the availability schedules in three very narrowly drawn circumstances: First, if the depository institution has information that the writer of a check is insolvent or is about to declare bankruptcy; second, if the bank suspects check kiting or other fraud; and third, if a bank detects alteration, forgery, or fraud after a teller has accepted the check for deposit.

The Shumway amendment is not a blanket "good faith doubt" exception. It is narrow enough to prevent banks from exempting a large number of checks from the availability schedule. As the bill is currently drafted, a bank may not exceed the established hold periods even if it has knowledge that a fraud is being perpetrated or that a deposited check is otherwise uncollectible.

Financial institutions can often detect check-kiting schemes or other fraudulant activity through analysis of account activity and balance changes at the end of a day. When a bank detects fraud, it can react by quickly freezing the account in question in order to protect itself from any further losses. Without this amendment, however, this legislation will require an institution to make the deposited funds available, even to a check-kiter or con artist.

Similarly, a financial institution may have good reason to believe that the person who wrote a check may be insolvent or bankrupt. In such cases, the institution should be able to protect itself since it has a reasonable belief that the check may not be honored. This amendment provides that protection.

Perhaps it is important to focus on who is protected and benefited by this amendment. Initially, it is the financial institutions who will be able to reduce their losses. But as is the case with all industry, losses caused by fraud and insolvency are ultimately borne by consumers. Without the Shumway amendment, the only alternative for depository institutions is to instruct their tellers to refuse any deposit about which they have the slightest doubt or suspicion, which will only add to the inconvenience and delay of the consumer. We will see a dramatic increase in the number of checks that a bank will accept "for collection only," a practice accompanied by a charge to the consumer, and additional delay.

A similar exception has been incorporated in the expedited funds laws in California, New York, and I believe, Massachusetts. I am not aware of any reported abuse in those States of this very important, and very narrow, exemption. I urge my colleagues to support the Shumway amendment, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is useful that the amendment has been offered because it gives us a chance to examine more closely the provisions of the bill that deal with the expedited funds process.

The fact is that the bill has specific provisions in it that would prevent the check that has been submitted and has insufficient funds or is questionable from in fact benefiting under this or, for that matter, under the laws that exist today.

First of all, as the gentleman from Georgia mentioned, the banks' primary responsibility, and that requirement remains inviolate, is that they refuse to accept a check which they believe is insufficient funds or is fraudulently being submitted for credit.

Second, the bill grants the Federal Reserve the authority to exempt any type of certain kinds of checks that it finds it has problems with, or to even suspend, as an example, provisions of this law if it finds that check fraud has increased because of the provisions dealing with the availability of funds.

I understand the gentleman from California is offering this to ostensibly solve a problem; that is, the problem of reasonable assumption. The fact is, though, that the real difference between this and the way that the measure is drafted now is it takes the notice requirement burden off the bank, which I think is a responsibility that they have. If, for instance, a check is submitted for credit at the teller window and its credit is given provisionally, there is nothing that prevents the bank upon further examination of that to notify the consumer that in fact that check will not be honored within the 24-hour period, within the 1-week period, because they have specific concerns about it. They can do that just as they can refuse the checks.

So, I think that what we want to do is keep the responsibility on the institution, not to walk off into some gray area as I think this amendment does, and not address the concern of providing timely credit to consumers.

Furthermore, in examining this amendment and in the discussion giving the bank the extraordinary—assuming that they have the clairvoyance to be able to assume that for some reason the business, the small business or the individual is about to go into bankruptcy, receivership or similar proceeding—what kind of message does this send out to the community if you are running a small business and all of a sudden the bank refused to accept your check or suggests that you are about to go into receivership or bankruptcy? I think that it could result under some circumstances certainly in becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy in terms of really casting aspersions on the good business reputation of someone that should not have that thrown around.

So I do not think we should treat this amendment lightly or giving that particular judgment to banks lightly. I think it is not necessary in order to accomplish what we are all concerned about, and that is timely credit be provided. I think that this amendment, while I understand the sentiments and listened to the arguments of the gentleman, I think that it does not accomplish what is necessary. So I would urge a "no" vote.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, my distinguished colleague, Mr. COOPER.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to add just two points. First, I have enjoyed working with the gentleman from California. As you will recall, we worked very closely on the amendment, a successful amendment, to establish the $5,000 cap on any particular day's liability for a financial institution. That I think we both feel is a very important safeguard that was needed on this legislation. That helps limit any exposure or any risk that an institution would face from a fraudulent or any other type of scheme.

I am afraid, though, in spite of my admiration for the gentleman and my agreement with many of his feelings in this area, that we would be going too far to adopt an amendment like this, an amendment which looks great on the surface but which would, I am afraid, create too many opportunities for mischief on the part of financial institutions.

My second point is this. Many folks might have the impression that industry groups would like this bill if we attach this amendment to it. It is my impression having read a letter from one of the leading industry groups that they do not like any legislation period, and even with this amendment, they would still be opposed to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

I just would add I think that the discussion with regard to bad checks, of course, is an important one, but this is not the proper format for that. This bill really has little to do with correcting that particular problem. We are dealing with the availability of funds. The time in which we honor and credit checks has little or nothing to do with fraud and some of the other problems dealing with insufficient funds. It could potentially become a problem, that is why we provide for the Federal Reserve Board to deal with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] has expired.

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentlewoman, my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I could not agree with the gentleman more that check fraud is really a very small part of the total of checks written. Studies revealed that only 1 in every 5,245 checks results in a loss to the bank and that the loss is less than 1 cent for a bad check. So we know that more than 99 percent of the checks clear.
